The differences between us are genuine and I believe that law and order in any democratic society is based on political consensus. There is no democratic society that is not based on political consensus, and law and order must derive from that. When political consensus is absent, there is a serious law and order problem. That is the Achilles heel which can be exploited by any organisation. We must search for a society and framework of government that will be supported by the entire community ; that will give it the strength to deal with anyone who wants to move outside the democratic process.

When I ask the Secretary of State questions about what happened in my streets on Friday, when the security forces shot two people, I am trying to uphold the rule of law. In doing that, I am upholding the democratic process. When we abandon the rule of law, whether for terrorists or anyone else, we are playing into the hands of the terrorist organisations. It is remarkable that we have still not had a statement from the Government about the facts of that incident. That is all that anyone has ever asked for. It is important that we know what happened.

Would any hon. Member tell me that if members of the security forces operating as undercover agents in plain clothes shot two anybodies dead on the streets of Leeds or London there would not be an immediate statement in the House?

It is vital that we know that the rule of law is being upheld and that we are not engaging in a shoot-to-kill policy. That would have serious implications for our community and its future. It seems from the remarks of some hon. Members that they would approve of a shoot-to-kill policy.

The search for law and order is the search for political consensus. When there is no such consensus to provide peace and stability, the law is bent and stretched , and that is what is happening in Northern Ireland. The Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 is an example of how the law is being bent and stretched. When that happens, there is a grave danger of promoting those who want to destroy the rule of law.

It is wrong that people can be arrested without reasonable suspicion. Anyone arrested by the police or the security forces should be arrested on the ground that there is reasonable suspicion that he is engaged in doing something unlawful. It is intolerable that a confession extracted by blackmail or intimidation should be accepted in a court of law, but that is what happens under the 1978 Act. Only confessions that can be proved to have been extracted by torture or inhuman or degrading treatment are not acceptable. Confessions extracted by intimidation or blackmail are admissible under the Act.

Reference has been made to the delays in bringing people to trial. That matter requires urgent attention. As has been said, one person has served the equivalent of a six-year sentence on the evidence of three or four supergrasses who have since withdrawn their evidence against him. But that man is still in prison.

The Act is being used for the collection of information instead of for the purpose of bringing people to trial and justice. Two priests in Northern Ireland said last week that young people going to a police station should be accompanied by somebody. That brought a howl of protest, but there is much evidence from the application of the Act to support what they were saying. Since the Act came into operation, about 60,000 people have been arrested for questioning in Northern Ireland. About 90 per cent. of them have never been charged with anything and about 70 per cent. were not even asked about specific actions in which they were supposed to be involved. I have to conclude that the Act is being used for gathering information and for pressurising people into giving information, rather than for arresting people for crimes and bringing them to justice. When those figures are applied to a specific age group within a specific section of the population it can be understood why I suggest that support is being created for more extreme attitudes and for a loss of faith in the democratic process.

It has been seriously suggested that the supergrass operation — it is called the accomplice operation in Northern Ireland — is similar to what happens on this side of the Irish sea. That is utter dishonesty. To bring 35 people to trial on the word of one person, who is described by the Lord Chief Justice as a liar, hardly does credit to any system of justice. Thirty five people were held in custody for 18 months on the basis of that evidence— the Director of Public Prosecutions approved of those charges being brought — yet the DPP decided to do nothing in the McCabe case. One is therefore entitled to ask how respect for the rule of law is to be maintained.

In the McCabe case, a woman out shopping in the morning was killed by a plastic bullet. The police, led by a chief superintendent, gave very detailed evidence to the inquest as to what had happened, but when their evidence was over it was revealed to their surprise that more evidence existed in the form of a film of what had happened. The inquest was adjourned. A detective inspector of the RUC was appointed to investigate the film and what had actually happened. As a result of his investigation, the inquest decided that a completely innocent woman had been killed. The police accepted responsibility in a private, unpublished settlement of compensation to her husband, and the conclusion drawn from the film and from the detective inspector's investigation was that the evidence of the RUC members present, including that of the chief superintendent, was a complete tissue of lies.

When someone gives false evidence under oath, we call that perjury, and it is an offence. A criminal act was also committed. The DPP, supported by the Attorney-General, has decided that no further action will be taken. Hon. Members should compare that with putting 35 people in gaol for 18 months on the word of a man whom the Lord Chief Justice described as a liar. Can they then ask me to tell people to have respect for the system of justice in Northern Ireland?

We question such matters because we stand for the rule of law and for a decent application of the system of justice in order to undermine those who say that it is not possible to achieve that by peaceful and democratic means. I join hon. Members on both sides of the House who have expressed a hope that the Secretary of State will give an early reply to the request from Sir George Baker to make a policy statement on young prisoners who are held at the Secretary of State's pleasure. I acknowledge the efforts made by the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott), in that regard, as he has made a beginning. When he has heard the unanimous opinion of the House that we want to see a policy and compassion, I hope he will agree that there is no need for delay and that we should get on with the job.

This problem will not be solved by military or security means, because it is not a security or military problem, but a political one. It is a problem about how people live together and about how they agree on a framework for living together. From that will derive the basis for any order. Indeed, people only agree to be governed so that they can have a system of order. Tragically, we seem to disagree about that, and that is at the root of all our problems. In the past 12 months my party, together with other parties in Ireland, has made a serious effort to put forward an analysis of the problem, but the Prime Minister's response would seem to show that she does not think that the problem is serious enough to put all its aspects on the table for discussion. I should have thought that, with a problem as serious as that of Northern Ireland, everything should be put on the table for discussion to see whether it can be solved.

The Prime Minister's response would seem to imply that sovereignty is an immutable principle when it comes to the problems of Northern Ireland. Yet in other areas, when that sovereignty stands in the way of bigger problems, it is not an immutable principle. It can be softened, fudged, or whatever, if necessary. In this world there is no such thing as a sovereign state. We live in a very inter-dependent world. In our membership of the EEC our sovereignty has been pooled with that of nine other countries in order to deal with larger problems. Recently, we have had the example of Gibraltar, but perhaps the best example is that, because there is felt to be a nuclear threat, sovereignty has been conceded to an American President who can press a button which could destroy the entire human race. Americans can put their missiles on this country's soil. That is a surrender of sovereignty because of a belief that there are larger problems to be solved.

I believe that the Irish problem is such that there should be no immutable principles to stand in the way of examining how we can produce an agreed manner in which the people of that island can live together. Then, and only then, shall we have the sort of law and order that every hon. Member wants.

8.5 pm

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): I do not know how other hon. Members feel about this debate, but I feel a sense of hopelessness and despair. We have had this debate for so long. It may have been couched in different terms, but it is essentially the same debate. The report and the debate say loud and clear that there is no solution and that we should settle for going on and on for ever, because the problem is intractable and there is nowhere to go.

I cannot share that point of view. Indeed, I disagree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) on this issue. As he well knows, I respect him deeply. We are good friends and have been ever since I came to the House. He says that he feels greatly irked when he hears people say that there is a military solution—that irks me too—and that there is a political solution. I do not know what the political solution is and it is not on the horizon, but I know that the solution is political, and has to be. Ultimately, it will be political, because there is no other way.

All of us have something in common. We are against acts of terrorism that slaughter and maim innocent people, many of whom do not even know that they are involved in any way. On occasion I have quarrelled with my own people when I have said that before the troops are withdrawn there must be a political set-up there. That political set-up must give birth to the withdrawal, because withdrawal does not precede such a solution. I respect the views of those who think differently, but that is my view.

The opening words of the report are damning. They say quite bluntly that the situation will go on. They say:

"Accepting that Temporary Emergency Powers are necessary to combat sustained terrorist violence".

The report then goes on to say more or less that the violence will never end and that we must have security for ever and ever. I do not know the judge but I profoundly disagree with him. I have heard lovely things said about him. He may be a gentle, sweet and kindly man, but he was wrong. I know that he did his best, but he got things all wrong. He had to conclude—he had no choice—that the emergency powers had to continue. I do not think that. We are moving — many in my party believe what I believe——

Mr. Michael Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Flannery: I shall not give way as I want to speak for only 10 minutes. I am sorry, but we do not want hon. Members going on for 34 minutes, as one of our colleagues did.

The judge then proceeded in the most orthodox manner to endorse all the most offensive provisions in the Act — the admission of involuntary confessions in court, non-jury trials, supergrasses, uncorroborated evidence, lengthy periods of detention for questioning without charge, internment, and arrest on grounds of suspicion. I have nothing in common with matters of that sort. The Northern Ireland problem will be sustained indefinitely, just like a conflagration, unless we stop thinking that this is a security problem, important though that is, and get down to the nitty-gritty of the political problem that we all face.

The whole report is permeated with a belief that somehow security will prevent terrorism and solve the intractable problem of Northern Ireland. It will not. We shall be here for ever if that mentality permeates us as it permeates the report. There must be a political solution.

During my time in the House I have had no harsh words with colleagues, either behind me or on the Conservative Benches. I have always said that I dread anything happening to any of them, and I honourably and sincerely do. It would be ghastly if such a thing occurred. However, the stubborn refusal of Unionist leaders to believe the reality of a political solution means that the killing and maiming will continue indefinitely. Just as surely as Hong Kong must return to China, and just as surely as the British Empire had to be dismantled, so will this last foothold of Britain's imperial past one day have to be rejoined with its real motherland, a united Ireland. Unionist leaders will have to come to terms with that reality, just as my party has come to terms with it in the last few years. To deny that is not merely stubborn obstinacy which will result in such reports being produced again and again, but it is a denial of reality. This report will go into the dustbin of history just as surely as I am standing here tonight.

I wish to refer to one major piece of foolishness that Baker upholds and which is in the process of imminent collapse. My hon. Friends and I have repeatedly condemned the disgraceful use of supergrasses. As I have often said, the supergrass system is a violation of both natural and legal justice. It is one of a group of tyrannical last resorts of a system which is patently unworkable. The Six Counties have never been ruled without emergency measures, but those measures are now more concentrated in this Act. The Six Counties were purloined from Ireland by force of arms and the implied threat of armed force in 1922. Some Unionists have said that they do not believe in armed force, yet they drew a line around the Six Counties, with their inbuilt Protestant majority, and they have held them ever since by force of arms and threats to the Irish people.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) said that there is democracy in Northern Ireland. During the war I lived in India for many years. I saw areas where the Muslims were dominant and where the Hindus were held in subjection. The Muslims said that that was democratic because they were in the majority. The same was true of Hindu areas. However, they were two different communities.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North has often pointed out that his community is numerically larger. That is not the consensus about which my hon. Friend the Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) spoke. So long as the hon. Member for Antrim, North holds that undemocratic attitude and counts heads in the different communities, so long will this terrible problem endure.

The lack of any real democracy to uphold this synthetic state is the real cause of the fundamental problem. So long as we continue to pretend that there are not two distinct communities in the Six Counties, when clearly there are, we are bound to have a political and literal explosion——

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for an hon.

Member who has just come into the precincts of the Chamber to refer to hon. Members as "animals" from outside the Bar of the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): What happens beyond the Bar of the House is beyond my responsibility. I did not hear it.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) was referring to me. I was listening to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery), and I distinctly heard the hon. Member for Belfast, East and the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) say that people should be eliminated in Northern Ireland. I found that remark offensive, and I made that response.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for an hon. Member who was not in the House to misrepresent an hon. Member who had actually said that the Protestants were eliminated from the south of Ireland? Everyone knows that before partition the number of Protestants in the south of Ireland was 10 per cent. of the population, whereas it is now only 2 per cent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That happened beyond my hearing.

Mr. Flannery: I thought that hon. Members were shouting at me, but I am perfectly harmless. I did not need the defence of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), because I know the two hon. Members too well and am aware of the things they say.

There is something morally and socially wrong about an informer, especially when he is a perjured murderer, taking money from the Special Branch to live a high life. In a previous supergrass trial the judge said that such a creature was an excellent witness, yet that witness was a perjured murderer who had tried to gain money from divulging the names of people with whom he had worked and killed. How in heaven's name can we justify that and say that we believe in honour and justice?

This tells us a lot about those people, including Sir George Baker—I am sad that he is dead—who uphold such methods. It says more about them than it can possibly say about those whom murderers and rogues such as Gilmour expose. This system was pregnant with collapse from its inception. I am staggered to believe that even now in this Chamber there are those who try to defend it and believe that there was a victory for justice by what the judge did. It was obvious that Gilmour was a rogue and a liar, and the judge would have been impugned had he not freed all the defendants.

Among those defendants might have been some people who were guilty of these things, but this nonsensical system forced the judge to free them all. That must surely herald the final collapse of the system.

There is now an attempt, which has appeared in many of today's newspapers, to suggest that by some convoluted method of thought the supergrass system is an upholder of real justice. What tortuous nonsense that is.

Britain has had to reconsider many cases involving a forensic expert where people were gaoled even though innocent. Similary, all the trials in Northern Ireland that involve supergrasses should be considered afresh. Innocent people may be languishing in gaol. With supergrasses giving evidence, there is a danger that innocent people are rotting in gaol and thinking, "What kind of justice is this when I have done nothing wrong but I am in gaol because of a perjured murderer?" They will hate us in the same way as we would hate any regime that gaoled us without cause.

We should all reject the findings of the report because they are fundamentally wrong. The sense of despair and hopelessness in the report will make matters worse. It puts forward security as a solution, yet the real solution must be political.

8.19 pm

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) believes that Sir George Baker was wrong. On one aspect at least, he was right. He said that "history has so often two or more faces."

Having heard the hon. Gentleman's account of history, it is quite clear that it has more than one face. He attempted to deceive the House into believing that the map of Northern Ireland was arbitrarily drawn without consultation with anyone south or north of the border. In fact, the boundary of Northern Ireland was drawn by tripartite agreement. It was agreed by a majority vote in this House, in the Dail and in Stormont. Following that, a tripartite agreement was signed in the League of Nations. Yet the hon. Gentleman would have the House believe that it was an arbitrary decision and that Northern Ireland is being retained as part of the United Kingdom by the pressure and arms of the British Army.

The hon. Gentleman said that the answer to the problems must be political and not military. He said that he was hurt by the suggestion that there should be a military solution. He may be hurt again before I sit down because that is exactly the proposition that I shall put forward later.

It ill becomes the hon. Gentleman to suggest that it is the stubbornness of Unionist leaders to recognise a political solution that brings us to the present position. In fact, the Unionist leaders, even though they do not believe that a political solution will ultimately solve the overall problem, are still trying to achieve such a solution. It is the nationalist leaders who are refusing to talk. It is the stubbornness not of Unionist leaders, but of those whom the hon. Gentleman supports that is causing difficulty in reaching a political solution—[Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), who is babbling incoherently from a sedentary position, wish to intervene?

Although I do not agree with every word in the Baker report, it is a thorough, useful and detailed examination of the problems of terrorism in Northern Ireland. It is a careful and considered report. My hon. Friend the Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) and I were privileged to meet Sir George, and we made known our views both orally and in writing. The House is right to pay tribute to his work.

On page 9 of his report, Baker identified the purpose of many of those who attack the emergency provisions Act. He states:

"There are others who attack the EPA, the security forces and the legal process including the judges and the courts, not for the ultimate purpose of preserving human rights and liberties but for sinister reasons. Any law for the protection of the people would be a target."

When I hear people outside the House attacking the Act, I fear that it is not because they concern themselves with the liberties of the individual, but because they wish to protect those who attack individuals in Northern Ireland who are much maligned and in danger.

The report refers to the broad security policy and Baker states what he believes and understands to be the aim of Government policy — to end terrorist crime from whatever source through the effect and impartial application of the law. The hon. Member for Hillsborough is right in saying that Sir George Baker painted a gloomy picture. Paragraph 37 of the report states:

"it would be foolish to assume that the terrorists may not retain a significant capability to carry out crimes of violence, at least for the near future . . . There are no grounds for forecasting significant changes in the existing pattern or targets of its attacks."

Is it not an indictment of the Government's security policies that someone who reviews the procedures of the control of terrorism says that there is no light at the end of the tunnel? The security policies of this and past Governments have failed and have been seen to fail. They must change that policy and produce a resolute military initiative. The hon. Member for Hillsborough may well be irked now, but that is the only way to defeat the Provisional IRA. The rebellion will not be cooled and the IRA will not be persuaded by the eloquence of the Government's request to put away their guns. They will be defeated only militarily.

Mr. McNamara: Will the hon. Gentleman outline a resolute military policy and initiative?

Mr. Robinson: I could do that in considerable detail, and give the hon. Gentleman books that we have published on the subject. Unlike some hon. Members who make bland statements about defeating terrorism, we have detailed what should be done to defeat it. The first priority is having the will to win. Sometimes I wonder how real the will is to defeat terrorism. People in Great Britain are often not prepared to pay the price that they may have to pay to turn the screw on the IRA. The greatest example of the Government's lack of will to deal with security in Northern Ireland may be seen in their treatment of Sinn Fein. If they had the resolve to defeat terrorism, they would take it on in all its shapes and forms, including Sinn Fein. I intend to return to that point, so I shall not transgress, although the hon. Gentleman may tempt me to do so.

Sir George Baker makes it clear that there is a warning for this and future Governments. It is contained in paragraph 35 of his report. It states:

"The main sources from which protection is required are the PIRA and the INLA. Loyalist terrorism now is very much reactive . . . I have been warned by many not to under-rate the danger and potential of Protestant terrorism. I bear that in mind with a further warning that the anger in the community which suffers the brunt of PIRA/INLA attacks must never be underestimated. Church leaders have emphasised to me that the extent of forgiveness by some of those who have suffered is indeed remarkable. I would comment that this is a Christian virtue which cannot be expected to endure forever."

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland should not be under the illusion that the Protestant community will for ever turn the cheek when it is under attack from PIRA violence.

Like the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis), I take it ill that an hon. Member should allow into the precincts of the House those who have engaged in PIRA activities and who still espouse the cause of terrorism. Hon. Members who take such a line, no doubt to ingratiate themselves with the Irish electorate in their constituencies, should attend the funerals and visit the widows and children of the victims of the people whom they bring into the House. Then they may think again before they engage in such an activity.

The hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone rightly commented about paragraph 64 of the report. Sir George Baker deals with the position, which thankfully does not occur often, of members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary who find themselves on remand or in prison. I have visited RUC members imprisoned in Crumlin road gaols. The Secretary of State should know that those officers in prison are in great danger. They do not have the support of the para-military organisations. They cannot expect anyone to help them if a fight breaks out, and they are often, if not always, the targets of attack by not only the Provisional IRA and the INLA but by Protestant para-militaries.

Not only the person in prison but his visitors are in danger. They are immediately singled out by the relatives of the para-militaries as being the friends, associates or relatives of an RUC member. If a pattern emerges of their visiting behaviour, they can become easy targets. As the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone said, they are the objects of much abuse and ridicule when they visit their friends or relatives in prison. I have told the Minister of State that security officers are often held in solitary confinement. I hope that he will accept the recommendation of Sir George Baker and include the RUC and its reserve in the section mentioned in the report.

Another matter that several hon. Members believed it right to mention was the position of those young people who are serving sentences at the pleasure of the Secretary of State. I have met the families of many of those people. It is extremely sad, because those people, who were only children when they committed offences, are unable to plan their future lives. The youngsters have no hope because they do not know when their sentences will be terminated, and their families cannot plan for the future because they do not know when their sons or brothers will come out of prison. Many of those people have served sentences of more than 10 years.

I met the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State—the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott)—last week. He told me that in the new year a pattern would begin to emerge from which we might be able to assess what would happen to SOSPs. I considered all the SOSP cases where there has been release, but I cannot find the slightest glimmer of a pattern. I hope that when the Minister replies he will tell us about the nature of the pattern. Is it that after a person has served part of his sentence he is told that he can expect release? Is the pattern that, if he removes himself from the compound system at the Maze and asks to be put in a cellular block, that will be a first step on the way to release? The Secretary of State or the Minister must tell us about this. At any rate, the Secretary of State must make the clear statement that is asked for in Sir George Baker's report.

The most fundamental principle of justice is that an accused man should have a trial within a reasonable time. Many of my constituents are in the third year of their remand period and still do not know their date of trial. No hon. Member could defend that. Those people have been charged with crimes that are unlikely to attract sentences of more than twice the period that they have already served. Therefore, taking account of remission, they have already served the full sentence that they would have received if they had been found guilty of the crime.

I agree to some extent with the recommendation in paragraph 185 that, after 12 months, under one set of circumstances at least—where it is the responsibility of the prosecution that delay has occurred—there should be release. Naturally, in the circumstances described by the Secretary of State, when the reason for the delay is that the prisoner is being choosy about his counsel, one could not expect that the prisoner should be released after 12 months. If the cause of the delay is that either the security forces or the DPP are compiling the necessary details for the prosecution, and finding that witnesses are difficult to bring forward, there is ample justification for the recommendation.

I move now to the proscription of the IRA. I have read with considerable interest the many remarks in the report linking Sinn Fein with the IRA, and the evidence is overwhelming. To any impartial individual, there would not be the slightest doubt that Sinn Fein and the IRA are one and the same animal. There is documentary evidence to that effect, which I have quoted in another debate. A document was found in the flat of Seamus Twomey, which shows the structure of the IRA. It said:

> "Sinn Fein should come under Army organisers at all levels . . . Sinn Fein should be radicalised (under army direction) . . . SF should be directed to infiltrate other organizations to win support for, and sympathy to, the movement . . . It gains the respect of the people which in turn leads to increased support for the cell."

Clearly there is no distinction between Sinn Fein and the IRA. The speeches by Danny Morrison and the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) are in support of the murderous activities of the IRA.

Will the Secretary of State consider the position of Unionist councillors in particular at the moment? I can give him one example. In Belfast city council, one of my party colleagues, councillor Billy Dickson, has to sit opposite two Sinn Fein members at every meeting of the city council. They gloried the night that the IRA pumped eight bullets into him and also placed a bomb outside his home so that the security forces, when they came to investigate the event, would have been blown up and there would have been further loss of life. Yet he has to sit opposite people who support such activity, and may even do more than support it. People in the Sinn Fein organisation may be politicians by day—who knows but that they are terrorists at night? The least that can be said for the process of proscribing Sinn Fein is that it would perform an act of political hygiene in Northern Ireland politics.

The local government elections in May of next year will see the entrance into the district councils of Northern Ireland of dozens of Sinn Fein representatives. The House would not for one moment accept an hon. Member, sitting on whatever side of the House, who had been responsible for condoning the killing of hon. Members, such as Sir Anthony Berry, Airey Neave and the Reverend Robert Bradford. If hon. Members were faced with such circumstances, they would think long and hard before rejecting the proscribing of such an organisation.

Sir George Baker makes it clear that the UDA should not be proscribed, and then examines Sinn Fein. If he had thought that Sinn Fein should not be proscribed, he would have said what he was prepared to say about the UDA, but he did not. Sir George Baker makes a strange statement that it is a political decision, that there is a conference occurring between the British Government and the Government of the Irish Republic and that he will leave the matter to those in another council. I wonder what gave Sir George Baker the impression that this matter was considered mutually between the Governments of the United Kingdom and of the Republic of Ireland.

Sir George Baker endorses the suggestion that, before an election occurs, candidates should take an oath that they renounce violence. If that step was taken, the complexion of our elections would be different. If the Secretary of State is not prepared to go the logical way of proscribing Sinn Fein, he could surely consider that avenue.

I say, as I have said at six-month intervals since I became a Member, that the ritual of considering the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act is likely to continue. The people of Northern Ireland have no joy in thinking of any legislation that limits or restricts their liberties. They recognise that the protection of an individual's rights must come second to the protection of a society. It is the society in Northern Ireland that is under attack.

I conclude with the words used correctly by Sir George Baker:

> "The remedy is squarely in the hands of those who say they are waging war. Let them forswear violence and respect the right to live."

8.41 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Not having spoken previously in the House in a debate on the affairs of Northern Ireland, I am bound to say that to hear this debate is a profoundly depressing experience: depressing because the violence seems to be continuing without point and without end; depressing because soldiers and police officers are still having to draw on all their reserves of courage; and depressing because violence in Northern Ireland has now become institutionalised so that tomorrow I suspect that the press will be seen to have virtually ignored this important debate.

I join those who have paid tribute to Sir George Baker. On occasions I had the privilege of appearing before Sir George when he was a judge in court. He was a judge who was characterised by equal measures of sharpness of mind and courtesy. Even among judges, equality of those attributes is rare.

I wish to comment particularly on some of the aspects of the Baker report dealing with the nature of the courts hearing criminal trials, and with the quality of the evidence that is placed before those courts. Before dealing with specific matters, it is as well to remind myself, and possibly some hon. Members, that the legal system which is meant to operate in Northern Ireland is the same common law based legal system that operates in England and Wales—the common law of England. It is not by any means an infallible system, but it has stood the test of time. It is certainly a good deal less fallible than half of the common law of England, which is effectively what operates in some of the criminal courts in Northern Ireland.

I agree with the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) that it is regrettable that Sir George Baker's terms of reference were so limited and so restricted that he was not asked to investigate whether temporary emergency legislation was effective or even necessary. I believe that those who face the worst problems caused by the violence in Northern Ireland, those who face daily the prospect of death because of that violence—the citizens of Northern Ireland, the police and the armed forces who have to attempt to keep order in those circumstances—deserve a more wide-ranging investigation than Sir George Baker was able to carry out, because his terms of reference were so restricted.

While at present I accept the need for the type of legislation under consideration tonight, the absence of any independent and ongoing monitoring of the operation of the legislation is a matter of great anxiety. From time to time there have been reports on the circumstances in Northern Ireland, and reports upon the prevention of terrorism provisions applicable to Great Britain; but, as yet, no effort has been made openly and continuously to scrutinise whether such legislation is needed. As a result, much of the evidence—even the evidence in as careful a report as the Baker report, and even bearing in mind the long list of distinguished witnesses and bodies giving evidence which appears at the end of the report—is anecdotal or based upon opinion; and we all know how opinion is the prisoner of imagination.

Although today I feel that it is necessary for the emergency provisions to continue, unless some ongoing scrutiny is provided, and unless the House is given more open and more reliable evidence, beyond anecdote, of the effect of the provisions, it will become more and more difficult to support such legislation. Violence for political ends is a hateful contempt of freedom and justice; and such emergency powers are, to an extent, a denial of freedom and justice. Before we perpetuate such denials of freedom and justice, limited perhaps though they be, it is essential that a more coherent and persuasive body of evidence is available to the House.

I do not believe that it can be gainsaid that the powers contained in the emergency provisions legislation have had a drastic effect upon the common law of England as it has been applied in Northern Ireland since the provisions first came into force.

I am gratified by many of the Secretary of State's remarks made in his characteristically thoughtful and careful way. It is good to hear that changes will be made in line with at least some of the recommendations of the Baker report, although one is bound to be anxious as to whether the Secretary of State was committing himself to go all the way with Baker.

I shall give just a few examples of the way in which the common law has indeed been drastically affected by the emergency provisions. We hear of trials with more than 20 defendants. There has been a great deal of discussion in the past few days about the Gilmour trial. I disagree with the Secretary of State. I do not for one moment believe that a multiplicity of defendants shortens the trial of all those defendants when one considers the matter overall. Trials of 35 defendants would no longer be allowed in Great Britain. One has only to look at the fiasco of the Bristol riots case some time ago to see how the experience of multiple-defendant trials has been extremely unhappy in England and Wales.

I venture to suggest to the Secretary of State, with all the force that I can command, that a much more just judicial system operates if one has a few defendants only in trials; and if the trials are broken into small parts and are thus shorter. If the Secretary of State believes that 20-plus defendant trials will produce justice, he is sadly deluding himself.

The Bail Act 1976, applicable to England and Wales, contains the presumption that the person who has been charged is entitled to bail. The onus is upon the Crown to prove that the person should not have bail. The Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978, section 2, reverses that presumption. Section 2 is such a "belt and braces operation" that, as Sir George Baker points out, section 2(4) is wholly meaningless. It provides that a right of appeal is not prejudiced, but such a right of appeal has never existed. It seems extraordinary that such a provision has existed for so long.

In England and Wales, the only mode of trial on indictment has been by jury. I deplore the talk that that might be changed in certain cases. I hope that we shall see no decline in England and Wales of the right to jury trial for those on indictment.

There is no right at all to jury trial in Northern Ireland for scheduled offences. Indeed, there is no possibility of jury trial for such offences, save in certain restricted circumstances under schedule 4. It is important to remember that jury trial has been withdrawn for many non-terrorist offences. Many robbery cases have no terrorist connection: they could be tried in Northern Ireland as justly by jury as anywhere else in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): How else can trials be held and perverse verdicts be avoided other than under the present system? Jurors have shown that they are not prepared to convict accused persons who share their religion or where they are liable to be nobbled.

Mr. Carlile: The hon. Gentleman has raised a fair point, but if he hears me out he will find that I am not saying that Diplock courts should not exist. I am arguing that Diplock courts should be used only in restricted circumstances. They should not be used—there is no justification for doing so—in cases of ordinary crime with no terrorist connection. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman would not disagree with that view. I should be surprised if he did.

I note from schedule 4 that one of the scheduled categories of offence is that of assault occasioning actual bodily harm. Those of us who know the law, or some of it at least, are aware that offences of actual bodily harm are tried daily in magistrates' courts throughout England and Wales. When the Secretary of State comes to consider in detail the descheduling of offences, I hope that he will go much further than he appears to have done so far. Indeed, I hope that he will go beyond Sir George Baker's recommendations and will seek to deschedule wherever possible.

However, I am bound to accept that there is a residual category of case, but only that, and that the Diplock courts may have to continue for reasons which have been discussed on many occasions. I hope that the Secretary of State will consider three-judge rather than one-judge courts. I accept that there are manpower problems, but alterative arrangements could be made, possibly by the introduction of judges from across the water to try civil cases in Northern Ireland. By that means it might be possible to have three-judge criminal trials in whatever system succeeds the Diplock courts.

One of the problems of the Diplock courts is that of delay. Trial delay is so great that false confession is often the short way to release. If someone is arrested and is faced with the choice of trial in a Diplock court, possibly two or three years after the date of arrest, or a quick hearing of a guilty plea, the chances are that he will decide to make a false confession, plead guilty and be released earlier. That cannot be an acceptable system of justice within the United Kingdom.

Section 8 as now drawn makes it very likely that tainted confessions will be allowed in evidence in Northern Ireland. Indeed, that must have occurred in many trials because of the restricted nature of section 8, to which the Secretary of State fairly referred. I have examined in great detail Sir George Baker's alternative section 8, and it is a valiant effort to produce something that is fair. Nevertheless, Sir George Baker's section 8 also leaves the great risk—indeed, the certainty, in my view—that tainted confessions will continue to be given in evidence in Northern Ireland.

The Secretary of State and I, and several others, spent many hours—many all too forgettable hours—discussing in great detail the admissibility of confessions in relation to what is now, sadly, the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. I cannot for the life of me see why the same provisions as are now contained in that Act should not apply in relation to confessions in Northern Ireland. I say to the Secretary of State that a tainted confession is a tainted confession is a tainted confession. The risk of tainted confessions continuing to be a matter of course in courts in Northern Ireland will in no way be diluted if the Baker recommendation on section 8 is adopted.

The final example that I should like to give of injustices that can arise under the present Act relates to powers of arrest, though I take it that the Secretary of State—I hope that I understand him aright — is prepared to introduce the requirement of "reasonable suspicion" into powers of arrest where now all that is needed is "suspicion", whether reasonable or not.

Supergrass trials have been mentioned in the debate, not surprisingly. Many hon. Members have great misgivings about supergrass trials. Lord Lowry, in his courageous decision in the Gilmour case, exposed the danger of supergrass trials. With respect, I do not believe that the Secretary of State has really got the point about them. Whereas in England and Wales the Director of Public Prosecutions will allow a case to go to court only if he believes that the evidence of an informer is not only credible and cogent, but, in practice, to some extent at least corroborated, knowing full well that in any event he has to satisfy the tests that will be set by a jury—nobody sets standards better than a jury when it comes to judging evidence—in Northern Ireland, the Director of Public Prosecutions knows that the trial will not be heard by a jury. He knows that he does not have to satisfy the diverse but telling demands made by a jury when it examines the veracity of a witness. He knows that the supergrass class of witness has itself become institutionalised so that acceptance is all too easy.

I take issue with the Secretary of State's statement that the Director in Northern Ireland allows cases to go for trial only if he believes that the evidence is credible and cogent. The fact is that, because of the nature of his office, he has no way of judging whether the evidence of the supergrass is credible and cogent. Only a court can make that judgment. In my view, it is wrong for people to be convicted on the evidence of witnesses more tainted than any ever seen in the past in courts in the United Kingdom, without the advantage of at least some independent corroboration.

Many other issues arising from the Baker report could be considered in detail. I hope that at the least when the Secretary of State produces legislation it will give effect to all the Baker recommendations. That would go some of the way. I consider that the Government's response to the Baker report has been slothful in the extreme. It may be because there has been a change of Secretary of State that there have been delays, but that is no excuse. The Government have been far too slow and have lost the opportunity to place legislation before this Session of Parliament. We should have had the legislation by now.

The common law is a green and fertile field, able to adapt itself to change. The sooner Northern Ireland comes back into the open arms of the common law, the better. I hope that when the legislation is introduced it will hasten that day.

9 pm

Mr. A. Cecil Walker (Belfast, North): I join the Secretary of State and others in paying sincere tribute to the late Sir George Baker and to the meticulous way in which he prepared and submitted his report.

It was enlightening to read in paragraph 21 that during his many visits to the Province

"to get the 'feel' of the overall situation"

Sir George found that

"for the most part Northern Ireland is a peaceful and pleasant land in which to live and work."

That opinion is shared by almost everyone who has visited the Province, and I am pleased that it has been recognised that life goes on fairly normally and that the Government have acted responsibly in their support and provision for the needs of the Province.

The report covers a very wide range of issues. If we all made detailed contributions on all those matters, we should be here for far longer than is possible. Therefore, I shall confine my remarks to those aspects of specific concern to my constituency. North Belfast is recognised as one of the most deprived and disturbed areas of the city and includes the equivalent of the Crown court as well as Crumlin road prison, which houses all the remand prisoners of Northern Ireland.

The houses of a large proportion of the Loyalist prisoners are in my constituency, so I am naturally involved in many issues which concern them. In this context, I support the comments of the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) about paragraph 35, when he said that Loyalist terrorism was very much reactive. Recent attacks alleged to have emanated from Loyalist para-militaries fully bear out the observation in the report that Loyalists have

[Mr. A. Cecil Walker]

"responded to PIRA and INLA violence by sporadic attacks directed at specific members or supporters of those organisations but also, at random against Catholics."

I never have condoned and never will condone any form of violence from whatever source. I put that on record again today.

Having shared the traumatic experiences of my constituency over the past 15 years, I agree with the statement in paragraph 35 that

"the anger in the community which suffers the brunt of PIRA/INLA attacks must never be underestimated."

I have known many such reactions at first hand, as have many of my colleagues who have spent many days and nights among the community trying to defuse the many situations which threaten the spill-over into uncontrolled physical violence. It is in situations of that kind that one hears the suggestion that there is a great difference between those who act in defence of their country and those who act against it.

Paragraph 163 deals with accomplices — variously described as converted terrorists, informers or supergrasses. In my constituency, this is an extremely emotive issue as so many of those now incarcerated in prison are there on the evidence of such persons. To give credence to the emotion that surrounds this form of evidence, the families of those imprisoned say that those prisoners are there on the evidence of people who have repeatedly taken part in serious criminal activities and have agreed to give evidence for the prosecution against participants in the same crimes.

The word "supergrass" has been used to denote that type of witness for the prosecution. There is no other word with the same meaning. "Accomplice" is a wider word covering anyone who has taken part in a crime. The former is more appropriate to describe those who were working on behalf of the police at the time. "Converted terrorist" —a term used by the police and by representatives of the Government—is only suitable for those who have genuinely repented. It is totally unacceptable that that term should be applied to dangerous and evil men who have undergone convertion for the sole purpose of obtaining immunity, avoiding a long prison sentence, and receiving financial compensation.

We have now been informed that there will be no more immunity from prosecution. However, the suspicion remains that certain steps can still be taken to secure an early release or be given a new identity. I am also deeply concerned about the unduly long and complicated cases, referred to in paragraph 116, where a judge sitting alone has to assess evidence against a large number of people — perhaps between 30 and 50. It would seem impracticable that one man should have to give judgment against such a large number of people in trials lasting for six months or more. That is borne out in paragraph 172, which states:

"I share the doubts of some witnesses about the wisdom of having so many defendants, so many charges, such delay in starting and such long trials."

It is recommended in the review that efforts should be made to reduce the number of defendants to 20 or fewer and to reduce the delays in starting and the length of the trials. I was pleased to hear the Secretary of State mention the fact that he is considering the appointment of another judge.

In paragraph 164, the report questions whether a person should be convicted on accomplice evidence alone. I maintain that that is totally unsatisfactory, as it could be interpreted as a matter of political expediency rather than of the public interest. There have always been informants, and evidence from such informants has always been accepted, notwithstanding the fact that it was considered as dangerous evidence because there is usually a motive other than the simple desire to tell the truth.

As I drive past the prison, I worry about the fact that so many prisoners are on remand for so long. The problem is partly attributed to the lack of court space and the small number of senior Queen's Counsel involved in many trials. Nevertheless, I agree with the statement in paragraph 174 of the report that the loss of liberty is "just another form of detention."

In those circumstances, it is impossible to conclude that there is no injustice. Prisoners are sometimes held on remand for two years or more. That causes great stress, particularly on prisoners' wives and children who suffer greater poverty than any other one-parent families, because wives feel that they must provide the prisoner with all the items allowed for by the prison authorities. They already provide clothing, as remand prisoners are not obliged to wear prison uniforms.

The prison houses men from every constituency in Northern Ireland. Many families have to spend nearly a full day travelling in order to visit the prisoner for half an hour. Many families are ostracised by the community because of associated guilt, and so the lengthy remands can cause irreparable harm.

In paragraph 450, in connection with his visit to Crumlin road prison, Sir George mentioned the family centre which provides facilities for people visiting the prison or attending the courts. He is lavish in his praise for the services offered. However, he is not completely accurate when he states that the centre is run by NIACRO. In fact, the project is jointly managed by NIACRO and the Save the Children Fund. Both those organisations should be given credit for their attempts to alleviate the stress occasioned by the visits. I am heartened by Lord Lowry saying in paragraph 170:

"We will accept but one standard of proof in criminal cases, namely, proof beyond reasonable doubt."

That has been borne out by recent events.

9.9 pm

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): This has been an interesting and constructive debate. I must do the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) justice. Although he made a lively speech, I am sure that he wants peace in Ireland. Although I do not agree with his method, speeches that he has made since I have been here are based on his desire for peace. He denounced the Baker report as proposing just more of the same. He should be aware that the terms of reference were, as the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) said, drawn by the Secretary of State, not Sir George Baker, and drawn narrowly. The late Sir George has done a great service to the community in Northern Ireland by examining in detail how the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 has worked. The House can take heart from many of his recommendations.

I cannot add much to what hon. Members who have supported the recommendations have said about delay in bringing cases to trial. Such delay is an injustice. The recommendation for the release on bail of anyone who is not brought to trial within 12 months should be considered. It is wrong that people should have to wait 12 months and more.

In response to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's challenge, I should like to say that I agree with him about the Baker report's proposals concerning detention. It recommends that section 12 be repealed. We must retain that reserve power, however. I hope that it will never be necessary to use it, but circumstances in which the Secretary of State needs to exercise those powers might arise during the long summer recess, for example.

There is anxiety in Northern Ireland about police complaints. They are necessarily subjective. It is difficult to prove accusations and to confirm what has happened. The report advances the idea of tape recording interrogations. The Government should consider that when framing replacement legislation.

I listened carefully to what the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery said about suspicion and reasonable suspicion. His views should be considered by the Government, and the Baker report paid considerable attention to that matter. The report concludes:

"I have become increasingly more convinced that any provision of the EPA which may save even one life or bring even one guilty terrorist to conviction and sentence should be retained until the para-military forces forswear terrorism unless there is a powerful convincing reason for repeal or amendment."

Sadly, the paramilitary forces have yet to forswear terrorism and, therefore, I cannot see any powerful convincing reason why the Act should be repealed or substantially amended.

Sir George said that when the Government bring forward new legislation it should not include the words "emergency provisions" or "prevention of terrorism", and that the Protection of the Peoples Act would be a more acceptable way of showing all parties that we want to leave the circumstances of terrorism and emergency and all that is conjured up by such words. Sir George thought that a subtle change in the title of future legislation should be considered. He said that he was not convinced about the title that he suggested, but we should note his suggestion carefully.

Sir George Baker did a great service to the community of Northern Ireland and I hope that the Government will note many of the constructive comments made from both sides of the House and that it will not be long before legislation embodying many of the suggestions made in our debate is brought before the House.

9.17 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown). He followed the debate with interest and made some substantial and important points.

The review of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 was announced on 8 April 1983, but it had long been called for, and the Labour party called for such a review in a statement by its national executive committee in 1981. At that time we recommended in a policy document that a review of the Act should be given high priority.

The concern of the Labour party, and of others, which gave rise to that view was based on the unease that was felt that such emergency provisions should lie on our statute book. It was felt that if they must lie on the statute book, not only should they fall within the scrutiny of the House, but they should be the subject of a review and that, following such a review, any recommendations should be considered and, if necessary, acted on.

The Labour party was particularly worried about part II of the Act which deals with powers of arrest, detention and search. Our concern has been reflected from all parts of the House in this debate. We still believe that deprivation of liberty under sections 11 to 14 does not conform with the requirements of article 5 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Indeed, it is noticeable that section 11 exercised the mind of Sir George Baker and gave rise to some recommendations from him. The meat of section 11 lies in subsection (1) which provides that "any constable may arrest without warrant any person whom he suspects of being a terrorist".

Such a person shall not be detained for more than 72 hours after the arrest.

Some of the objections which Sir George reflected and voiced involved the fact that the power of arrest might be exercised on suspicion rather than on reasonable suspicion —a distinction not immediately apparent to a layman, but certainly apparent to a barrister, and often vital, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) know, in the eyes of a judge.

Sir George's other concern was that detention may be for as long as 72 hours. That also gave some concern to the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume). Sir George recognised that as the provisions of the ordinary law of arrest were insufficient—that was his conclusion—other such provisions would be required to be codified for Northern Ireland in a new Act. That was one of his recommendations. Another of his recommendations dealt with the extension of the initial holding period of anyone arrested under section 11. He felt that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, or, if not available, one of his junior Ministers, may in any particular case extend the initial holding period by a specified period or periods not exceeding five days in all.

Sir George also felt that the powers of arrest for scheduled offences and offences under the prevention of terrorism and the emergency provisions Acts should be all part of one and the same Act for Northern Ireland. Others, too, have expressed their concern at the powers of section 11. Indeed, they were referred to earlier by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West.

A summary of evidence from the Cobden Trust's research on the operation of the emergency legislation in Northern Ireland, which was presented to Sir George Baker, revealed that section 11 was not being used for the purpose for which it was intended and endorsed by Parliament — that is, as the precursor to internment. Indeed, 72 per cent. of the Cobden sample of people held under the emergency legislation in 1981 were not questioned about any specific offence. A high percentage were clearly not suspected of involvement in any specific offence, but were detained solely for the purpose of information gathering.

Again, according to the Cobden Trust's written evidence, 90 per cent. of the arrests under the emergency legislation do not result in charges being preferred. In his report Sir George confirms that figure for a 10-month period in 1980, but asks the pointed question whether there could be a solution that avoids the alienation of the minority community while at the same time enables the RUC to take as effective action as possible to stamp out terrorism.

It is pertinent to ask whether it is true that arrests are made for the purpose of information gathering. Those are the allegations of academic writers as well as of the Cobden Trust, in claiming that arrests are frequently made not only to gather information but low-grade intelligence at that and that the power of arrest is all part and parcel of the surveillance and harassment that is inherent in the powers of the emergency provisions legislation.

Those suspects in the Cobden sample had not, it is true, been physically abused, but they were insulted, threatened, offered bribes and denied access to their solicitors. Indeed, 48 per cent. declared that they were subjected to obscenities and insults about themselves or their families, while 38 per cent. claimed that pressure was put on them to pass on information to the police. Again, 19 per cent. declared that they were asked about their political views.

It is true that none alleged physical abuse, but 76 per cent. of those in the Cobden sample who asked to see their solicitors were refused access, and none saw his solicitor within 48 hours. The common law appears to be suspended when it comes to Northern Ireland. Viscount Simon, in the well-known case of Christie v. Lleachinsky, declared that "a citizen is entitled to know on what charge or suspicion of what crime he is seized".
That is not so in Northern Ireland under the emergency provisions legislation. It is sufficient, as Baker points out, to say that there is an arrest under section 11 on the ground that the person is suspected of being a terrorist.

The word "reasonable" to which I referred earlier would convert what is in effect a subjective test into an objective one recognised by common law jurisprudence. The lack of the word simply means that if there is an honest, genuine suspicion — without any reasoning, proof or straws in the wind to back it up—a court cannot inquire further as to whether the arrest was lawful.

In this instance, I am reminded of the powers of the French juge d'instruction, which is so alien to our own concepts of justice, who can arrest and incarcerate on the principles of an intimate conviction of the guilt of the person he wishes to accuse. That principle is now regarded with some unease in France, let alone in our own country, yet here we find it entrenched in legislation for Northern Ireland. I am not entirely sure what the man on the Clapham omnibus would think of such a lack of reasonableness, but I am sure that many hon. Members would feel a certain disquiet if any of their constituents were so held.

It is fair to add that Sir George Baker points out that he has no evidence to suggest that suspicion, as against reasonable suspicion, has been a factor in a decision to use section 11 for the purposes of arrest. Nevertheless, he concluded that resonable suspicion should be required when a constable arrests without warrant, and recommended that this should be included in the new arrest powers which he proposes in substitution for section 1(1) and section 13(1).

The Army also has powers of arrest. Section 14 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act allows soldiers to arrest anyone suspected of committing any offence. Such persons may be held for four hours. This was introduced at a time of no-go areas, when the police could not enter certain vicinities in certain districts. The four hours were intended to give the Army time to identify the person and to transfer him or her to the Royal Ulster Constabulary. There never was an intention to confer a power of interrogation upon the Army, but this power has exercised the mind of Sir George Baker, who has had to consider whether it contravenes article 5 of the European convention and article 9 of the United Nations Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

The criticisms of these powers are legion. There is the criticism of reasonable suspicion; that the concept of any offence is too wide; that the arrested person should be told in plain language of the offence to which his arrest refers; that few arrested persons are actually handed over to the RUC; that four hours is too long; that the power is arbitrary and is used for harassment, intelligence gathering, screening and indiscriminate house searches; that the questioning should be limited; and that the power of the Army should be to arrest only when under police control.

Earlier the Secretary of State said that the support of the Army had been unstinting and unswerving. Sir George points out in his report that the supporting role of the Army is to deal with a situation which has been described as "the worst protracted, the most lethal, and the most destructive, of any experienced by any Western European country since 1945".
However, he takes on board the criticism that this section does not accord with article 5 of the European convention and, therefore, recommends the addition of the word "reasonable" as an adjunct to suspicion. The Standing Commission on Human Rights also believes the wording of section 14 is too wide. Sir George therefore recommends a change of the wording to the arrest of a person by a member of the armed forces "whom he reasonably suspects of being a terrorist or a member of a proscribed organisation or of committing, having committed or being about to commit any act of terrorism or violence or of rioting or an offence involving the use of an explosive, explosive substance or firearm, or of making or possessing a petrol bomb."

The common law of the land for England and Wales—I believe that this writ should run in Northern Ireland—is that a person is prima facie entitled to his freedom and is required to submit to restraints on that freedom only if he knows in substance the reason why it is claimed that the restraint should be imposed.

The word "alienation" appears in the Baker report. It is frequently used by other commentators. There are those in Northern Ireland who argue that it is a much abused word. Some say that alienation does not exist. Indeed, the Prime Minister, at her famous press conference following the last Anglo-Irish summit, declared that "somehow this word alienation has crept into the vocabulary."
She added:
"I don't think it's a good one."

Yet for many who perceive the moving Irish scene, a sense of alienation does run deep among the 38 per cent. minority population. There is alienation of one culture from another, one ethos from another. There is alienation through discrimination which has nothing to do with colour but a great deal to do with creed. There is alienation through unemployment and a deteriorating social and economic condition caused by, among other things, Thatcherite policies throughout Great Britain.

The Opposition would welcome any step—however small, however hesitant—that will seek to remove that sense of alienation and bring the minority and the majority communities in Northern Ireland together. That is why we endorse the positive recommendations, as opposed to the negative ones, in the Baker report.

There are those who take the view—and the National Council for Civil Liberties is one such organisation—that the emergency powers exacerbate the alienation of a significant minority of the population and thus acts as an obstacle to political progress. Political progress, of course, would make dispensable both this report and the emergency provisions themselves. Political progress would lift a great weight from those who live in Northern Ireland.

But it was Lloyd George who said many years ago, in 1938:

"I believe that peace must first be found in the minds and the hearts of men."

Sir George has anxiously touched upon that aspect of the fundamental conflicts that are extant in Northern Ireland.

Essentially, the emergency provisions Act encompasses a complex tale of human rights, civil liberties and safety in Northern Ireland, and seeks to strike a balance between emergency powers to combat sustained terrorism and the rights of the individual. The question that Sir George has asked himself is whether the provisions of the Act strike the right balance between the need on the one hand to maintain as fully as possible the liberties of the individual, and on the other to provide the security forces and the courts with adequate powers to protect the public from current and foreseeable crime. As other hon. Members have said, I also regret that Sir George has passed away since the report was published. He was known for the quip that everything in life is foreseeable, as long as one has the foresight. That is certainly true of events in Northern Ireland.

One thing that is foreseeable is continued terrorist violence. The Secretary of State was right to tell the House that, while there may be a limitation of the violence that we know, its recrudescence is not, and can never be anticipated as being, far round the corner.

I should not seek to anticipate the following debate. But if violence does remain with us, we must ask ourselves whether the right balance is being struck between attempts to curb violence and bring the guilty to justice and the civil rights and liberties of all those who live in Northern Ireland. We therefore reach a confluence between those who have a heightened perception, and rightly so, of the need to develop civil rights and the urgent need and desire of the security forces to limit terrorist crime and violence. In this sharpened controversy, one thing stands out as a rock in the argument. It is that over the years—and my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) set a figure of 2,500—the most valuable civil right of all in Northern Ireland, the right to live, has been taken away.

As Sir George Baker said, if that right is denied, no other right is of any use. The right is recognised and protected by article 2(1) of the European convention. He further said of it:

"Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law."

In his report he extends that to

"a right to life and to live free from the fear of terrorist violence, coercion and threats, and from injury loss or damage by their criminal activities."

Many centuries ago the famous poet John Donne put it better than any barrister or hon. Member could, when he said:

"Any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in Mankind".

All hon. Members see with great sadness the death, injury or maiming of anyone by violence in Northern Ireland. Therefore, we shall all have a deep and lasting interest in the affairs of Northern Ireland, until the violence ceases and the problems are resolved.

The House will not be surprised to learn that the most emotive issue, possibly because it is the most obnoxious, relates to the evidence of an accomplice who is a supergrass, or a copper's nark as he was known in former times. There is nothing new about the concept of immunity from prosecution on the turning of Queen's evidence. It sent Oscar Wilde to prison for two years in 1898.

There is something obnoxious about a supergrass who is sometimes paid £10 a week and sometimes £70 a week to provide evidence against fellow citizens, who cannot get right the dates of birth of his children in court, who, if press reports are to be believed, gambled heavily at the state expense, and who, when finding himself in a court of law as a witness, saw his evidence cast aside by a Lord Chief Justice as "unworthy of belief".

Sir George Baker pointed out that in the two years to December 1983 information provided by criminals who had elected to give evidence had led to about 1,000 charges in respect of serious offences, of which about 20 per cent. were murder. He also pointed out why people are concerned about the supergrass strategy. Many hon. Members have made observations about it tonight.

Sir George Baker's comments are as pertinent as those of anyone. He said that there was something morally or socially wrong about an informer, that an informer can and probably does abuse the system, that there is no corroboration, that the innocent might be convicted, that there is a danger that to obtain immunity the supergrass will say what the police want to hear, that it might be a propaganda weapon for terrorists, and that it lowers the law in the community's esteem.

Baker appended his own refutation of the various criticsms. He pointed out that there had always been a possibility of abuse. He deemed it advisable to get corroboration if possible. In the case of those who are innocent and who may be proven guilty, he pointed out that not a single concrete case had been presented to him, which shows how difficult it is to prove a double negative. In the case of the propaganda weapon for terrorists, he points out that it is only natural for them to try to persuade as many people as possible that it is unfair, thus neutralising the grave danger in which they find themselves.

None of those appended comments refutes the criticism that has been cited. It is especially significant that there is no appended comment against the two major arguments against the use of supergrasses—the danger that the accomplices will say what the police want to hear, and that the practice lowers the public's esteem for the law.

If there are to be draconian powers and practices, and if they are to be maintained in force, it is essential that the authoities present clearly stated arguments and evidence that these powers are necessary.

I have participated in my first major debate on a major subject. The House has listened with rapt attention to the various points made during the debate. We are discussing the powers in Northern Ireland through which the security forces operate. They touch on justice, civil rights and human liberties, which are the bases of our society.

At a press conference in November the Prime Minister took the proposals of the All Ireland Forum and, on three separate occasions, said "Out", "Out", "Out". The Opposition believe that it is time that the supergrasses were out. It will soon be time for the Diplock courts to be out, and the concept of arrest without reason should also be out. It will be the greatest epitaph to Sir George that if the positive recommendations in his report are accepted by the Government they will pave the way towards some reconciliation in Northern Ireland and provide a step forward, however hesitant or small. That is why I commend the Opposition amendment to the House.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): We have had many interesting and constructive speeches in the debate, some more vigorous than others. Some hon. Members strayed widely into general security policy, while others concentrated on aspects of Sir George Baker's report and made suggestions for amending the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978, which we shall be renewing after this debate.

I emphasise the Government's concern to protect life and civil liberties in Northern Ireland to the fullest possible extent. As the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) said, the first and central right is the right to life, which must be protected as the first priority. The Emergency Provisions Act remains an essential element in the drive to eradicate terrorism — I emphasise the word "eradicate"—from life in Northern Ireland and to bring about a return to normality in the Province. Of course, it has been a focus of concern on human rights grounds, and I shall deal with that later.

I assure those right hon. and hon. Members who spoke in the debate that, although I may not manage to reply to each point now, I shall read carefully all the speeches and consider all the points when we come to frame our legislative proposals in due course.

Sir George Baker's review of the Act was the first thorough independent examination of its operation since 1975. I pay tribute to Sir George Baker for the way in which he undertook his task. His wit and wisdom, patience and courtesy, and his insight into the problems of the Province struck everyone who had dealings with him during his review. Sad though we are that he has died since he completed the report, it will be seen as a fitting climax to a life of great distinction.

During the debate, the Government have been engaged in a listening exercise to prepare ourselves for the legislation that we shall introduce in due course. Three fundamental questions must be answered at the outset. Do we need the powers? Have we been dilatory in introducing proposals in response to the Baker report? Was Sir George Baker circumscribed by his terms of reference?

I believe that we need the powers and that they will remain for the foreseeable future, although of course they will be amended. However, their essence will remain a major part of the battle against terrorism. We must accept that the position in Northern Ireland is different from that on this side of the water. That was summed up graphically in the comment of the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), who said that he would not be a juryman in any circumstances in Northern Ireland. Sir George Baker drew attention to a relevant and important quotation from Lord Lowry's dictum at the end of the McGrady case, when he mentioned the pressures that were put on the courts by those who come before them. He said:

> "This war is being waged by organisations which style themselves armies and observe military procedures, but it has not invaded, and will not be allowed to invade, the courts. The rule of law has prevailed and will continue to prevail there. We will accept but one standard of proof in criminal cases, namely, proof beyond reasonable doubt."

That gives a flavour of the pressures under which the courts have been, and a flavour, too, of the determination of the courts and the judges in Northern Ireland to ensure that the courts are not corrupted and invaded by the activities of those who seek to subvert their position in society. We shall need these powers. We shall be looking carefully at amendments that may need to be made to them, but for the foreseeable future they will be an essential feature of life in the Province.

Having said that, the Government cannot legitimately be accused of being dilatory in their response to Sir George Baker's report. Bearing in mind how these matters touch on the delicate balance between the need to preserve security and ensure that guilty men are arrested, convicted and put behind bars, and the need to preserve the civil liberties of the vast majority of the people in the Province, it was right carefully to study Sir George Baker's report and to listen to the views of the House of Commons, as we have done today, and then, in due course, to prepare our legislative proposals. Every minute or week spent on making sure that we get those recommendations and the balance right will have been well spent.

Mr. Maginnis: Has the hon. Gentleman had consultations with other parties outside the House in the intervening period? Will he explain a little more clearly the reasons for the delay in considering the Baker report?

Mr. Scott: A number of other organisations have made their views on the operation of the emergency provisions clear to us, not least the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights in Northern Ireland. They have all made representations in writing, or in other ways, and we shall bear them in mind, as well as listening to the views of the House.

Whatever his terms of reference, Sir George Baker was not circumscribed by them, and he was prepared to make a judgment as to whether emergency powers were important and essential in Northern Ireland. In paragraph 468, he said:

> "It will be a long, hard road. It is utterly unrealistic to believe, as some do, that the main powers given by the Act can be repealed tomorrow, or in the near future."

Whatever the terms of reference may have said about the continuing need for emergency powers, he reinforced that in the strongest language possible.

Some detailed points have been raised. I reassure the hon. Member for Middlesbrough and others who raised the question of the concept of reasonableness in terms of suspicion. This is the one part of the report about which the Government are convinced, and we shall be moving to meet that recommendation.

The hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) raised a point that is tangential to the provisions of the Act, but to which I shall refer. I reiterate what my right hon. Friend said when he opened the debate. There is not, and never has been, a policy of summary execution or shoot to kill in Northern Ireland. The law provides that any person may use only such force as is reasonable, and both the police and the Army in Northern Ireland have to operate within the law. They have specific instructions as to how they should behave. If they breach those instructions, their members are liable to prosecution through the courts like any other member of the community.

The hon. Member for Foyle raised a particular case about the deaths of Fleming and Doherty, and queried why a statement was not being made. This case is being investigated by the police, and a full report will then be sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions. It cannot be right for a Minister to make a statement about such cases that could prejudice the outcome of investigations. At the moment, it is much better to allow the process of investigation, with papers going to the DPP for his decision, to be carried through.

Mr. Hume: Could not the statement that the hon. Gentleman has just made have been made some time ago?

Mr. Scott: I have seen this opportunity to make this statement. I should have thought that most people understood, in the circumstances of Northern Ireland, how one could easily prejudice these cases by Ministers or others leaping in to make statements. I have said it now, and it is on the record, so I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts that.

Mr. Archer: Are the Government sympathetic to the three proposals of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights — making public the yellow card instructions and the reports of investigations after they have been investigated, and a general review of the law on the subject?

Mr. Scott: I should like to consider them with the suggestions that have been made during the debate. In due course, I shall make clear the Government's view on those matters. This is not the appropriate time for the Government to state a firm position, although in odd cases we have made up our minds.

The evidence of former accomplices has been a theme running through this debate. It is right that the House should take careful note of the worries expressed in the Northern Ireland community about some aspects of the so-called supergrass system. Obviously, we all share some of those concerns. As has been said in the debate, there is nothing new in the concept of accomplice evidence or its use in Northern Ireland, anywhere else in the United Kingdom or, indeed, in the Western world. It would be wrong for the police to turn away evidence that might bring violent criminals to justice. There are people walking the streets of Northern Ireland today who are alive or unmaimed because dangerous men have been put away through the evidence provided by informers.

The responsibility for assessing the worth of that evidence must rest upon the courts. It is not for Ministers to judge whether their evidence is worthy and should stand up, nor is it for Ministers to make moral judgments about the character of informers who come forward with that evidence. The recent acquittals of defendants accused on the evidence of Raymond Gilmour and the comments of the Lord Chief Justice underline the objectivity of safeguards provided by the Northern Ireland judicial system. It does not cast doubt on the principle of the use of accomplice evidence. In finding the defendants not guilty, the Lord Chief Justice said:

> "An accomplice or informer, or someone who is both, can tell the truth and can command acceptance as a witness of the truth, but he needs to be impressive to overcome the handicaps inevitably associated with his position."

The courts have to deal with that aspect. They must judge each case on its merits and come to a view on those who come forward to give the evidence. It certainly cannot be right for Ministers to step in and say that in no circumstances should such evidence be brought before the courts.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) raised the issue of certifying out more offences from the scheduled list. In principle, I endorse what Sir George Baker said about widening the Attorney-General's discretion to certify particular cases out of the scheduled mode of trial. We shall study carefully the list of offences that he suggested should be brought within the Attorney-General's discretion. For some of those offences — most notably robbery and aggravated burglary — it would be difficult for the Attorney-General to take a rationally based decision. Nevertheless, it will be possible to take a considerable stride in the direction put forward by Sir George Baker, and in due course we shall let the House know what we have in mind.

I do not believe that there is any evidence to suggest that the criteria for bail are interpreted by the courts in Northern Ireland less liberally than they are on this side of the water. Sir George Baker said that 42·52 per cent. of applications for bail under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act were granted between 1978 and 1982. I do not believe that there is any real evidence to suggest that judges in Northern Ireland are not continuing to use their good sense over bail and, therefore, there is no need to extend the Bail Act 1976 to the Province.

One of the other major worries expressed—I and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State share that worry —concerned the delay between arrest and people being brought to trial. That would worry anyone. Hon. Members have made the point that justice delayed is justice denied, and there is a considerable element of truth in that. The Director of Public Prosecutions, the courts and the police continue to cope well, bearing in mind all the circumstances, in processing the large number of cases involving serious offences with which they must deal.

The average time between arrest and trial fluctuates according to a variety of factors, not least the rate of arrest. In the first six months of this year, the average waiting time from first remand for terrorist type offences was down to 42 weeks from 46 weeks in 1983, although the figure of 46 had showed an increase from the years immediately before.

We shall continue to monitor the position and to ensure the fullest co-operation between the police, the Director of Public Prosecutions and the courts to make the process as rapid as possible. As the House has already been told, it has been agreed that an extra county court judge should be appointed. He has not yet been selected and is not in post, but we hope that that appointment will relieve some of the pressures on the court.

One of the major causes of delay is the fact that the defence is allowed to wait until counsel of its choice is available. It would be difficult to take that right away, but it adds to the delays which frequently occur between arrest

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 (Continuance)

10.12 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I beg to move,

That the draft Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 (Continuance) (No. 2) Order 1984, which was laid before this House on 27th November, be approved.

We have just concluded a full debate on the issues raised by the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 and Sir George Baker's review of its operation. As I have said before, the Government accept that there is a good case for amending the Act, but we have not yet reached final decisions on the shape of our legislative proposals. We shall now proceed to take those decisions in the light of the comments made by Members during the course of the earlier debate and in the light of representations made by the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights and other interested parties in Northern Ireland.

In the meantime, for the reasons that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have given, we consider it necessary to ask the House to authorise the continuation of the Act. In so doing, I am conscious that Sir George Baker, having considered all the evidence put to him in the course of his review, accepted that there was a continuing need for emergency powers in Northern Ireland. The Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights and other observers have reached the same conclusion. The Government believe that there is some scope for amending those powers, but we are convinced that the principal measures provided for in the Act will remain necessary until there is a more marked improvement in the security situation.

I remind the House briefly of what those powers are. The Act provides for trial by a judge sitting alone for persons accused of specific scheduled offences. It contains additional arrest and detention powers for the police and the Army, together with certain exceptional powers of search and seizure. The Act also provides for the proscription of certain criminal organisations. The Act does not, of course, alter the central principles of British justice as they apply in the Province. The onus remains on the prosecution to prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Accused persons have the opportunity to take legal advice of their choice and to be represented by their own lawyers in open court and there remains the right of appeal against conviction or sentence on matters both of law and of fact.

There may be some scope for improving the provisions of the Act. The Government are now proceeding to forge their leagislative proposals. The views expressed in the earlier debate this evening will be helpful and will be taken fully into account alongside other views. Meanwhile, I have no hesitation in saying that in the interests of security, and indeed justice, in Northern Ireland it is essential that the powers in the 1978 Act should remain in force. I therefore commend the order to the House.

10.15 pm

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): I try not to operate on the principle of the bellman—"If I say it three times it is true." I attempted earlier today to set out the Opposition's position on the administration and performance of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978. My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) supplemented that from the Front Bench, and some of my other hon. Friends also spoke in the debate. Nothing would be gained by repeating what has already been said.

Those who introduced the original Act envisaged it as temporary legislation to deal with an emergency. They therefore provided that the main provisions of the Act should be reviewed by the House every six months. That provision appears in section 33. My right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) said that it was a wise provision, and I respectfully agree with him. It was intended that the House should at six-monthly intervals apply its judgment to the question whether all or any of the provisions of the Act were necessary at the time and whether some of them might be doing more harm than good.

It was a Conservative Government who included that provision because, as the then Attorney-General said, the measure was draconian. The Opposition have tried faithfully to discharge their responsibility, twice a year, of applying their mind to these serious problems.

There may be a case for a single Select Committee or a monitoring body to keep both the Emergency Provisions Act and the Prevention of Terrorism Act under constant review and to report to the House on each Act at half-yearly or at least annual intervals. Today, I merely make that suggestion. I shall develop it on some other occasion.

Threats to the life and health of the people of Northern Ireland must be taken seriously. So must threats to their liberty. It is clear from the debate that has just taken place that there are a number of amendments that, like Sir George Baker, we should like to see made to the Act. In some respects, we go further. There are a number of provisions in the legislation of which we doubt the wisdom, and some that we positively believe to be counter-productive. They make no contribution to protecting people from violence. On the contrary, they make the task of the police and the security forces more difficult. If the Government take the Act away and give it serious consideration, together with Sir George Baker's report and what has been said this evening, and then return to the House with appropriate proposals, we will of course reconsider the situation. Tonight, unless we can be persuaded otherwise, we propose to vote against the continuance order.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): First, I must say how much I regret the fact that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary did not take this opportunity to make a statement about strip searches. I have been promised an answer on that subject for a considerable time, and have suggested a proposal that might take some of the heat out of the situation. The matter is important to those who are in prison, but I do not intend to talk about it now. I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) wishes to speak on the matter.

I shall have to prune the speech that I would have made had I been called earlier. If I do not take up all the points to which hon. Members not of my party but sitting on neighbouring Benches thought that I might have responded, I am prompted not by a lack of desire to do so, but simply by considerations of time.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): I forgive the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. McNamara: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for saying that he forgives me. From his own account, he has much of which to be forgiven. It being Christmas, I wish the hon. Gentleman a merry Christmas and a happy new year and hope that he will soon find himself within a united Ireland.

Like several other hon. Members, I was invited to give evidence to Sir George Baker. Regrettably, I had to decline. I am even more sorry about that now, having heard the tributes that have been paid to him and having heard what a charming man he was. The House should know why I declined. I did not think that I could give adequate evidence, based on the flimsy replies that I have received from the Northern Ireland Office, under both the Labour Government and the present Government. I have continuously asked how many people who have been convicted of scheduled offences have been convicted on the basis of their uncorroborated confessions. An answer to that question has repeatedly been denied to me for a variety of reasons. If Ministers are not prepared to let me know how the legislation is working, it is difficult for me to make any valid comments on its operation. Therefore, lacking such information, I decided not to accept Sir George Baker's invitation. The Secretary of State of the day was aware of my reasons because we were in correspondence.

The Under-Secretary of State opened the debate blandly, but he said that we are going back to no jury trials, the acceptance of uncorroborated evidence and confessions, a bending of the rules with regard to confessions and a bending of the rules with regard to evidence. People who are convicted under those circumstances are treated specially within the United Kingdom. I am not arguing that they should have special category status—I never have — but they are special and that should be recognised. Many of the political problems that have arisen in the House derive from our failure to accept that people who are convicted under this legislation are treated differently. Some political problems, such as the rise of the Provisional Sinn Fein could have been avoided if we had accepted that.

How are we to measure the success of the legislation in regard to its reducing violence and how are we to measure its effect on political opinion? The Secretary of State wisely said today that the number of violent incidents is falling, we welcome that, but he would not draw any conclusions from that because previous Secretaries of State have latched on to a series of figures and been proved sadly wrong.

We must examine the number of fatalities which are associated with the incidents. Such examination reveals that, although there has been a reduction in the number of incidents, there has been no corresponding reduction in the number of fatalities. The conclusion to be drawn from that is that, unfortunately, the terrorist is becoming more efficient. We must therefore examine associated problems and the political implications of violence. If the terrorist is able to maintain a given level of instability in the Six Counties, he is succeeding. If he is succeeding, that has repercussions on the effect of the Government's policy and our attitude to the legislation. If the object of the legislation is to reduce the number of fatalities and to restore normalcy, it is not succeeding.

We must also realise that problems have arisen as a result of the Ulsterisation policy introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees). I understand why my right hon. Friend is not present, but I told him that I would be raising this matter. I do not want anyone to think that I am doing it behind his back.

The policy of Ulsterisation has been a failure in the Six Counties. It puts the onus on the Loyalist community to fight terrorism, with a reduced British Army commitment. Because Catholics comprise only about 2 per cent. of the membership of the UDR and the RUC, most security force casualties are Loyalists or Protestants. Therefore, many people over here say, "That is the Irish fighting among themselves. Leave them to it." They do not think about the individuals or the circumstances in which they are killed. In addition, because most security force casualties are Loyalists and not British soldiers, people over here think that those Loyalists are expendable if their deaths will keep the lid on the cauldron. That is the wrong attitude, but it is the result of the Ulsterisation policy.

The Ulsterisation policy also increases sectarianism. At one time, most of the people killed in Northern Ireland were Catholics or nationalists. Now the number of Protestant deaths is increasing. Many of those victims are not civilians, but members of the security force. However, when a funeral takes place in Northern Ireland people do not ask whether the dead man was a civilian or a member of the UDR or RUC. They say, "He was a Protestant."

Ulsterisation must be looked at again. It leads to sectarianism and to some of the problems that we are discussing. That must be understood.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): The hon. Gentleman seems to be implying that there is reduced Roman Catholic participation in the police service in Northern Ireland. Is he aware that there has been a considerable increase in the number of Roman Catholic members of the RUC over the past two years and that, therefore, his argument falls flat?

Mr. McNamara: The number may have been increasing within the RUC, but not within the UDR. Within the whole range of security forces, the figure is 2 to 3 per cent. Therefore, my argument stands.

Mr. Ken Maginnis Why are the Catholics not in the UDR?

Mr. McNamara: I do not wish to engage in verbal fisticuffs with the hon. Gentleman, because I have wished him a merry Christmas and a happy new year. but the answer to his question is that many members of the UDR were originally recruited from the B specials. That is why the Catholics would not join.

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): The hon. Gentleman's party set them up.

Mr. McNamara: The hon. Gentleman does not have to tell me that. He need only read the speeches that I made at the time. I have spent most of my time on this Bench because of our attitude on this issue.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McNamara: I do not mind giving way at Christmas time, but the hon. Gentleman's intervention will keep other hon. Members out of the debate.

Mr. Ross: Does the hon. Gentleman recall that a considerable number of Roman Catholics joined the UDR on the west bank of the Foyle, in Londonderry? If so, I should tell him that, as far as I know, none now joins from that area due to the pressure put on people by their co-religionists, the IRA and similar terrorist organisations in that area.

Mr. McNamara: One would need to quantify "a considerable number". However, I do not want to enter into that argument, because it does not help. I thought that my case was helping the hon. Gentleman's position. I was trying to show some sympathy towards it. The hon. Member for Londonderry East (Mr. Ross) did not seem to realise that that was what my speech was about.

One interesting statistic is that 50,000 people in Northern Ireland have been arrested or detained under the emergency provisions or prevention of terrorism legislation without being charged. The overwhelming majority of them come from the Catholic or nationalist community. If that happened in the United Kingdom as a whole, it would mean 900,000 people, and if it happened in the United States it would mean 6·8 million people. Furthermore, if one assumes that each of those people has two relatives who are appalled at their arrest and detention, and at their questioning for information-gathering purposes, and so decide to vote for the Provisional Sinn Fein, we get the total vote that the Provisional Sinn Fein obtained last time. One man detained without trial or charge, and two friends or relatives, and that is the figure that one gets.

Incidentally, it is not that the SDLP vote has fallen, but rather that the Provisional Sinn Fein has benefited from the previous abstentionist vote. The way in which the Act and order have been kept going, and the way in which they fail to take on board the important political implications, has given credibility to the Provisional Sinn Fein. Perhaps the Government are willing to pay that price, but equally a political price has to be paid for such legislation. I think that we saw that in the election in Belfast, West. I think —but I hope that it will not be so—that that may be reflected in next year's local government elections.

The Government must bear a heavy responsibility when it comes to their attitude on these issues. Much of the threat in the Six Counties comes from that failure to realise that people convicted under this legislation are different from other convicted criminals in the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland. That is what led to the hunger strikes, and to the rise of Provisional Sinn Fein. Much of the blame can be laid at the door of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act. The Government, and those who are prepared to maintain it, have much to answer for.

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): Of course, my right hon. and hon. Friends will support renewal of this legislation. But on their behalf I should point out that we are extremely disappointed that the Government have not used the power of proscription contained in the Act to re-proscribe Sinn Fein. I make no apology for saying that, because I have been saying it over the years.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) warned us of the dangers of the Ulsterisation policy, without putting forward an alternative. I assure him that when there were 15,000 or 17,000 young regular soldiers from the mainland in Northern Ireland, many of them aged 18 to 21, they often inadvertently caused far more alienation and far more problems in the community. That was due to their lack of experience and knowledge. The people of Northern Ireland have never shied away from spilling their blood if necessary in defence of their position within the United Kingdom. If they have to do so now—and while it is regrettable and no one would wish it to happen—they will continue to do so. In spite of the number of members of the security forces who have been murdered, thank God there has been no shortage of people ready to step in to take their place.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): How would the proscription of the Provisional Sinn Fein undermine and destroy terrorism? Would not that give the terrorists a martyr status and influence matters in the United States and elsewhere? That may be precisely what they want.

Mr. McCusker: I shall come back to that issue, but I wish to refer to several other matters first. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) talked earlier about the supergrass system and seemed to suggest that the potential abuses within the system were special to Northern Ireland.

I shall read to him an article from a London newspaper on 16 September last year, which was headed:

"Supergrass 'shops' black gangster".

It stated:

"A leading member of a gang of West Indian and armed robbers was jailed for 15 years at the Old Bailey yesterday after being 'shopped' by the country's first black supergrass.

He was arrested on the information of fellow gang-member Errol Walker, 27, who gave evidence against him.

Walker turned supergrass in April last year, and is currently serving a lenient five-year sentence for 36 robberies. He named all his criminal associates, after telling detectives 'I want to clear the slate and start a new life'.

Mr. Godfrey Carey, prosecuting, said Walker gave Scotland Yard a mass of information which enabled detectives to smash the gang. Various members carried out raids all over West London, using shotguns, machettes, knives and coshes. Their haul totalled £150,000."

Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that a black supergrass is any more likely to be honest and that his word should be accepted — gangster though he is — than a white supergrass in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Frankly, the man's colour does not bother me, although it sounds as if the hon. Gentleman is bothered about his colour — [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I shall answer the question if the public school hooligans will be quiet.

Earlier I referred to the fact that a perjured murderer was responsible for the appearance of 35 people in court. The judge knew that the man was a liar, a killer and rogue. All his actions suggested that he had no integrity whatever, and the judge stripped him clean as a liar. Does the hon. Gentleman really think that the judge had any choice, except to give way? Instead of allowing separate trials, the judge was forced to set all those people free because the supergrass system was an utter failure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): Order. I appeal to the House. This is a short debate and I am anxious to call those hon. Members who were not called in the previous debate, but if there are long interventions, hon. Members will be disappointed.

Mr. McCusker: I am just as revolted as the hon. Gentleman by what he has related. In fact, the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland vindicated the system by exposing that individual. All I am saying is that the system of supergrasses is not confined to Northern Ireland, and that the evidence of criminals is accepted elsewhere.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Everyone knows that.

Mr. McCusker: One would not have known it in view of what was said earlier. Mr. Gilmour only became all the things we have heard described once he decided to turn Queen's evidence. Prior to that, he was a close friend of these people — a confidant. He joined them in their murdering activities. He only became what the hon. Gentleman said when he decided to tell the truth——

Mr. Flannery: In his middle teens.

Mr. McCusker: It has been suggested that the Government are pursuing a shoot-to-kill policy in Northern Ireland. That policy is being pursued not by the Government but by Gerry Adams, Martin McGuinnis and their associates. They pursue that policy with a great deal of efficiency.

Mr. Flannery: The Shankill butchers.

Mr. McCusker: Is it any wonder that when the security forces are confronted with people committed to a shoot-to-kill policy they do not stand in front of a car, hold up their hands and ask them to stop—they would probably be run down and gunned down. If the security forces have to make split second decisions to defend themselves that result in the deaths of armed terrorists engaged in murdering an innocent person, it ill behoves anyone in this House to complain.

The other comment about the trial was that people had lost their civil liberties because they had been in prison for too long. I agree that that is terrible—but prison doors open; graves do not open. Cemetery doors in Northern Ireland open only to allow in the innocent victims of murder. To some degree the people who walk out of the Crumlin road have an advantage that hundreds of policemen and police reservists, those who serve in the army and innocent women and children — including those who died in Brighton — do not have. While I regret that loss of freedom, prison gates open and those people will eventually gain their freedom and enjoy life again.

Mr. Winnick: The Opposition are opposed to the terrorists. We loathe terrorism.

Mr. McCusker: If the hon. Gentleman had been here earlier today, he would have heard hon. Member after hon. Member say that.

I want to address myself briefly to what the hon. Gentleman mentioned earlier—the proscription of Sinn Fein. I realise that my hand would have been a great deal stronger if I had been able to cite Sir George Baker in support of the proscription of Sinn Fein. He dealt at length with its relationship with the IRA and how the twin-headed approach of that evil organisation was able to exploit opportunities either by direct terrorist violence or through the political opportunities offered, for example, by the Labour party conferences or by being invited to the House.

Although Baker faced that and put on record a number of important pieces of information about that relationship, he neatly side stepped making a decision. In paragraph 423 he said—and it has already been described as a most remarkable statement:

"this question is now squarely one for political decision . . . and because other measures are also being considered by both British and Irish Governments I do not think I am qualified to . . . make any recommendation on the submissions to proscribe Sinn Fein.

We could not fail to notice the importance that the report attached to the relationship and Baker's fascination with its despicable publication The Republican News, which described in detail for him and the rest of us the murder of Robert Bradford, Member of Parliament, the so-called execution of Edgar Graham, a Member of the Northern Ireland Assembly, and the killing of what it described as the legitimate target of Charles Armstrong, the chairman of Armagh district council.

In paragraph 39, Baker described his initial reaction to the publication as "surprised annoyance. Why was anyone allowed to publish such a statement of intent? Why was the publication not banned and the author prosecuted? Gradually I came to realise that for me An Phoblacht . . . should be compulsory reading. It has given me insight into the thinking and intentions . . . of some Republicans and of the inextricable links between Sinn Fein and the PIRA."

There is no doubt that for him and us The Republican News has served a useful purpose. However, it exists not for the benefit of us, judges or academics, but to serve the cause of republican terrorism—to popularise its campaign, to justify its foul murders, to indoctrinate its followers and to give an air of respectability to those who some hon. Members think are politicians. It blackens and besmirches all who challenge it, including the Government, unionists, the Roman Catholic church, the SDLP, and the Government of the Irish Republic. Sir George Baker's initial reaction to The Republican News was right: it should be banned and its authors should be prosecuted.

Having established the inextricable links between Sinn Fein and the PIRA, further research led Sir George Baker to make the following observation in paragraph 46:

"There cannot be any reason or indeed possible doubt that Sinn Fein is not only a political wing but also a complete accomplice and partner of the PIRA."

The IRA is not seen as a wing of Sinn Fein, but Sinn Fein as a wing of the IRA. As the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) pointed out, it is clear within the Republican movement that the IRA is the predominant force and that Sinn Fein is its poodle. It is clear that Sinn Fein is under the control and domination of the IRA, which is why it must annually proclaim its support for the armed struggle.

How does that square with the reason given at the time of de-proscription by the then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland? On 4 April 1974 he stated:

"In my view there are signs that on both extreme wings there are people who, although at one time committed to violence, would now like to find a way back to political activity. It is right to encourage this as much as possible."—[Official Report, 4 April 1974; Vol. 871, c. 1476.]

He did not say that the people who had committed violence were moving towards peaceful means to pursue their political objectives, but it is reasonable to assume that he intended that. He could not have intended to de-proscribe and, therefore, to legalise Sinn Fein to enable it to continue supporting violence and to use its political muscle to reinforce what it calls the armed struggle.

There is nothing original or unusual about me or the Government being concerned about that relationship. We must believe Sinn Fein. Morrison has told us how Sinn

[Mr. McCusker]

Fein intends to promote its objective. It has said clearly that it does not believe that terrorism or the ballot box can achieve its form of a united Ireland. It believes that by the use of both terrorism and politics it will gain power in Ireland. We must believe that. If we are to deal with that strategy, we cannot turn from the threat which Sinn Fein poses to the democratic process.

The right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) has changed his view slightly since 1974. He no longer justifies his action on the basis that he was encouraging movement away from violence. That is clear from his answer on 29 November, which is published in the Official Report, column 1075. He now seems to believe that any organisation with a political view should be allowed to pursue it, so long as it does not act in a blatantly paramilitary manner. That was not his view in 1974, but it seems to have been his view in 1984. I am sorry that he is not here, because I should have wished to hear him expound on this. If that is his view now, it contradicts the action that he took after 1974. He proscribed the Ulster Volunteer Force in 1975, which had, and, as far as I know, still has, a political viewpoint. Does the right hon. Gentleman now believe that no organisation, no matter what it supports, should be proscribed, and that action should be taken only against the members of those organisations who engage in criminal activity?

Sir George Baker expressed clearly the view of the majority in Northern Ireland when he said:

"Proscription is an expression of the outrage of the ordinary citizen, who comprise the overwhelming majority, at the barbarous acts of these organisations, and at the revolting glee with which they claim responsibility", for their acts. That sums up the case for proscription. It is necessary because it will assist in the battle against terrorism generally. Sinn Fein should not be allowed to masquerade as almost a legitimate political party like the others. What offends most people in Northern Ireland is that it is not a political party. The difference is that, if it disagrees with someone, it murders him. It murders people committed to the democratic process who have been returned through the ballot box to public life not only in Northern Ireland but in Great Britain.

Sinn Fein should not be allowed access to Government and statutory bodies. It should not be allowed access to the media. It should be prevented from using modern technology to churn out obnoxious claims of victories when it murders innocent men, women and children. The logic of the Secretary of State's and his Minister's position is that that organisation should be outlawed. Why should the Secretary of State and his Ministers refuse to see the representatives of that body if they consider it to be an ordinary political party? They clearly do not. Yet they continue to allow Sinn Fein to pursue its stated objective of exploiting the ballot box to its own end.

Sir George Baker, having side stepped the issue of proscription, tried to help the Government by putting forward other ways of dealing with Sinn Fein or similar organisations. He suggested that no political grouping should be allowed to contest elections unless it stated clearly that it was opposed to the use of violence. If the Government will not consider proscription, will they at least consider that?

Sir George Baker also said—this should be borne in mind by the supporters of Sinn Fein in the House—that,

"The utterances of Mr. Adams leave no doubt in my mind that the links are strong enough to prove that a killer is an agent of Sinn Fein also."

On that basis, he tried to encourage the victims of terrorism to take civil action against Sinn Fein and try to get damages, in the belief that if we can attack its bankroll, we might undermine its capabilities. I have resources to pay for anyone who might wish to take civil action against Sinn Fein. I appealed publicly to anyone in Northern Ireland who believed himself to have suffered—there are tens of thousands—at the hands of Sinn Fein, to come forward so that we could test what Sir George Baker said. My legal adviser told me that no one would come forward. He was right. They know that if they come forward, they are more likely to get a bullet or a bomb long before their cases came to court. Therefore, we have not been able to test whether civil action can be taken against Sinn Fein.

The right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South suggested another idea, which came to him while he was speaking and which he did not have time to think through. It related to whether the Government could get their hands on the finances of the Provisional Sinn Fein.

If a determined Government can get their hands on NUM finances, why cannot they apply the same ingenuity to getting hold of Provisional Sinn Fein resources? I do not think that they can get their hands on Sinn Fein resources while it is a legitimate political party. However, it cannot be beyond the wit of man to do something—to stop them in their tracks. What we can not do is turn a blind eye to what that organisation has told us. It says, "We shall achieve our political objectives by exploiting democracy when we can, and when we can't we'll use the bomb and the bullet." If that is the challenge, it is time that the Government picked up the gauntlet.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): This evening we have seen a clear demonstration of a split Labour party on the subject of Northern Ireland. We have heard almost universal condemnation of violence and appropriate expressions of grief and sensitivity. Completely divorced from that was the diatribe from almost every Labour Member on the restrictions upon individual liberty and criminal law and procedure which all Governments have believed to be necessary. It is almost impossible for a neutral observer to conclude that hon. Members are talking about the same parts of the country, or that the two problems go together.

Labour Members have the effrontery to say that there should be no temporary emergency provisions. They can say that and keep straight faces, only because they have split minds.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) gave us an interesting and learned dissertation upon the academic problems of changing the criminal procedure law in Northern Ireland, the implications for civil liberty and other matters which, in an academic world, receive attention. But we are talking about murder, about life and death, about violence and the intimidation of witnesses and jurors. They are rife. They are daily events. The whole population goes in fear. People cannot carry on their normal lives because a great threat hangs over them.

People who speak up for Northern Ireland, such as our gallant friends in the Unionist parties, have to endure that all the time. Yet the Opposition have the effrontery to go on and on about comparatively small temporary changes in the law. Do they ever say that because of these problems this legislation is necessary; that all they ask is that it is as pain free as possible and that they will remove the restrictions as soon as it is possible for people to move without fear? Of course, they do not, because they are playing the party game.

I know the hon. Member for Middlesbrough to be decent and honest. He and many of his hon. Friends apply their minds to the problems honestly and in the interests of the House, but there is a distinct hint of hyprocrisy about the Labour party's approach to the problem. [Interruption.]

The Opposition spokesman may attack us, but one must say such things, because the party game applied to such subjects is repulsive to ordinary decent people. I do not believe in that game, but it has been played by the Opposition spokesman who refused to say that we should not have temporary emergency provisions to deal with a special and exceptional situation in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have not spoken in this debate, and therefore I do not understand any of the points made by the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is not on a point of order. I believe that he will seek to catch my eye later.

Mr. Stanbrook: I am surprised that the hon. Member for Middlesbrough even thought that he was raising a point of order. From time to time, it needs to be said that one cannot in the same speech say that there is great violence in Northern Ireland which affects our courts, and at the same time say that there is no case for temporary emergency provisions to deal with the abuses of our system.

Certain matters should be considered. In an ideal world, one need not have any restrictions.

Mr. Bell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Alex Carlile: Give way.

Mr. Stanbrook: I shall get this off my chest first. We all know that, in practice, in the mind of a court the line drawn between guilt and innocence does not depend so much on something abstract. It does not really depend upon proof beyond all reasonable doubt, as the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) said.

Mr. Archer: I did not say that.

Mr. Stanbrook: The right hon. and learned Gentleman may not have said that, but it is often said. Many other considerations are involved, including the rules of evidence and the sufficiency of evidence. The decision at the end of the day is often made by a jury, considering all the facts and applying its own common sense to the question.

It is true that one of the casualties of the Northern Ireland system of justice is the absence of jury trials. That means that all those who come before Diplock courts, which means anyone accused of committing a scheduled offence—whether a member of the IRA, a policeman or a soldier — is deprived of that benefit. Recently, a British soldier, aged 19, was convicted of murder. He was convicted by a single judge in circumstances which, had they been put before a jury at the Old Bailey at the Central Criminal Court, would certainly have resulted in an acquittal on the murder charge. The circumstances may well have been said to have involved the agony of the moment — such as occurred in the Waldorf action. It could have been said that an officer, in the agony of the moment, under great provocation, might well have acted in a particular way. That is why there is a big difference ——

Mr. McNamara: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand that that case is a matter of appeal at present.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think that this case is before the courts at present. I think I am accurate in saying that.

Mr. Stanbrook: In any event, I have got if off my chest. I have said what I wanted to say.

The fact is that the Labour party has not approached this whole subject properly, in a way that honesty dictates that the Labour party should approach it. Labour Members are fixed with the idea that there should be a close examination of civil liberties; yet they ignore those constraints upon their liberties that are necessarily imposed upon any responsible Government placed in such a position.

What is the proper response? It is for the Government to put the whole problem before an independent expert, a former judge of the United Kingdom, and ask: in what respect do we not need these provisions to secure justice in the context of Northern Ireland? The Government have done that, and that judge has reported. The judge has made certain recommendations which should be adopted. The fact remains that there is a strong case, and the Opposition know it, for the preservation of temporary emergency provisions such as those we are debating.

11.4 pm

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): I apologise to the Under-Secretary. I was speaking to one of his hon. Friends when he introduced the order and as a result I missed his opening remarks. The debate has, as usual, ranged fairly widely, but I am curious about the effect of article 2 of the order which says that it

"means all the provisions of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978, except sections 5 and 28 to 36" and so on. I hope that the Under-Secretary will explain the effect of that when he replies.

I listened to much of the earlier debate and all of this debate with the exception of the few minutes that I missed at the start. I was struck, as I have been on many previous occasions, by the apparent willingness of so many hon. Members to believe everything that they are told about Northern Ireland. That is something that has a long but not altogether happy history in the House.

There was the shooting at Gransha hospital recently. There have been a number of terrorist attacks there over the years. Soldiers and people visiting relatives have also been killed at the general hospital which is only a mile or so away. It seems to have escaped attention that two guns were found in the possession of the IRA at Gransha hospital. One of them had been taken from a police constable some years ago. It is alleged that it has been used since to murder several people.

In the previous Parliament for some weeks hon. Members were complaining about a young man called Sean Gallaher from the Strabane area. It was alleged that he was innocent of everything he had ever been accused of. I listened to those exchanges and wondered why the Government never told the House that man's record. It would have cleared up all the arguments immediately. I eventually made some inquiries, but the matter was then dropped, and I never raised it. The House might be interested in it now. It shows that some people are willing to accept everthing that they are told.

The youth was arrested on the Ballycolman estate one day before his 16th birthday.

Mr. John David Taylor: Strabane.

Mr. Ross: It was Strabane. My right hon. Friend's geography is accurate. When the youth was arrested he was in possession of a ·303 rifle, which is not what one normally finds a 15-year-old running around with.

Miss Joan Maynard (Sheffield, Brightside): Not in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Ross: Even in Northern Ireland it is unusual to find 15-year-olds running around with ·303 rifles.

Mr. Flannery: It is not. They are obvious, are they not?

Mr. Ross: They are, and the fact that the youth was arrested with one should lead one to believe that he did not have it for any good or legal purpose. He was put into St. Patrick's training school, from which he immediately absconded. He was then spotted living around the IRA caravan which was parked in Lifford just across the river. We can stand and look at it.

We then had the famous case of a Mr. McSheffrey, an internee who was released by the noble Lord Whitelaw, no doubt on the application of his tearful wife. Mr. McSheffrey was subsequently arrested holding up a bank for the IRA. Some months after that his house went up in smoke. When the rescue forces turned up, the front wall was in the front yard, the back wall was in the back yard and Mrs. McSheffrey and her children were under the floorboards which had fallen on top of them when the bomb which was being put together in the bedroom exploded.

The security forces in Northern Ireland are not as foolish and as willing to believe all that they are told as some politicians. Many of us who represent constituencies in Northern Ireland are concerned when we listen time after time in the Chamber to accounts that cannot be correct and find that Ministers, who are in possession of all the facts, are not prepared to relate them to the House and the country so that everyone is made aware of the truth. If they had made the facts known, many of the problems that we have encountered could have been avoided.

Many interesting and wise comments were made in the previous debate and the Baker report is a wise and reasonable document. I am gratified that there is a possibility of descheduling certain offences. As Northern Ireland Members carry out their constituency work, they come across cases—this is the experience of us all—where the scheduled procedure was not the appropriate line of action. Of course, there are dangers in all statutory sentences. When we direct ourselves to the consideration of new legislation, I hope that that factor will be well and truely taken care of and remedied.

In the previous debate there were complaints about aggrevation and harassment by members of the security forces. I have no doubt that we shall hear them again if certain Members catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Much of the alleged harassment and aggravation stems from occasions when they are seeking information and the individuals concerned are not prepared to give it. If we had a proper identity card system, all the information required would be available there and then. If someone was not prepared to carry his identity card and a small fine was applied regularly, he would no doubt learn quickly the error of his ways.

When the Government are considering the replacement of this valuable legislation, I hope that they will consider making the possession of a weapon which has been used for murder an offence in itself. This issue has been raised with the Government on many occasions, but, unfortunately, they have failed to act so far. We have only to think of the gun that was recovered at the Gransha hospital a couple of weeks ago to realise that weapons travel. A person who is found with a weapon that was used to commit murder must be presumed to have received it from another person. He did not find the weapon in his garden overnight; someone must have given it to him. If the person who received it knew that possession would of itself carry a heavy prison sentence, he might think twice before accepting responsibility for having it in his possession, let alone committing murder with it.

In the course of our work as constituency Members we have all talked to the police. We know as well as Ministers that weapons have been used for murder in different parts of Northern Ireland and have been transported throughout the Province. They have turned up again and again for the commission of murder. It seems that the IRA has a considerable number of weapons and tends to use only relatively few of them. As the weapons fall into the hands of the security forces, they are replaced. The IRA does not have a large number of weapons in use in all areas.

As a shooting man, I know how difficult it is to keep weapons in good condition. If a weapon becomes damp in the course of a day's shooting, it is necessary thereafter to clean and oil it and generally to take good care of it. Weapons that are used by terrorists have been found in many strange places and we can sssume that they have not received the good care that I have described. If terrorists have weapons that they wish to keep in good condition, they must keep them dry and oiled. The weapons that are in constant use do not receive that care. Therefore, the IRA tends to keep the bulk of its weapons safe and it is prepared at any time to sacrifice the few that are in constant use. For those reasons, the Government should look seriously at creating an offence of possession of a murder weapon.

The other matter that has not been covered, and should be covered, is the right of silence. It has concerned all of us in Northern Ireland for many years. Individuals are brought in, questioned and held, but steadfastly refuse to open their mouths. Those who are the godfathers—they were described as such by the late Airey Neave—are well known to the police. That has been happening in one form or another for many years. The godfathers are restricted to a fairly small number of people. They are the kingpins. Those who sit quietly, not doing anything themselves but directing, organising, recruiting and spreading their evil by every means at their disposal, should be an absolute top priority target for imprisonment. The silence behind which they hide is something that they should not be allowed to go on using in future, as they have in the past. I hope that when we discuss the replacement legislation, we shall find something that will enable us to get at that relatively small group of key people in the IRA, and for that matter, in the Sinn Fein. They tend to turn up in both organisations with unfailing regularity.

I should like to give a relevant quotation from the Baker report. In paragraph 32, the good man who produced the report says:

> "I hope I have understood and have given full weight to all such arguments in my detailed consideration of the powers but there are three points to be made clear now:
> (1) There are others who attack the EPA, the security forces and the legal process including the judges and the courts, not for the ultimate purpose of preserving human rights and liberties but for sinister reasons."

That is why I opened my remarks with a review of a small number of the many cases that I have been aware of in the past. The attack of many people is not honest. When one sees the forces of law and order that keep society together in Ulster coming under attack, one immediately asks, at any rate in Northern Ireland, not what the published purpose is, but the real purpose, which is the one that the people making the allegations are unwilling to make public.

> "(2) I have felt increasingly the need for a society for the furtherance of human duties to counter-balance those who are, rightly, so valiant for human rights."

A long time ago, someone said that the pulpit was the last refuge of the scoundrel — [HON. MEMBERS: "Patriotism."] He did not mean genuine patriotism, so I left that bit out. For the information of hon. Members, it had not escaped my attention that the word "patriotism" was used.

The plain truth is that there are many people who hide behind the banner of human rights, and are interested only in taking away human rights, above all, the right that we all want—the right to life. I can see the odd head or two shaking, but perhaps those who shake their heads should question those with whom they march behind the banner of human rights. The House is the final guarantor of human rights in this nation. That is why we who are of the Unionist tradition want to sit in it. This is where our human rights are guaranteed. That is why we come here. That is why the person who does not come here does not do so. He is not interested in human rights. He is interested in his selfish rights, and in the selfish desires of those whom he represents.

Thirdly, Sir George Baker said:

> "Nevertheless, I am completely unconvinced that if the EPA powers were, or were even substantially, abolished we would waken up next morning to universal sweet reason and an end to violence. Unfortunately they remain broadly necessary both to curb violence and to bring the guilty criminals to justice. The high probability of detection and subsequent conviction has always been regarded as the best deterrent."

That puts in a nutshell the vital reasons for maintaining this legislation. I believe that the legislation has been necessary, is necessary and, unfortunately, will continue to be necessary.

If anyone doubts the willingness of the IRA to murder those whom it would claim as its religious bedfellows, let him consider the punishment shootings, the murders of other Roman Catholics and the whole edifice of terrorism that the IRA has erected wherever it has become dominant, inflicting the most awful indignities on the population so as to drive them to their deaths or into the evil ways of which the activities of the IRA and Sinn Fein are the most blatant examples that this country has ever seen.

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): I am delighted to be able to participate in this debate and to say that my colleagues and I will support the continuation of the legislation.

I remind hon. Members that, while we sit in the comfort of this House, members of the security forces are actively engaged in the defence of freedom and democracy in Northern Ireland. I pay tribute to their courage. Our minds should go to those who, in all kinds of weather, stand between us and the enemy. I am delighted that the voice of the Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) is not heard in the Chamber, but I am sorrowful indeed that other hon. Members speak with that kind of voice and parrot many of the phrases of Republican propaganda, which should be condemned by every right-thinking Member of Parliament.

The House should be mindful of the families recently attacked by the IRA with murderous intent. Two members of the UDR are at this very moment fighting for their lives. That will not concern the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), because it is the result of his friends' activities. The whole House should condemn the action of the hon. Member for Islington, North. I hope that instead of running after petty Irish votes in his constituency he will in future think of the safety of the security forces and of every British citizen.

At this season of Christmas we should be thinking of the seven injured members of the UDR and especially the two who are so seriously ill. We should also remember the gallant member of the Army who recently lost his life on the Fermanagh border. It ill becomes any Member of the House to give succour or encouragement to murderous, butchering groups such as Sinn Fein and the fellow travellers of the IRA.

The legislation before us is important. The innocent Northern Ireland community continues to be subject to diabolical criminal attacks from republican men of blood —from terrorists whose only aim is the destruction of democracy and the denial of that right basic to any free society: the right to live. I trust that, after a resounding vote in the House tonight, there will be a continuance of the Act. I trust that Opposition Members will rise to the situation and defend freedom and democratic rights in Northern Ireland by ensuring that this legislation is retained.

I agree that the legislation should have been taken off the statute book long ago. But that can be done only when the situation permits it—when the men of murder and destruction have been defeated.

I was delighted to hear the Minister say that it was for the Government to eradicate the men of terror and the violent men in Northern Ireland. There can only be a future for democracy when the men of terror are removed from society.

When the choice was made in Londonderry between members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary or the SAS and members of the IRA, I am delighted to report that it was two IRA men who were carried out instead of two members of Her Majesty's forces. I make no apology to any hon. Member for clearly stating that view.

[Mr. William Ross]

he was innocent of everything he had ever been accused of. I listened to those exchanges and wondered why the Government never told the House that man's record. Weapons that are used by terrorists have been found in many strange places and we can sssume that they have not received the good care that I have described. If terrorists have weapons that they wish to keep in good condition, they must keep them dry and oiled. The weapons that are in constant use do not receive that care. Therefore, the IRA tends to keep the bulk of its weapons safe and it is prepared at any time to sacrifice the few that are in constant use. For those reasons, the Government should look seriously at creating an offence of possession of a murder weapon.

The other matter that has not been covered, and should be covered, is the right of silence. It has concerned all of us in Northern Ireland for many years. Individuals are brought in, questioned and held, but steadfastly refuse to open their mouths. Those who are the godfathers—they were described as such by the late Airey Neave—are well known to the police. That has been happening in one form or another for many years. The godfathers are restricted to a fairly small number of people. They are the kingpins. Those who sit quietly, not doing anything themselves but directing, organising, recruiting and spreading their evil by every means at their disposal, should be an absolute top priority target for imprisonment. The silence behind which they hide is something that they should not be allowed to go on using in future, as they have in the past. I hope that when we discuss the replacement legislation, we shall find something that will enable us to get at that relatively small group of key people in the IRA, and for that matter, in the Sinn Fein. They tend to turn up in both organisations with unfailing regularity.

I should like to give a relevant quotation from the Baker report. In paragraph 32, the good man who produced the report says:

"I hope I have understood and have given full weight to all such arguments in my detailed consideration of the powers but there are three points to be made clear now:

(1) There are others who attack the EPA, the security forces and the legal process including the judges and the courts, not for the ultimate purpose of preserving human rights and liberties but for sinister reasons."

That is why I opened my remarks with a review of a small number of the many cases that I have been aware of in the past. The attack of many people is not honest. When one sees the forces of law and order that keep society together in Ulster coming under attack, one immediately asks, at any rate in Northern Ireland, not what the published purpose is, but the real purpose, which is the one that the people making the allegations are unwilling to make public.

"(2) I have felt increasingly the need for a society for the furtherance of human duties to counter-balance those who are, rightly, so valiant for human rights."

A long time ago, someone said that the pulpit was the last refuge of the scoundrel — [HON. MEMBERS: "Patriotism."] He did not mean genuine patriotism, so I left that bit out. For the information of hon. Members, it had not escaped my attention that the word "patriotism" was used.

The plain truth is that there are many people who hide behind the banner of human rights, and are interested only in taking away human rights, above all, the right that we all want—the right to life. I can see the odd head or two shaking, but perhaps those who shake their heads should question those with whom they march behind the banner of human rights. The House is the final guarantor of human rights in this nation. That is why we who are of the Unionist tradition want to sit in it. This is where our human rights are guaranteed. That is why we come here. That is why the person who does not come here does not do so. He is not interested in human rights. He is interested in his selfish rights, and in the selfish desires of those whom he represents.

Thirdly, Sir George Baker said:

"Nevertheless, I am completely unconvinced that if the EPA powers were, or were even substantially, abolished we would waken up next morning to universal sweet reason and an end to violence. Unfortunately they remain broadly necessary both to curb violence and to bring the guilty criminals to justice. The high probability of detection and subsequent conviction has always been regarded as the best deterrent."

That puts in a nutshell the vital reasons for maintaining this legislation. I believe that the legislation has been necessary, is necessary and, unfortunately, will continue to be necessary.

If anyone doubts the willingness of the IRA to murder those whom it would claim as its religious bedfellows, let him consider the punishment shootings, the murders of other Roman Catholics and the whole edifice of terrorism that the IRA has erected wherever it has become dominant, inflicting the most awful indignities on the population so as to drive them to their deaths or into the evil ways of which the activities of the IRA and Sinn Fein are the most blatant examples that this country has ever seen.

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): I am delighted to be able to participate in this debate and to say that my colleagues and I will support the continuation of the legislation.

I remind hon. Members that, while we sit in the comfort of this House, members of the security forces are actively engaged in the defence of freedom and democracy in Northern Ireland. I pay tribute to their courage. Our minds should go to those who, in all kinds of weather, stand between us and the enemy. I am delighted that the voice of the Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) is not heard in the Chamber, but I am sorrowful indeed that other hon. Members speak with that kind of voice and parrot many of the phrases of Republican propaganda, which should be condemned by every right-thinking Member of Parliament.

The House should be mindful of the families recently attacked by the IRA with murderous intent. Two members of the UDR are at this very moment fighting for their lives. That will not concern the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), because it is the result of his friends' activities. The whole House should condemn the action of the hon. Member for Islington, North. I hope that instead of running after petty Irish votes in his constituency he will in future think of the safety of the security forces and of every British citizen.

At this season of Christmas we should be thinking of the seven injured members of the UDR and especially the two who are so seriously ill. We should also remember the gallant member of the Army who recently lost his life on the Fermanagh border. It ill becomes any Member of the House to give succour or encouragement to murderous, butchering groups such as Sinn Fein and the fellow travellers of the IRA.

The legislation before us is important. The innocent Northern Ireland community continues to be subject to diabolical criminal attacks from republican men of blood —from terrorists whose only aim is the destruction of democracy and the denial of that right basic to any free society: the right to live. I trust that, after a resounding vote in the House tonight, there will be a continuance of the Act. I trust that Opposition Members will rise to the situation and defend freedom and democratic rights in Northern Ireland by ensuring that this legislation is retained.

I agree that the legislation should have been taken off the statute book long ago. But that can be done only when the situation permits it—when the men of murder and destruction have been defeated.

I was delighted to hear the Minister say that it was for the Government to eradicate the men of terror and the violent men in Northern Ireland. There can only be a future for democracy when the men of terror are removed from society.

When the choice was made in Londonderry between members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary or the SAS and members of the IRA, I am delighted to report that it was two IRA men who were carried out instead of two members of Her Majesty's forces. I make no apology to any hon. Member for clearly stating that view.

[Rev. William McCrea]

The fact that the legislation must be retained after so many years is an indictment of past Administrations. Normality has not been restored in the Province. The book of Revelation tells us how the souls under the altars cried out, "How long, O Lord". The House has a right to ask the Government tonight how long the situation is to be permitted to continue. We have a right to ask that the tragedy should be brought to a speedy conclusion.

Mr. Flannery: Alleluia.

Rev. William McCrea: I am glad that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) has taken up some of the words. Perhaps he will be converted, like Saul of Tarsus. Perhaps tonight we shall see the hon. Gentleman standing for the first time side by side with those hon. Members who believe in the continuance of democracy in Northern Ireland. Perhaps he will go through the right Lobby, instead of voting to support the men of terror and violence.

No doubt there are difficulties to be faced by the Secretary of State and the Ministers, but I believe that, until the right diagnosis is made, we cannot effect a cure. The Government must clearly state that the IRA can, must and will be defeated. Their determination must be clearly seen. I trust that, when the Minister replies to the debate, he will make it plain.

Alas, the cancer of terrorism is permitted to inflict sorrow and tragedy upon a long-suffering community. It ill becomes hon. Members to extend the courtesies of the House to members of Sinn Fein, when the same Sinn Fein and the IRA are inflicting continuous murder, violence and sorrow upon the people of Ulster.

Some people are wondering tonight whether their loved one — a member of the security forces or just an ordinary Protestant living near the Border — will be wrapped up in a shroud before Christmas and brought home in a coffin. Hon. Members should give absolute support to the members of the security forces.

In this Christmas season, the House should send its best wishes to the security forces in Northern Ireland, to the RUC and the RUC Reserve, in which we take pride and the Ulster Defence Regiment, which has served Her Majesty and Northern Ireland with absolute distinction. It has shown professionalism and bravery second to none. Last but by no means least we should send our best wishes to the rest of Her Majesty's Forces. I salute them and their courage and trust that they will have a peaceful and joyful Christmas. May 1985 bring us the peace that we have longed for.

Mr. Flannery: Alleluia.

11.30 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I admire the energy of the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea). He has followed our debates since 3.45 pm and this was his first opportunity to make a speech. I am aware that the Irish problem has been with us for many years and I do not wish in any way to detract from its seriousness, but I was not aware that it went back to the book of Revelation. Even if a solution to the problem came via Tarsus we should be grateful.

I remind hon. Members that the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 was passed by a Labour Government. It was a consolidation measure. We accept that the emergency powers exist to combat sustained terrorist violence. Two years ago at this time, the debate took place against the sombre background of the Ballykelly bombing. One year ago it preceded the Harrods bomb but succeeded the assassination of Edgar Graham, to whom the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) referred in the previous debate. In the past few days, let alone weeks, a car bomb has exploded without warning outside a nightclub used by off-duty soldiers in Holywood, County Down with 60 lbs of nails, nuts and bolts in it, a gunman has been shot dead and a man has been captured by an RUC patrol after a land mine explosion caught a UDR Land Rover, injuring seven men, on a road outside Moy, County Armagh.

These are not anecdotal incidents but part of a pattern and a sad way of life which, as the Secretary of State said, are, we hope, diminishing. Nevertheless, they leave their trace and trail across Northern Ireland. In the Opposition's view, which I know is shared by the Government, there is no such thing as an acceptable level of violence. Nor can we allow terrorism to set the agenda for a political debate. That is not to say, however, that there should not be a political agenda or a political debate.

Much has been said about what are known as SOSPs — those who are held at the Secretary of State's pleasure. They are young people who could not be committed to life imprisonment because, at the time of their conviction, they were under 18. Witnesses told Sir George Baker of how demoralising it is for young people to be imprisoned without a release date, without hope and with nothing fixed to which they could look forward. All hon. Members have referred to that, as did the Secretary of State. The Opposition share that worry and look forward to some alleviation of the problem.

In the earlier debate we discussed Diplock courts and evidence given by the Cobden Trust to Sir George Baker. The Cobden Trust's sample for 1981 showed that 60 per cent. had been remanded for more than nine months before sentence and that almost 10 per cent. had been remanded for more than 15 months. In considering bail applications, judges paid little attention to the evidence against the accused. In addition, 40 per cent. of those tried in the Diplock courts have no connection with political violence, and 87 per cent. of those charged with robbery appeared to have carried out the alleged offences for ordinary criminal motives, and were, thus, denied their right to trial by jury.

The Opposition are extremely worried about civil liberties and civil rights. The Secretary of State said earlier that he would consider some of the amendments proposed by Sir George Baker. When the amendments come before the House, we shall examine them carefully and decide how to vote on them. However, as we look at what is before us now — trial without jury, conviction by a single judge—we have no alternative but to vote against the order. Voting for it would do more harm than good.

Mr. Scott: I had hoped that, having gone through the catalogue of horrors in Northern Ireland, including recent events, the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) would say that the Opposition had decided to support the renewal of the powers.

It has been common ground in virtually all parts of the House that we need exceptional measures to deal with an exceptional situation. It is irresponsible for the Labour party to seek to deny us the necessary powers to deal with terrorism.

It is clearly not possible for me to cover every point raised in the debate. However, we have listened to all the comments made by hon. Members and we will bear them in mind when we shape our legislation.

I apologise to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) for the fact that he has not yet had a reply to his parliamentary question. He will get a reply, and a letter in response to the letter that he sent to me.

The campaign against strip searching in Armagh prison, which is carried on with great hysteria in this country and in the United States, is misguided and is based on false evidence of what happens at Armagh.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Scott: No. I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

The impression has been given that every time a prisoner goes from Armagh to the court house nearby she is strip searched when she leaves and strip searched when she comes back. In the past two or three months the number of strip searches of those remand prisoners at Armagh has been running at two or three a month. Strip searching overall at Armagh this year is running at less than one strip search per prisoner per month. The progapanda campaign that has been run against the practice is a distortion of the facts.

The question of proscription was also raised.

Mr. Flannery: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I took a delegation to Armagh and we saw the books. The figures given by the Minister are wrong.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Scott: I get a report every month.

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is the Minister aware of the large number of——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not abuse points of order.

Mr. Scott: The proscription of Sinn Fein is a matter which the Government keep under——

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I will listen to the hon. Gentleman if he can satisfy me that he has a point of order.

Mr. Corbyn: The Minister has answered numerous parliamentary questions about strip searches. His replies show that they are continuing at Armagh and at other prisons in this country. He ought to be telling us what those answers were, rather than telling us what he believes the trend to be.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a point of argument and not a point of order.

Mr. Scott: The proscription of Sinn Fein is kept under review, but I do not think that proscription is a weapon which should be used lightly. We are fighting to defend law and order and the democratic process, and freedom of speech is a fundamental part of that process.

I also do not think that the mere proscription of Sinn Fein would stop the present leaders of the organisation from continuing to say and do what they say and do now, though under the guise of another organisation; nor would it change the attitudes of those who support Sinn Fein or prevent them from expressing their support for extreme Republican views. This is a balanced judgment. It is something, as I have said, that the Government keep under review, but at the moment I think that we are right not to go down the road of proscription.

I know that the police study very carefully the statements that are made by Sinn Fein leaders to see whether they would justify action that might lead to a prosecution, and the adequacy of the law in this area, too, is kept under review.

I was asked about those detained at the Secretary of State's pleasure, but all that I would add to my remarks at the end of the previous debate is that I am very much aware of the uncertainty in the minds of all prisoners—and their families — who are serving indeterminate sentences. Very early in the new year I hope to produce a document that will be issued to prisoners, their families, and to organisations outside concerned with the welfare of prisoners, which will indicate how the review procedure works. We shall make it clear that in future prisoners will be able to submit written representations when their cases come up for review, and can then be told the outcome of the review or if the answer is that they are not to have a release date fixed, when the case will next be reviewed. In that way I hope that we can help at least to clear up much of the uncertainty that now bedevils the attitude of those serving indeterminate sentences.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) raised a detailed point about the second paragraph of the continuation order. It refers to those bits of the Act which, under section 33, do not lapse annually, and so do not need to be reviewed under this order. I shall certainly have another look at his point about the possession of murder weapons as we come to review all the provisions.

I end by echoing some of the remarks of the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea). As we conclude the debate, it is right to pay a warm tribute to the judges, magistrates, policemen, soldiers and prison officers in Northern Ireland upon whom we all depend so much. At this time of the year in particular it is right to pay them that tribute. We need their protection. They stand between us and anarchy in Northern Ireland, and I pay a warm tribute to the work that they do on behalf of the community in Northern Ireland.

PETITIONS

Human Embryos

Sir Ian Percival (Stockport): I beg to ask leave to present to the House a petition from the residents of the town of Southport, which I have the honour to represent. It is signed by 2,150 persons. It was raised by members of the Merseyside community standards association, care campaigns, Life and the Elim Pentecostal church. It concerns one of the most important and difficult subjects to come before the House in my time. I congratulate those who have gone to the trouble of making their opinions known. I wish to let them and this House know that I share their concern.

In this petition, my constituents affirm that the newly fertilised human embryo is a real, living, individual human being. Therefore, they welcome the statement in the report of the committee of inquiry into human fertilisation and embryology—the Warnock report—that

"The status of the embryo is a matter of fundamental principle which should be enshrined in legislation" and its recommendation that

"the embryo of the human species should be afforded protection in law."

My petitioners conclude:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Mr. Speaker, I beg to ask leave to present a petition in the name of the Rev. Sidney Garland, minister of Finaghy evanelical presbyterian church and signed by 5,944 of my constituents and some friends. Many of them are associated with Care Campaigns, Life, and the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children. Most important, they come from across the political and religious spectrum.

The petition welcomes the statement in the report of the committee of inquiry into human fertilisation and embryology—the Warnock report—that and its recommendation that the embryo of the human species should be afforded protection in law. I associate myself with those sentiments and the petitions's prayer, which reads:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): Mr. Speaker, I beg to ask leave to present four petitions with well over 2,000 signatures, mainly from Cardiff, North, the constituency which I have the honour to represent. They are forthcoming in response to our Government's invitation to comment on the Warnock report. The petitions have been organised by Miss Dorothy Bird of Rhiwbina, Mrs. Brace Jones of Rhiwbina, Miss Jennifer Wilson on behalf of St. Mark's' church, Gabalfa, and Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Dart of Whitchurch on behalf of the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children, Cardiff.

I seek to present their petitions in great appreciation of the extremely important points they raise. There are many things that I could say about this subject, but this time I shall confine myself to the traditional quotation, which reads:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done soley for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): I beg to ask leave to present two petitions on the protection of the human embryo, one in the name of Douglas Reed of 67 Park road, Didcot, signed by 1,397 signatories, and the other signed by 153 signatories from Wantage and its surrounding districts. The petitioners pray that, the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

The weight of opinion represented by these and other petitions should be taken fully into account by the Government and the House in the framing of legislation on this important subject, which touches the consciences of so many people.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of 4,441 of my constituents. The petition was initiated by Mrs. Phoebe McAuley of Lenzie, Kirkintilloch, near Glasgow, who is the secretary of the Strathkelvin branch of the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children. I warmly support the prayer of my petitioners, that, the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): I beg to ask leave to present three petitions from residents in and around the Lewisham, East constituency. The first petition was initiated by Miss Elizabeth Fleming of 47 Lock chase in Blackheath; the second was initiated by Miss Sheila Dunn of 74 Heathlee road in Blackheath; the third was initiated by Dr. and Mrs. McAllister of 21 LeMay avenue in Grove Park, the latter containing 3,565 signatures. The size of the response reflects the great concern felt by my constituents on this subject.

All three petitions are couched in identical terms and are entitled, "Petition for the protection of the human embryo". My constituents are responding to the Government's invitation to comment on the report of the Warnock committee. My petitioners welcome the statement in the report of the committee of inquiry into human fertilisation and embryology that, and its recommendation that the embryo of the human species should be afforded protection in law. My petitioners conclude:

[Mr. Colin Moynihan]

"The status of the embryo is a matter of fundamental principle which should be enshrined in legislation".

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Myasthenia Gravis

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

12.2 am

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): The phrase "myasthenia gravis" casually dropped during conversation is calculated to bring it to an immediate halt. The inevitable response is, "What on earth is myasthenia gravis"? Had I been faced with the phrase on any date before 11 November this year, my response, too, would have been, "What on earth is myasthenia gravis"? But on that date the phrase intruded into my life out of the blue, in the same way as it has intruded from time to time into the lives of comparatively few families in Britain.

Myasthenia gravis is a serious muscle weakness. In technical terms, it is a neuro-muscular disorder that is due to a defect in the action at the nerve ending. It prevents the brain from effectively controlling several groups of muscles, especially in the face and throat. It is a rare complaint, fortunately. It affects about one in 20,000. In my constituency there should be no more than three or four cases.

Usually a GP will see only one or two cases in his professional life. Fortunately, it is neither contagious nor infectious and it is rare for more than one member of a family to be affected. If by chance the mother should suffer from it when the child is born, within a few weeks the symptoms normally fade away.

It is one of the oddest, most frustrating and infuriating of medical conditions known to mankind. For that reason, my prime purpose is to give publicity to the disorder so that the cloak of ignorance which has shrouded it might be lifted.

The symptoms are usually slight at first, but they gradually become worse. They have a characteristic distribution, starting with drooping eyelids, double vision, difficulty in swallowing or speaking, a general weakness and feeling of fatigue or difficulty in breathing and raising the arms. Many are the symptoms that any hypochondriac might have—especially after an all-night sitting.

The disorder has no respect for age. It is most common at the age of 20 years. For men the peak is between 50 and 60 years. Below that age women usually outnumber men, but among older people men are the principal sufferers.

Delay and inaccuracy in diagnosis is often an insult added to the injury of myasthenia sufferers. The symptoms vary in type and severity. A myasthenic might have one symptom, or a combination of symptoms, but rarely all of them. In the early stages the symptoms are slight and gradual. They become worse in the afternoon or evening and they tend to improve in the morning or after rest.

The symptoms are aggravated by weather changes, by heat, cold or extremes of emotion. No two myasthenic sufferers are alike. Their symptoms are not necessarily the same on different days. They exhibit a variable pattern. With such a wide variety of symptoms suffered by the same person, let alone symptoms shown by different people, it is not surprising that mistakes in diagnosis occur not infrequently. Some cases are not diagnosed at all.

The inability to smile or slurred speech are often diagnosed as depression, neurosis or stress. Patients are often bewildered by the change in their condition. They go to their doctor, rest in the surgery and suddenly feel much better. They are confused and feel fraudulent when they face their GP and try to describe their symptoms. Often the condition leads to the psychiatrist and the speech therapist instead of the neurologist and thoracic surgeon.

Sadly, what is physical is often diagnosed as mental. A simple diagnostic test is now available which shows beyond peradventure that the patient suffers from this condition. A simple injection of the drug tensilon will clear the symptoms and indicate the presence of the disorder. There is a crucial need for the medical profession to be more aware of these difficulties and to identify the disorder earlier.

An experiment was carried out in Essex by interested parties who distributed leaflets in one locality. That little exercise showed that three people formerly not known to be suffering from the condition were diagnosed as myasthenics. Will my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State assure the House that his Department is giving sufficient publicity to programmes aimed at general practitioners in particular and the public in general to ensure that there is sufficient knowledge of this condition and to alleviate the unnecessary suffering undergone by some people?

For the people who suffer from the disorder—a child cannot run or play, the smile is suddenly wiped off the face of a young girl, a woman cannot comb her hair and a man cannot hold a razor—the condition is a tragedy, and for their families it is a source of deep sadness. The condition is especially flummoxing because its exact cause is unknown. The evidence points to an immunological disease in which the body's immune system goes wrong and starts rejecting its own tissue. To date, the exact mechanism behind the disease has not been located.

Fortunately, nowadays, there are effective means of treatment—it was not always so. Today, two types of treatment afford considerable improvement, if not complete remission. First, surgery and the removal of the thymus gland, which is located in the upper part of the chest, often completely eliminate the symptons and they substantially improve the condition in about 80 per cent. of cases. It involves a period in intensive care, but most patients are discharged by the end of the second or third week. Fortunately, if that method of treatment is not appropriate, drugs usually are. They can improve the strength of the patient and the affected muscles, although they do not always restore the patient to full power.

One of the many crosses that myasthenics have to bear is the need to ensure that the drugs they take do not aggravate their symptons. Drugs regularly prescribed for heart ailments, barbiturates and some antibiotics have an aggravating effect. I am happy to be able to say that, fortunately, modern treatment has returned most patients to productive lives. This has transformed the position in recent years. Before the last war, 85 per cent. of patients died; the proportion fell to 15 per cent. and it has fallen still further recently. The condition of the vast majority of patients can be substantially improved with drugs or surgery.

Sufferers are entitled to certain benefits. Those benefits are by no means clear. Because of the variety and intensity of the symptons, some myasthenics have problems in persuading the DHSS that their disability entitles them to a mobility allowance. One day they are severely immobile, the next they are completely mobile. I ask my hon. Friend to consider whether myasthenia sufferers are satisfactorily categorised for benefit, particularly mobility allowance.

In the past 10 years research has taken a remarkable step forward. In 1973, Messrs. Patrick and Lindstrom of the Salk institute found that rabbits that were immunised with the electric organ of an electric eel developed a condition that was apparently identical to that of myasthenia sufferers. The rabbits became floppy, but after a time when the symptoms had worn off they became frisky. At about the same time in research into the same disease an advance was made with regard to snake toxins from the venom of the Indian cobra which was found to contain a component which induced, not surprisingly, instantaneous myasthenia in the victim.

Those two separate advances have enabled vast strides to be made in the understanding and treatment of myasthenia in the past 10 years and established what until then had been merely theory—that myasthenia gravis is a disease of the autoimmune system. That showed the importance in this disease as with many other diseases, of properly controlled animal experiments. Will animal libbers please note and take to heart those examples of where there has been considerable relief in human suffering from properly monitored experiments carried out on animals in humane circumstances?

In the next few years we look forward to seeing identified drugs which will be able to control the triggering factors in the disorder. Myasthenia blood cells can now be cultivated in the laboratory so that the human disease can be studied in test tubes. The objective is to find a drug which will be selective in its operation and switch off the unwanted self-destructive response while leaving all the other immune responses intact.

In this, as probably with all other research, the cry is for more money. I hope that my hon. Friend can assure the House, not as to the amount of money but as to its effective use.

The British Association of Myasthenics was set up in 1975 as a branch of the muscular dystrophy group. It is a voluntary organisation. It aims to relieve and comfort those who suffer from this disorder, to bring them together and to promote self help. At present large numbers of myasthenics remain isolated or undiagnosed. The association seeks to educate the public and locate as many myasthenics as possible. It acts as a reminder to the medical profession and the ancillary services of this disorder by improving diagnosis time, treatment and services. It does splendid work with modest resources. I compliment the association on its wholly admirable work, and particularly on its fund-raising for research.

Great work is done at the University College hospital in Gower street and at the Royal Free hospital in London, but it is perhaps invidious to select two out of so many National Health Hospitals as so many medical staffs, many members of the social services and researchers are striving for the day in the not-too-distant future when myasthenia gravis is no longer a conversation stopper, and when myasthenia will no longer be gravis but simply myasthenia.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer), for giving us the opportunity of this debate and for drawing myasthenia gravis to the attention of the House and to a wider public.

[Mr. Whitney]

As my hon. and learned Friend has said, this is fortunately a comparatively rare disease, and the causes of it are unknown, but it is thought that they are related in some way to a disorder of the thymus gland, which leads to a breakdown in immune tolerance. It is classed as one of the autoimmune diseases, along with multiple sclerosis and muscular dystrophy, which means that the body produces its own antibodies, which then attack healthy tissue. The main symptom is that the muscles tire very quickly so that the patient finds it difficult and sometimes impossible to make normal movements; not just limb movements, as in standing, walking and carrying things, but movements in the face, and throat, which affect talking, chewing and swallowing, and in severe cases breathing. As my hon. and learned Friend said the symptoms of the disease fluctuate in intensity, and there are usually long periods of remission, particularly during the early years.

My hon. and learned Friend correctly said that one of the main problems associated with myasthenia gravis is the difficulty of initial diagnosis. During its early stages the symptoms may occur only as a result of extreme physical activity or emotional stress, and they disappear again after rest. This means that when the patient is examined by the doctor, it will be unlikely that the patient will be exhibiting any symptoms. The doctors will therefore have to rely upon the patient's own accounts and the diagnosis will have to be made retrospectively.

The doctor's initial impression is likely to be that the muscular weakness that the patient describes is either the direct result of exercise that has been somewhat overdone, or, if what precipitated the symptoms was emotional stress, that it is some sort of psychosomatic disorder. It is likely to be only after several consultations that the likelihood of myasthenia gravis is considered.

I am glad to be able to reassure my hon. and learned Friend that all general practitioners learn about neurology during their training, and that in the course of this attention is given to myasthenia gravis, but I would emphasise that, because it is such a rare disease, it is very difficult for general practitioners to build up any expertise. Indeed, it is probable that the majority of general practitioners will not encounter a single instance of the disease during the whole of their careers.

Myasthenia gravis is, of course, not the only disease to encounter such difficulties of early diagnosis. The more common neuromuscular diseases, such as multiple sclerosis and muscular dystrophy, can also present initially "flitting" symptoms; and diagnosis in these patients is often made only after several attacks, and confirmed by referral to a hospital specialist.

We recognise that these are real problems. In retrospect it is easy to cast some blame on doctors for failing to make the right diagnosis, but it is remarkably difficult for them to do so at the time. My hon. and learned Friend asked about the possibility of some special initiative to inform doctors of the symptoms of myasthenia gravis in order to improve diagnosis. I must make it clear that it is the responsibility of individual doctors to ensure that they are adequately informed within their areas of interest, and to keep themselves informed on clinical and scientific developments, so this is a matter for the medical profession rather than for my Department. There are a number of established mechanisms for enabling doctors to keep up to date; for example, through medical journals and scientific papers, through conferences and seminars, and where appropriate through postgraduate training. I have no reason to believe that these mechanisms are inadequate in respect of myasthenia gravis.

Once a diagnosis has been made, the best prospect for a permanent cure is the surgical removal of the affected thymus gland, but that is likely to be effective only if a patient is comparatively young and only if the onset of myasthenia gravis is comparatively recent. Otherwise, the course of the disease is characterised by spontaneous remission of varying but diminishing duration, and the course of treatment at that point is directed towards controlling the symptoms.

Treatment of the symptoms is normally by drug therapy, usually by neostigmine and steroids, and those are usually very successful, though they may need to be administered together with other drugs to control possible side effects. The patient's management of his own lifestyle is an important aspect of keeping the symptoms under control, and patients will be advised to keep fatigue and stress to an absolute minimum.

One recently developed treatment for the relief of very severe myasthenia gravis symptoms is plasmapherisis, which is a process of, in lay language, washing a patient's blood to remove the antibodies that are causing the damage. The plasma content of the patient's blood is removed and then replaced with plasma products collected from the blood given by blood donors. This treatment is indicated only when the patient is seen to be moving towards a paralytic crisis. It is a very effective treatment in the short term, but there is no evidence that the beneficial effects of the treatment are long lasting. It is for health authorities to decide whether or not to make that treatment available, having regard to the other demands on their resources.

Apart from plasmapherisis, facilities for the treatment of the disease are generally available. Facilities for drug therapy and surgical facilities for thymectomy are not limited to a small number for hospitals, and there is no evidence of difficulties in making treatment available once a diagnosis of myasthenia gravis has been made.

My hon. and learned Friend referred to the social security benefits available to people suffering from the disease, and I should like to make some comments on this issue. The main social security benefits and allowances for disabled people are not based on the particular disabling condition, but on the extent to which a person's everyday life is affected. For example, there is attendance allowance for those who need a lot of care and attention, and mobility allowance — to which my hon. and learned Friend specifically referred — for those who are unable, or virtually unable, to walk.

The legislation does not define virtual inability to walk, but the factors to be taken into account are the distance, speed, length of time and manner in which a person can walk without severe discomfort. Each claim is decided according to individual circumstances on the basis of a medical examination. Decisions on claims for mobility allowance are made by the independent adjudicating authorities, and there is a system of appeal for those who are dissatisfied with the decision.

I am not aware that those who suffer from myasthenia gravis are encountering any particular difficulties, but I emphasise that, in view of the independence of the adjudication system, neither Ministers nor officials of the Department can interfere with the decision given on an individual claim.

I was pleased that my hon. and learned Friend raised the matter of research into myasthenia gravis. I was also pleased that he referred to the work of Patrick and Lindstrom, and I should like to add another name to the list of research workers to whom myasthenia gravis sufferers have reason to be grateful, that of Professor Eric Barnard of Imperial college. In myasthenia gravis, the body produces antibodies against acetylcholine receptors, and the effect is that messages passed along the nerves may not reach their destinations, as they are blocked by the antibodies at the nerve endings. That prevents the muscles from working properly. What Professor Barnard has managed to do, supported by the Medical Research Council and the Muscular Dystrophy Group, is to isolate the gene for the acetylcholine receptor. This important advance means that research and work on the fundamental basis of the disease can also be pursued. Research into other autoimmune diseases, and into muscular dystrophy and other genetic disorders, is being pursued in many centres, and this research may well have spin-offs for myasthenia gravis.

I should like to end as I began, by paying tribute to my hon. and learned Friend for bringing this disease to the attention of the House. I assure him that I shall make certain that my colleagues, the Health Ministers at the Department of Health and Social Security, and the officials and specialist experts in our Department, take good note of the points that he made. We shall study carefully all that he has said, and of course we shall be willing to continue our dialogue with him about the disease. Finally, I put on record my appreciation of the scientific work that is being done in identifying the causes of the disease, which is a prerequisite for any permanent cure.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Twelve o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 21 December 1984

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

9.35 am

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): I have pleasure in presenting to the House a petition entitled "Petition for the Protection of the Human Embryo". It has been signed by over 4,500 of my constituents who feel strongly about the need to enshrine in legislation protection for the human embryo as a real, living, individual human being and the need to oppose those practices which violate his or her human dignity and right to life.

The petition continues:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as is duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): I beg to ask leave of the House to present a petition, signed by 3,564 of my constituents, which is in similar terms to that presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate). I fully support the petition, which reads:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryos concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): I have the pleasure to present on behalf of 1,359 of my constituents in Hornchurch a petition in similar terms to that of my hon. Friends the Members for Faversham (Mr. Moate) and for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) which concludes:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I wish to present a petition to the House on behalf of many hundreds of my constituents, some of whom are still sending me copies of this petition, in similar terms to that introduced by the hon. Members for Faversham (Mr. Moate), for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) and for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire). This is a particularly apt time for these petitioners to come forward when people who have been involved in this type of work and experimentation are suggesting that even some of the restrictions proposed by the Warnock committee should not be accepted and, further, that it should be possible to implant human embryos into the bodies of animals.

The petition continues:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I beg to ask leave to present a petition entitled "Petition for the protection of the human embryo", signed by 2,200 of my constituents in Stratford-on-Avon who have expressed concern over the contents of the Warnock report. I share their concern.

The petition states:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Later—

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): I beg to ask leave to present three petitions from residents in Romsey and Waterside entitled "Petition for the protection of the human embryo". The first was initiated by Mrs. J. Mason of 153 Woodlands road, Ashurst and contains 1,205 signatures; the second by Mr. C. F. Mackrell of 16 Fox Hills, Totton, and bears 25 signatures; the third by Mrs. E. M. Hurst of Bryn-Gower, Awbridge, and bears 29 signatures. All are in identical terms.

They affirm the petitioners' belief that the newly fertilised human embryo is a real living individual human being and they oppose all practices which discriminate against the embryo or violate his or her human dignity and right to life.

The petition continues:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will every pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): It is my pleasure to present to the House a petition for the protection of the human embryo which has been presented to me by my constituent Peta Peeris of 4 Rutherglen walk, Eaglescliffe, Cleveland, and almost 2,000 other constituents. It gives me pleasure to present the petition to the House and I hope that the Ministers responsible will take into account the strength of feeling expressed by my and many other constituents on this vital issue.

To lie upon the Table.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): I have pleasure to present the House a petition, signed by over 1,800 people in my constituency and handed to me at the end of a large and successful public meeting, in the following terms:

We the undersigned people living or working in the Parliamentay Constituency of Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale, do hereby call on the Honourable Commons of the United Kingdom to urge Her Majesty's Government to call for a world-wide halt to the testing, production and deployment of nuclear weapons and their delivery systems as a meaningful first step to reduction in nuclear arms.

And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray etc.

The petition has my full support.

To lie upon the Table.

Torture

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I wish to present a petition signed by some 20,000 people from my constituency and other parts of the United Kingdom and including, on my reckoning, at least 35 bishops, supporting Amnesty International's campaign against torture.

The petition urges Her Majesty's Government to support an effective United Nations convention against torture and in particular the extension of compensation for torture victims to include anyone who has been the victim of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment; to support proposals, both at the United Nations and at the Council of Europe, to create an international commission to make unannounced visits to any place of detention; to intercede whenever and wherever possible on behalf of prisoners being tortured.

The petition has my full support.

To lie upon the Table.

National Health Service (Privatisation)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

9.43 am

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): This short debate on privatisation in the National Health Service comes at the end of a week when the Government announced that they had appointed Mr. Victor Paige to the chair of the NHS management board. I understand that he is a subscriber to BUPA—the private medicine scheme. Therefore, he shows his commitment to the NHS in that alone. It later emerged, under close questioning of DHSS officials and Ministers, that he is being paid £70,000 per annum, which is about £1,500 a week. At the same time, the wage for most domestics and cleaners in NHS hospitals is £1·72 per hour. Indeed, cleaners at the Barking general hospital have had their wages reduced to such a level that they are now being offered £17 per week by a private cleaning company.

That shows the sort of contrast that we are facing within the NHS. The Government are prepared to spend such a large amount of money on appointing someone to streamline the NHS and at the same time they continue to pay disgracefully low wages to people working within the NHS. They threaten those people's jobs and existence by the promotion of privatisation within the NHS. The Government have an obsession with privatisation which is matched only by their obsessional hatred for trade unions in general. In an article in The Guardian, the Under-Secretary said that he hoped that in a few years people would wonder what all the fuss was about over contracting out of services in the NHS. In what poses for a philosophical piece, he went on to ask who should wash the sheets in NHS hospitals and whether that really mattered. It cannot matter much to the Minister concerned, but it matters a great deal to those who work in the NHS. It also matters a great deal to those who use and rely on the NHS and wish to be able to continue to rely on it.

Many, not necessarily Labour Members, but people in trade unions and others all round the country, believe strongly that if the NHS means anything it means a comprehensive Health Service which can take care of everybody within the community and which can provide a full Health Service under some form of democratic control. I want to see changes in the structure of the NHS to enable greater democratic control to be obtained, but I also believe that by contracting out of any particular services within the NHS that control is weakened and the service is weakened and seriously damaged.

The Government's plans for privatisation within the NHS go back some years. It is interesting to note—the Minister may care to refute this—that as far as I am aware there is no legal power whatever to make a district or regional health authority privatise any of its services. But there is an enormous amount of cajoling, arm-twisting and blatant brow-beating of individual members of district health authorities. Letters are frequently sent from the Under-Secretary of State to the chairmen of the regional and district health authorities saying whether their performance is satisfactory.

Let me quote from one, signed by the Minister, to Dame Betty Paterson, the chairman of the North-West Thames regional health authority. After saying that he is pleased at the level of commitment shown to competitive tendering by some districts in the region, he goes on to say:

"For the other districts you no doubt have action in hand to secure satisfactory programmes. Could I now ask you to get in touch immediately with those districts to inform them that their programmes are not acceptable to Ministers, and if they are not already doing so, to seek urgent action to improve that? I would like a further report from you by 17 September at the latest giving revised programmes for those districts, or, exceptionally, where this is not possible, a report of the action in hand to obtain satisfactory programmes."

The Minister does not say in that letter what he plans to do if he does not get satisfactory replies from those districts or if they do not go out to competitive tendering. But we know full well that he looks closely at the appointment of members of district health authorities. He looks closely at the form of tendering that is put forward by those authorities which eventually succumb to his iron fist and his threats. The Minister then goes on to encourage them to privatise. In privatising, he opposes the use of NHS wages and conditions and the use of the fair wages resolution which the Government have been kind enough to abolish so that there is now no minimum protection for the lowest-paid, predominantly women workers in Britain. The Government are then surprised when there is opposition to this disgraceful programme of destroying people's jobs.

Opposition comes from many people. Let me quote from a letter. Many will be surprised where it has come from. It is from someone who has resigned from a district health authority and says:

"My immediate occasion for taking this step is the so-called privatisation of the hospital cleaning services and the terms of the contract that we have accepted. You will recollect that when privatisation was first proposed, I expressed the view that for the hospital to be run in the spirit that it should be for the patients' sake, we ought to be concerned that all those working in it, and particularly those with direct contact with patients, should enjoy terms of service that would enable them to focus their main concern on the wellbeing of the public rather than their own. I believe that to save money by further separating the status of the professional from that of the ancillary staff would not serve this end if it means employing the latter as semi-casual labour. Certainly in my wards we value very highly the responsible and loyal work of our cleaners and the personal help that they often give to our patients and their parents."

That letter is not from a district officer of the National Union of Public Employees, which sponsors me in this House, or from any other union within the National Health Service. It is from Professor J. A. Davies, the professor of paediatrics at the University of Cambridge clinical school, department of paediatrics. He is passionately concerned about his patients in the National Health Service and is not prepared to see the service destroyed.

Throughout the country there have been a number of disputes on the issue of privatisation of jobs within the National Health Service. The Minister might sigh, as he sits down to his Christmas lunch next Tuesday, "Thank goodness I have not got to worry about Barking, Hammersmith, Addenbrooke's, High Royds, or any other hospital," but I warn him that if the Government continue on their ludicrous course of destroying employment prospects for part-time women workers in the National Health Service, and of destroying the Health Service by handing it over to their friends in the private contracting industry, they will have not three or four disputes on their hands next year but hundreds. Workers in the National Health Service, who have shown enormous dedication and loyalty to the patients, will show that they are not prepared to see their jobs destroyed.

The strike which has been running the longest is that at Barking hospital, which comes within the Redbridge district health authority. It has lasted almost as long as the miners' strike, and it is about the proposal of the contract cleaning company concerned, Crothalls, to make cuts of 40 per cent. to 60 per cent. in wages, and changes in working practices. The total hours of 87 cleaners in the hospital were to be cut by the same proportion—by 41 per cent., from 2,189 to 1,313 a week. Women earning £57 a week were expected to take cuts in hours which would mean that they would take home only £17 a week. Yet the Government show surprise at the opposition to the proposals, which involve the worsening of conditions with less sick leave, less holiday pay, less maternity leave and so on. Conditions which have been argued and fought for within the National Health Service for a long time are destroyed by privatisation.

At the Barking general hospital there have been numerous reports by people working in the hospital who are qualified to judge environmental health conditions. They say that the hospital is in a dirty, disgraceful and dangerous state, and will continue to be so as long as the authority allows a company such as Crothalls to continue to use very low-paid and unskilled labour, while other people are forced to stand outside the hospital on the picket line, trying to get themselves a decent living wage. The charge against the Government is that they are destroying the living standards of many very low-paid part-time workers within the National Health Service.

Recently there was a dispute at the Hammersmith hospital, which comes under the Hammersmith special health authority. The contract that was offered involved a cut in hours from 6,170 to 2,802 per week. Jobs were to be cut from 207 to 158, and full-time jobs were to be reduced from 122 to 28. There were to be only two weeks' annual leave after six months' service, instead of the usual NHS conditions. Disputes of that sort arise frequently throughout the country, and there will be more of them.

There is a dispute at Addenbrooke's hospital in Cambridge where Professor Davies has resigned from the health authority in disgust at the way that the Government have forced privatisation on the National Health Service. The strikers are standing outside the gates at Addenbrooke's hospital because they want the people who work there to have decent working conditions, decent standards of service and decent wages.

There are many question marks over the companies which are involved in contract cleaning, contract catering and other forms of contracting business. The firm involved in the Addenbrooke's dispute, OCS, has very limited experience of hospital cleaning, as have many other contract cleaning companies. They line up outside district health authority meetings and offer themselves as the lowest bidder for the cleaning contract in each year in each district health authority.

The National Health Service was set up to provide health care for the people of Britain. The health authorities were set up to ensure that there would be a healthy population. Under privatisation, the district health authorities become conveyancing mechanisms for passing money from the public purse into the private purse. They become a mechanism for making huge profits out of low wages and inadequate and inferior service. The authorities will rue the day when they realise how much damage they have done to the National Health Service, and to the lives of so many people who have given long and dedicated service to health authorities.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security(Mr. John Patten): The NHS hospitals are treating more patients than they have ever treated.

Mr. Corbyn: The Minister can hardly contain his excitement at this point. I shall gladly give way to him if he has something useful to say.

There are numerous examples of the failure of contract cleaners in hospitals all over Britain. I have been unable to find any cleaning contract in any part of the NHS that has not been beset by problems of greater or lesser magnitude. Hospital administrators and health authorities are concerned that they have very limited control over the standards and the methods of cleaning in hospitals.

If the Government feel proud of their performance on cleaning, what will it be like when they move on to the privatisation of the catering services, and as we see the incompetence of some of the private catering companies as they try to provide special diets which they are not qualified or capable of doing? They have not the experience of the people who work directly in the NHS.

High Royds hospital, which is within the Leeds western district health authority, is a 900-bed hospital for the mentally ill. The authority terminated the contract with Home Counties Cleaning Group because of low standards and gave the new contract to Hospital Hygiene Services. A Sunday Times report in June 1984 said that Dr. Terry Nelson, head of the hospital's medical services committee, had complained to managers about the erratic standards of the contractors. One senior nurse had complained of faeces, urine and vomit on the floors, which remained uncleaned, and there were numerous other examples of the failure of that contract. As a result, the contractors were eventually changed.

At Hinchingbrooke hospital, which is within the Huntingdon district health authority, the contract for cleaning was run by B. A. Lester when the new hosptial opened in 1983. A report by Dr. William Newsen, a bacteriologist at Papworth hospital, in January 1984, records high levels of dust in clinical areas, including laboratories. He states:

"The contractor is in breach of the contract in failing to use impregnated mops. Mops with over one inch of dust were found in the cupboards. We grew coagulate positive staphylococci, i.e. potential disease producers from three samples of the dust in the Nursery and Rowan wards."

That is not an untypical example of what happens when contract cleaning companies, with their lack of experience, work in NHS hospitals.

Why are the Government so obsessed with privatisation in NHS hospitals when they know the damage that is done by contracting services? The Government claim that the purpose of privatisation is to save money for the NHS and to allow more money to be spent on patient care. That is patently not proving to be the case. The Government have not created jobs. They have reduced wages and they have allowed enormous profits to be made by private cleaning companies. There has been a greater cost on the public purse at the other end of the DHSS, as former NHS workers become unemployed when they could be doing a good job in NHS hospitals.

My union, NUPE, has commented:

"This massacre of earnings, conditions and cleaning standards will be faced by thousands of health workers in the year ahead."

That is exactly what is happening.

There are likely to be fewer jobs in the NHS and fewer jobs in total in contract cleaning services in hospitals as privatisation goes on. Fundamentally, the motive for privatisation is very different from the motive set up and led the National Health Service for so many years. Those contract cleaning companies are concerned to make money out of the NHS and are not concerned primarily with patient care, which is what those who work in the NHS are concerned with.

In pushing privatisation in the way that they have, the Government have ensured that wage levels are automatically lower. They have ensured that every year or every two years, whatever the contract period is, workers in NHS hospitals have to sell themselves to the lowest bidder who is prepared to exploit them and to exploit the NHS at the same time.

I have some examples of the pay and conditions offered by the Merton and Sutton health authority. When the Government say that in-house tenders are acceptable and that they are prepared to allow them to be considered, it is interesting to note that they deliberately say also that Whitley agreements are not binding on contract cleaners, but they know perfectly well that they are likely to be in any in-house tenders. It is a Hobson's choice for workers in the NHS. Either they accept the in-house tender, which probably will be on NHS wages and conditions but certainly will mean much lower staffing levels, more difficult hours of work and generally inferior working conditions, or they can go out to a private cleaning company where they will get what the Government euphemistically call "the going rate" for cleaning work, which is the most exploited section of the market. The Government have an obsession with exploiting part-time women workers, and the opposition to them is mounting.

Very little publicity is given by the Government to the reports which come out regularly about the way that contracts have failed. I have an excellent report published by the west midlands regional TUC health services co-ordinating committee. It is described as a preliminary report on the 47 companies approved by the West Midlands regional health authority as being eligible to tender for contracts within the NHS for catering, domestic and laundry services. It goes through in excruciating detail the background to these companies, who the shareholders are, who put up the money for them and the number of Conservative MPs who have shares in them—a matter that was referred to in the House during the debate on the NHS in July. The co-ordinating committee feels, quite rightly, first that there is no contract which has been successful and approved of fully by any district health authority, and, secondly, that there are untold elements of corruption or the potential for corruption within the contract cleaning process and the privatisation of NHS services.

This Government are intent on destroying the NHS in many ways — by cuts, by privatisation and by the promotion of private medicine. They are also destroying the working conditions of many people who have given loyal service to the NHS for many years. For example, on 7 December this year, which is fairly up to date, of the 240 health authorities and boards, 14 were not complying and 26 had adopted fair wages clauses. As we look through the contracts increasingly being awarded, lower and lower wages are being offered as the Government use the hammer of the dole queue to force down wages of part-time workers in the NHS and to destroy the service by the same process.

It is a scandal of the highest proportions. Here we are on the eve of Christmas. The Minister might have a little compassion, although I have my doubts, and think of the fear in the minds of thousands of NHS employees next year when privatisation is threatened, with their jobs being taken away, their livelihoods destroyed and their being forced to work for private cleaning companies on lower wages and with longer hours and worse and worse working conditions.

The Government believe in the free market economy. For many of the poorest of our people, that means poverty and the dole queue. That is what the Government are trying to do through privatisation. But I can assure them that the workers in the NHS who have loyally supported the service for so long will continue to oppose privatisation. There will be disputes and there will be opposition for as long as the Government are in office. They look forward to its being replaced by a Labour Government who are determined to provide good, decent working conditions and a good, decent NHS.

10.5 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): The hon. Member for Islington, North, (Mr. Corbyn) has not exactly enhanced his reputation in the House in recent days, and I have just listened to one of the most unpleasant speeches that I have had to sit through in my five years here. The hon. Gentleman raised groundless fears and made groundless allegations. His speech was a tissue of allegations without substance.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) has been in his place on the Opposition Front Bench throughout his hon. Friend's speech. I do not seek to do the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras any personal or political damage when I say that there is a wide gap between the way in which he and his hon. Friend express their strongly held views on this issue. I always listen to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras because he talks reasonably about these issues rather than in the fatuous way that we have just heard from the hon. Member for Islington, North, who demonstrated clearly the different attitudes to the NHS between him and other right hon. and hon. Members.

Government supporters regard the NHS as being there primarily to provide a service for patients, and for no one else. We are proud that this year the NHS is treating more patients than ever before. From what the hon. Gentleman said with his repeated references to the trade union that sponsors him in the House and to the needs of trade unionists, it is clear that he believes that the NHS exists primarily for the benefit of the staff. Ancillary workers do an excellent job in the NHS, but it is the patients whom the service seeks to serve most of all. There is an unbridgeable gap between me and the hon. Member for Islington, North. Sadly, with his curious perception of the NHS, the hon. Gentleman has completely missed the point of our competitive tendering policy.

Our policy is about competitive tendering. It is not about privatisation pure and simple, because that is not its purpose. We have called for competitive tendering in the NHS to test the way in which it provides catering, cleaning and laundry services. It is a very successful policy.

We have asked domestic, catering and laundry services, which cost the NHS about £1 billion a year, to subject themselves to the same close scrutiny as that to which the private sector is subjected. It might be more comfortable to leave matters as they are. But, for too long, health authorities have accepted without question that they should provide services in hospitals by direct labour when for years they should have been asking what is the best way of providing those services in the interests of the needs of patients.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Patten: I have only a very short time. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not give way to him. I must try to reply to those matters that his hon. Friend raised.

Mr. Dobson: I do not think that I will forgive the Minister.

Mr. Patten: Health authorities should have been asking themselves what is the most cost-effective way of providing these services, because the NHS——

Mr. Dobson rose——

Mr. Patten: ——is not in the business of providing laundry, catering or hospital services.

Mr. Dobson rose——

Mr. Patten: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. If I did, it might encourage his hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North to seek to intervene and, while I am prepared formally to answer his debate, I am not prepared, after what he has done in recent weeks, to extend to him any of the normal courtesies.

If we had allowed matters to carry on as they were in the NHS, we would have missed a golden opportunity to save money that could be spent on patients. That is what this policy is about. I fail to see the logic of the complaints of the hon. Member for Islington, North. Is he saying that he does not wish to have patient services improved and that the money saved on these services should not be spent on patients? That is ludicrous.

We have told health authorities that, through competitive tendering, they should check that they are getting the best possible deal, and that they should get services provided by whoever can provide them best—in the interests of the service and of patients—whether that is a contractor or the excellent NHS in-house staff.

If a hospital's own service and staff can provide what is necessary, that is a good thing. If not, someone from the private sector should be given the opportunity. There is nothing dogmatic about that. It is a fair and even-handed policy, which is leading to substantial savings. Costs in the NHS are reduced when contracts are awarded within the service as a result of tendering.

We already have evidence that substantial savings are being made, not only by letting contracts to the private sector, but by driving down the cost of providing services within the NHS. For example, 37 contracts have been let privately and have resulted in annual savings of about £6·5 million for health authorities.

Mr. Dobson: Publish the evidence.

Mr. Patten: Two of the contracts have saved over £1 million a year.

Mr. Dobson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not contrary to our rules for the Minister to mislead the House? He is asserting that savings have been made——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman must not accuse another hon. Member of deliberately misleading the House. He must withdraw that statement.

Mr. Dobson: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I seek your advice about what I should do if I have reason to believe that what the Minister has told the House is at variance with the facts?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. Members have various views about speeches, but each hon. Member is responsible for his own speech.

Mr. Patten: The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras is falling lamentably below his usual quite high standards of debate.

Two of the contracts that have been let will save £1 million a year. The Hammersmith contract, to which the hon. Member for Islington, North referred, will save between £500,000 and £600,000 a year. Is the hon. Gentleman really saying that he would wish that money to be taken away from patients and spent on unnecessary costs? That is a ludicrous argument; it is an anti-NHS argument. It may be a pro-NUPE argument, but it is not a pro-patient argument.

The NHS has obviously been running some parts of its services inefficiently. It must examine critically the way in which it provides services and they must be provided at a high standard.

The hon. Member for Islington, North alleged that a substantial number of problems had occurred in private contracts. Because the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras has interrupted me with fatuous points of order, I have only two or three minutes in which to deal with the matters raised by the hon. Member for Islington, North.

The comments of the hon. Member for Islington, North about the Barking hospital dispute are scandalous. He said that what has been going on at the hospital is dangerous. He should substantiate that allegation or withdraw it. Even the trade unions have stopped picketing the hospital. The only people there now are representatives of a fatuous local organisation called Health Emergency, which is funded by Mr. Ken Livingstone and the GLC.

In recent days, the hospital has suffered vandalism and a series of break-ins. Hospital lavatories have been blocked and staff have been put to extreme inconvenience. None of that is in the interests of patients. It is in the interests only of the hon. Member for Islington, North and his extremist colleagues.

Mr. Corbyn: No facts, only a smear.

Mr. Patten: The hon. Member for Islington, North ought to reflect about what the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) said about him in the debate on Northern Ireland last night. How right the hon. Gentleman was in what he said about the behaviour of the hon. Member for Islington, North in recent weeks in encouraging terrorism.

I believe that we should look at the overall benefits that our policy will bring, the savings that will be achieved, the improvements in local services for NHS patients and the improvements in the efficiency of NHS management that will flow from that policy. I find it difficult to see any arguments against that cause and I shall be surprised and disappointed if the Opposition wish to deny the public such benefits, either for doctrinaire reasons or because of their associations with trade union interest groups that support the hon. Member for Islington, North.

British Expatriates

10.15 am

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): I am grateful for the opportunity of raising the important subject of the treatment of British expatriates working abroad, particularly in Nigeria and Libya.

I propose to raise a number of individual cases which are significant, but the subject is of general importance, because the growth of international trade that we hope to see will mean that there will be more expatriates working overseas. The protection of their rights and assets will remain a matter of the greatest concern to us and the responsiblity of the Foreign Office.

I am delighted to see that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton), the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, is to reply to the debate. I congratulate him on holding his office with such great distinction. I recall that many years ago I was one of a group of 15 people being interviewed. One of us was to be chosen and the process involved a long group discussion to which we all contributed. Many brash, excitable, enthusiastic young voices rushed into the discussion, eager to put forward their views.

My hon. Friend made no contribution until about two thirds of the way through the discussion when, in three sentences, he demonstrated that he had grasped the subject and seen the flaws in the arguments of others and put forward a carefully thought out, constructive approach of his own. He was chosen and his career has not looked back since. I have every reason to suppose that this debate will follow the same pattern and I look forward to the pearls of wisdom that my hon. Friend will utter.

Many thousands of British expatriates work abroad, many for foreign-owned companies, many for British companies and some for multinational companies, which often receive a bad press, but are an important link in the economic chain that binds the developing and developed worlds to each other. Some expatriates work for Governments or governmental agencies.

It would be surprising and regrettable if, as international trade grows, the number of expatriates working abroad did not increase. I believe that the number will increase. I pay tribute to the energy and enterprise of those people who do work that is of the greatest service not only to the British economy, but to the economies of the developing world.

Newly independent countries of the Third world are often sensitive about expatriates and are not uniformly welcoming. Some, like Nigeria, are the beneficiaries of immense natural resources. However meandering the present economic path of Nigeria may seem to us, its resources will be developed and exploited, with help from outside. Naturally, I hope that the help that Nigeria receives will continue to come from people in this country.

All countries of the Third world wish and need to develop their own economies. They look first for the most basic resource, which is food. In the end, aid must gradually give way to trade, and most of those countries want assistance in developing their agriculture. I recall the Christian Aid advertisement of some years ago

"Give a man a fish and you give him lunch for today; give him a fishing rod and you give him lunch for his life."

Those of us who were burdened with a classical education recall our astonishment to find that once upon a time the land between the Tigris and the Euphrates was fertile. Once upon a time Sicily was the corn centre of the civilised European world. Parts of Africa that are now desert or bush produced food. Undoubtedly there are large parts of the developing world where, with irrigation and the necessary agricultural skills, deserts could be made to bloom.

I believe that it will be increasingly the role of Western industrial countries to provide the necessary management, advice and services to make that happen. The work of the United Nations agencies alone is quite insufficient for that purpose. Whether aid is given bilaterally or multilaterally, project work must continue to expand, just as trading contacts must do. More expatriates working in Third world countries will result, however those developments take place.

I am not advocating or prophesying a revival of colonialism. Twenty-six years ago I served in what was then Tanganyika, preparing for independence under the guiding hand of the United Kingdom. I pointed out then that it would be in the interests of Tanganyikans for the connection between that country, Britain and the EEC to remain close. Sadly, the progress of that country since then has illustrated how much the skills and resources necessary to develop Tanzania's agriculture are lacking in that depressed economy.

It is essential that Third world countries recognise that the development of trade and aid will involve the work of expatriates, and that that is very much a two-way process. Just as expatriates must respect the laws of the host country and must adapt to local conditions, so the host country, too, must see that the basic rights of individuals are not infringed. The host country has an interest in protecting such individuals, whether they are buying, selling, constructing or maintaining. Expatriates from western industrial countries will play an increasingly important part in the development of the economies of Third world countries if the aspirations of their citizens are to be fulfilled.

On the other hand, the Foreign Office has a direct responsibility for expatriates and must be robust in protecting their interests, seeing that they are well briefed and provided with all necessary assistance. The Foreign Office today is at last adjusting to the changed relationships between developing and developed countries, and is recognising that trade is a vital part of the business of the Foreign Office. Undoubtedly some embassies and high commissions recognise that more, and provide a better service for expatriates than do others.

I have corresponded with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and his colleague, the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) on this subject, and now wish to mention two cases, in particular, with which I have been concerned. The first case is that of Mr. and Mrs. Strong of Shaftesbury in my constituency. Mr. Strong worked in Nigeria from 1978 until early 1982, and for the last year and a half for a Nigerian company, Lopin Ltd., which withheld his pay for six months without grounds for doing so. Mr. and Mrs. Strong suffered severe harassment, were threatened at gunpoint by the company's security guard, and lost furniture and belongings as well as a good deal of money and their passports in the process. Mr. and Mrs. Strong fully recognise that the British Government cannot be responsible for privately contracted agreements, but the efficacy of the legal processes in countries such as Nigeria is not as great as it is in Britain. It is, therefore, even more necessary for high commissions or embassies in such countries to take an active and vigorous interest in protecting the interests of British people working there.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State is aware of the details of that case, so I shall not go into further detail now. But my constituents felt—and I agree with them—that the high commission seemed to have given some indifferent advice and had certainly failed to pursue matters on their behalf with the sort of zeal and energy that they are entitled to expect. As a result of my investigation of the case of Mr. and Mrs. Strong, it became apparent that there are many other expatriates who have worked in Nigeria and who are having difficulties in securing payment of their salaries and moneys owed from their time working there.

There is now an organisation called Unpaid Personnel Nigeria, which is actively assisting its members to obtain payment of moneys they are owed. I have been in contact with the company Expatriates International Limited, which runs a magazine and provides services to expatriates. About 7,000 members of that organisation are assisted by it in avoiding some of the worst pitfalls that are to be found by those seeking work for foreign employer companies. The organisation has encouraged those owed money to submit claims to a London bank before the IMF was prepared to lend Nigeria further money. That is certainly one way of trying to secure the payment of moneys that are owed.

It has to be recognised that in the context of Nigeria companies employing expatriates can often use the protection of their Government or of those in authority there to avoid the payment of moneys that are due. That is why this is a matter with which the British Government should be concerned. My hon. Friend the Minister of State and his colleague Baroness Young have been helpful in looking into the facts of this, and other such Nigerian cases generally. But in my view there comes a point at which Government-to-Government pressure has to be applied. I should like to see that pressure applied, and I urge my hon. Friend to take up all such matters with the Nigerian Government. I hope that he will put the repayment of moneys to expatriates on the table in any bilateral negotiations, and will also raise this issue at the EEC level.

I also wish to raise the case of my constituent, Malcolm Pike of Blandford, whose experience in Libya is altogether different, but illustrates again the need for vigilance on the part of our Foreign Office in protecting British people working abroad. Mr. Malcolm Pike had worked in Libya for a company called Lomond Engineering between August 1980 and June 1982, but was unable to secure employment thereafter on his return to Britain. He therefore accepted an offer of work from Lomond Engineering again, and went to Libya in June 1983, following that company's nationalisation.

Mr. Pike's task was to assist in finalising the claim for compensation with the National Petroleum Services Company of Libya and to assist in dealing with the tax office in view of his previous experience with the company and knowledge of its affairs. It subsequently appeared that the company had substantial tax liabilities and the only other employees of the company left Libya, leaving Mr. Pike to continue his work. The two executives in the company to whom he was reporting became impossible to contact, and despite various assurances Mr. Pike has been left in Libya without pay and is owed a substantial sum of unpaid salary and expenses. He is not allowed to leave the country as, under Libyan law, he can be held hostage for the unpaid tax of his employer company. Mr. Pike is now subsisting on the generosity of friends, without money or work. Despite the admirable efforts of the British Government's representative in Libya, Mr. George Anderson, he is in effect being detained there.

It must be clear by now to the Libyan authorities that the employer lacks resources, and is abundantly clear that Mr. Pike has no funds himself. My constituent faces a bleak Christmas. His case should be an awful warning to anyone contemplating work for such a company in a country that has such an oppressive law enabling it to hold tax hostages. I know that my constituent's parents will, like me, much appreciate all efforts that my hon. Friend can exert to secure the release of that young man in Libyan limbo.

I have drawn these two cases to my hon. Friend's attention because of the important work available for British expatriates to carry out in developing countries and because of the need to ensure that they are encouraged to do so rather than deterred by the unfortunate circumstances of my constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Strong and Mr. Malcolm Pike.

My hon. Friend will have my full support in strong measures to convince the Governments of the foreign countries concerned, however delicate relations may be, that the duty and determination of the British Government are to ensure that British citizens are protected and their rights safeguarded.

My message is that British expatriates working abroad do an invaluable job, but are entitled to expect the support and positive assistance of the Government. I look forward to hearing what my hon. Friend has to say.

10.32 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Renton): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) for raising this important subject on an Adjournment debate. He recalled that many years ago, he and I were together on a selection interview committee. I think the seat involved was Sheffield, Park division—which, despite its salubrious name, was described in the local paper as being a roll-call for all the council houses and tower blocks in Sheffield. It was an extremely safe seat for Labour, which was duly won, again in the forthcoming general election, by the present Lord Mulley. Since then, my hon. Friend has gone on to what might be described as the greener pastures of Dorset, and I to the greener pastures of Sussex. Perhaps we have both benefited from the experience of appearing before the selection interview committee.

My hon. Friend quoted from his classical knowledge to remind us of the days when some of the countries of northern Africa which are now threatened by drought and famine were the corn belt of the then civilised world. As he said, while it may be hard for deserts to bloom again, there is no doubt that one of the great challenges to trade and aid working together in the years ahead will be that of tackling the increasing problem of drought, over-population and too many animals, that lead to the severe famine that we are now seeing in Ethiopia and Sudan.

As my hon. Friend rightly said, there is a role for expatriates from western countries to help in that process. He referred to the number of expatriates and the important task that they carry out. I wholeheartedly endorse his words. Many expatriates work for British companies. They assist not only the countries where they are based but help Britain to regain trade that we may have lost and to bid for important new contracts that would be of great benefit to our manufacturers.

The size of the problem is mirrored in the number of expatriates. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office believe that there are between 5 million and 6 million. While for many of them the work that they do is very important to this country, they must accept that they must abide by the laws and regulations of their host countries. At times, they must adapt their own living styles to comply with local customs.

My hon. Friend called for vigilance from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, but I am sure that he will endorse my belief that those going to work abroad must themselves be vigilant in considering the living conditions and the laws of the countries where they want to work, and accepting that they will not be the same as those in the United Kingdom

It is worth repeating that living in other countries is not the same as living in Britain. Expatriate workers must make judgments based on many factors. They will no doubt receive high and, in many cases, tax-free salaries as an inducement. They often have good living conditions. But they must remember other factors such as local customs, security conditions and the fact that the drinking of alcohol may be banned, all of which will make their lives different. It is not possible for Britain to tell other countries what their laws should be, any more than we expect other countries to tell us what our laws should be.

Britain has had exchange control regulations in the past. We might — God forbid — under a Labour Government have such regulations again. Britain has managed to get rid of them but other countries have not. That has a bearing on the flow of salaries and pensions from other countries to workers who have returned to the United Kingdom, and I shall mention more about that in relation to Nigeria. We cannot automatically expect other countries to follow suit when we make a change for the better. It is worth remembering that the laws of countries change because of a change of Government, and they sometimes deprive expatriates of rights that they expected when they went to work in those countries.

Our consulates department is open every day of the year, other than Christmas day, to advise people who are intending to travel. It is important that would-be expatriate workers find out as much as possible about the country that they intend to visit. We shall do all that we properly can to protect them. To assist with advice before expatriates travel, my Department, in conjunction with the Central Office of Information, has produced a leaflet entitled with the subtitle

"What the British consulate can do for you, what the British consulate cannot do for you and what you should do for yourself".

I am pleased to say that last week, on behalf of my Department, I accepted a plain English award for the leaflet——

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Hear, hear.

Mr. Renton: I am glad to have the approbation of my hon. Friend.

The first print of the leaflet—700,000—has already been used and we intend to have an even larger reprint next year. This graphic leaflet spells out the role of the consul. It makes it clear that consuls abroad are not lawyers, doctors or nannies. They are there to advise and help those who are in difficulties. Their role especially is to advise those who are in difficulties on how to get good local professional help. Their job is to offer helpful and realistic advice, which may at times be unpalatable. I strongly suggest to hon. Members that they suggest to their constituents who are considering working abroad that they read the leaflet or get in touch with the consular department before they go.

We are conscious that more Britons are working abroad as well as travelling abroad for their holidays. This means that the volume of work for our consular staff is increasing. We are confident that the staff is working well. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office keeps staffing levels under constant review so that, in spite of cuts in a few places, temporary or permanent staff reinforcements are sent out as necessary. I have already referred to the 5 million expatriates who are working abroad. In addition, 25 million Britons go abroad on holiday. My hon. Friend will realise the burden of the workload that falls on the 292 diplomatic service officers abroad who are involved in full-time consular work along with another 170 locally engaged staff. Thus, a total of 462 are involved solely in consular work. That has to be measured against the 5 million expatriates and the 25 million who go abroad on holiday. It is correct that all our ambassadors and high commissioners are actively interested in consular work. It is against that background that we give strong advice to those going to live or work abroad to find out about local conditions in advance. That must be said in the light of the volume of work that comes over the desks of our consular officials.

I recognise the strong merit of my hon. Friend's remarks and I turn to the two places that he has mentioned. First, I direct myself to the difficult case of Mr. and Mrs. Strong and the sad experience that they had with Mr. Strong's employer in Nigeria. As my hon. Friend probably knows, there are 11,000 British citizens who remain in Nigeria; many more have returned to the United Kingdom. I fully understand from the details that my hon. Friend has given why he felt that he should become involved in the case.

Mr. and Mrs. Strong's difficulties in Nigeria were first brought to our attention in London in April 1983, more than a year after they had left Nigeria. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentland (Mr. Rifkind), Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, has had lengthy correspondence with my hon. Friend. I refer especially to his letters of 29 December 1983 and 9 February 1984. By and large, the high commissioner could not intervene in what was a private contractoral dispute for settlement through legal channels. It would be useful if my hon. Friend were to remind Mr. and Mrs. Strong that when it comes to fair treatment for Britons employed by Nigerian companies, contracts of employment between British citizens and Nigerian companies are essentially private matters between employee and employer. Her Majesty's Government have no standing to intervene when things go wrong.

[Mr. Renton]

Our high commissioner in Nigeria, as elsewhere, is willing to give advice and formulae should a dispute arise but if, as in Mr. and Mrs. Strong's case, an amicable settlement cannot be reached, the employee has to seek legal advice and pursue his complaint through his own legal channels. Mr. and Mrs. Strong's case is a private matter and we have no standing to negotiate a code of practice with the Nigerian Government for employment in the private sector. Equally, we would not expect the Nigerian Government to try to negotiate a similar code of employment for Nigerians working in Britain.

I turn from the particular to the general and to my hon. Friend's point about the problem and delay in obtaining remittances of salaries, pensions or other payments that are due from Nigeria. He will realise that the difficulties are caused by the shortage of foreign exchange in Nigeria and the prolonged recession combined with Nigerian bureaucratic confusion and delay. Her Majesty's Government have no legal standing in individual cases but my hon. Friend has asked for Government-to-Government pressure to be brought. I can assure him that that is the sort of pressure that we have been trying to bring to bear. We have tackled the problem on several occasions, including approaches at ministerial level, and we have received assurances that financial commitments will be met and that remittances will eventually come through, although the delays may be lengthy.

One member of the high commission in Lagos is employed virtually full time in taking action with the central bank to expedite remittance applications when progress in individual cases appears to have stopped. This has helped to achieve a successful outcome in many cases, including some where delay in receiving payment is causing especial hardship. However, the only long-term solution to the problem is an improvement in Nigeria's economy. We shall continue to work with the Nigerian Government and in consultation with the International Monetary Fund towards this end.

I am glad that, earlier in the year, Mr. and Mrs. Strong finally received their passports from Nigeria. I know that the return of their passports was due in no small measure to the hard work of my hon. Friend in pressing for that to happen.

I turn from the problems of Mr. and Mrs. Strong in Nigeria to those of Mr. Malcolm Pike, who is in Libya. This is a very difficult case. My hon. Friend will know that there are about 5,000 British citizens living and working in Libya. We have had no diplomatic relations with Libya in the past months. Relations were severed after the tragic murder of Policewoman Fletcher in April and the subsequent Libyan embassy seige. The Italian embassy in Tripoli has been our main channel of communication since then with the Libyan authorities. We are generally confident that, thanks to their help and our own British interests section in Tripoli, which is staffed by two diplomatic service officers, we are able to do everything possible to protect the interests of British citizens who remain working in Libya.

We first heard of Mr. Pike's case in June. Mr. Pike is an accountant and he has been held responsible by the Libyan authorities for the debts of the company for which he works, which is Lomond Engineering. He is not in prison but the Libyans have been holding his passport. Mr. Pike's solicitors in London are also pursuing the matter with the London office of Lomond Engineering. My hon. Friend referred to Mr. George Anderson, who was our consul in Tripoli. His place has been taken in recent weeks by Mr. Hugh Dunnachie. Mr. Dunnachie has been in frequent touch with Mr. Pike. I understand that their last meeting was about 10 days ago. I am happy to tell my hon. Friend that our consul believes that Mr. Pike's difficulties are gradually being resolved.

I have just been passed a note saying that Mr. Pike has now been able to leave Libya by arranging to allow a deputy to substitute for a while. Doubtless, that will be of great help to Mr. Pike and it will be specially welcome news with the Christmas holiday just ahead.

Mr. Pike is involved in a commercial dispute in which, for the reasons I have stated, it is not proper for the Government to intervene. Her Majesty's consul on the spot is giving Mr. Pike all the assistance he can properly give.

I have spoken about these two individual cases and the inevitable volume of work that comes to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office generally and to the consular section in particular in dealing with the large number of expatriates working abroad and Britons going on holiday abroad. I remind the House that the consular section of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is open every day, save Christmas. Those on the staff do their utmost to give sound advice to the Britons about to leave Britain to work or for a holiday. I believe that it would be in the Christmas spirit if the whole House were to use this opportunity to send its good wishes and thanks to all our diplomatic officers who are serving overseas during this holiday period, whether in embassies, high commissions or consulates, for the difficult task they do and the manner in which they perform that task with limited resources.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: I certainly join in the Christmas wish my hon. Friend has expressed to all our diplomatic staff. I thank him for his reply about Mr. Malcolm Pike. On other occasions, an arrangement of a substitute to take his place has been in train and has not taken place. My hon. Friend's news is welcome, and I hope that it will result in my constituent being able to join his parents for Christmas. Will my hon. Friend encourage Mr. Hugh Dunnachie to continue the kind assistance he is obviously giving? I shall be completely happy with the conclusion only when my constituent is able to leave Libya and return home.

Mr. Renton: I thank my hon. Friend for those remarks. Mr. Dunnachie is the consul who recently took Mr. Anderson's place in Tripoli. I fully understand my hon. Friend's comments, and I have no doubt that Mr. Dunnachie will pursue the course my hon. Friend has requested.

I shall end in the spirit of Christmas and goodwill—I hope the House will not mind this — and quote a message sent on 12 October 1984 to the high commission in Lagos. In part, it reads:

> "I am writing to thank you and your consular staff for all support, help and advice that was so freely given over the past two weeks. That they were able to complete so much in settling affairs was due in no small part to the active and willing involvement of your consular staff."

It is always nice to end a debate with a bouquet, and I am sure that the whole House will be pleased to know that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office regularly receives such bouquets.

City and Hackney District Health Authority

10.53 am

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): I am delighted to be able to participate in this Adjournment debate. It is the Friday before Christmas, and I am looking forward to going to Venice; so one is more emollient in this debate than one might otherwise be.

I raise an important issue, because, to put it mildly, these have been unhappy times for the City and Hackney district health authority. Only just over a year ago there was a riot at a meeting of the authority. On that occasion, I had to escort the authority chairman out in order to protect him. That involved me in sharp political criticism. However, I am glad that we got him out of the meeting in good order.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Louis Freedman, who has just retired as chairman of the City and Hackney health authority—I think I could call him a high Tory and a millionaire racehorse owner—expressed some unhappiness about the Department of Health and Social Security. He thought that decisions had been taken too quickly and that the authority had not been allowed to adapt to new circumstances. I would put it more strongly and say that the closure of the hospital is creating great discomfort and unhappiness in Hackney.

Mr. Freedman has gone, and Mr. Evan Stone has taken his place. I am sure that the Under-Secretary of State will be pleased to note that I do not intend attacking Mr. Stone. I should have preferred Mr. Donald Hoodless, whom I and the community health authority recommended to the post, but Mr. Stone is in office and he must be judged on his performance and not condemned before he starts.

As it happens, neither Mr. Stone nor Mr. Hoodless came from Hackney or the City. I believe that they both came from Islington. It is worrying that there are fewer local people on the City and Hackney district health authority than on any other health authority. I may be wrong, but I should be surprised to hear otherwise. Well under half of its members live either in the City or in Hackney.

We talk a great deal about devolving powers to the people, taking power from central Government and local people knowing what is best for them. I believe that that is right. I am not sure why Hackney has been picked out for preferment. Why is it that, of all the areas in Britain, it is in the City and Hackney that there are thought to be insufficient decent people able to conduct the affairs of their own health authority? That cannot be right, and it is time that Ministers started to shift the balance.

One of the reasons for this action concerns the conduct of some members on the authority and the events that followed the occupation of St. Leonard's hospital. Following the Minister's announcement of the effective closure of St. Leonard's hospital, an occupation occurred in the summer. Following that occupation, disciplinary action was taken against Miss Andrea Campbell and Mr. Geoffrey Craig. Miss Campbell was a shop steward for the Confederation of Health Service Employees and Mr. Craig was a shop steward for the National Union of Public Employees. They were dismissed as a result of that disciplinary hearing, and they then appealed. I did not give evidence at the original hearing, but I did so at the appeal on behalf of both those people. I believe that, when selecting members of a district health authority, one must select members who not only can carry out the administration properly, fairly and justly, but can carry out tribunal hearings properly, fairly and justly.

I have been puzzled about the reasons why disciplinary proceedings were taken against those two people. Thousands of people in Hackney were involved in the occupation. I went to the hospital both during and following the occupation. I spoke to members of NUPE and to nurses sitting on the wall outside waiting for vehicles to take them home. I spoke at meetings composed of hundreds of workers, most of whom worked at that hospital. They all supported the occupation. One might say that the occupation was right or that it was wrong. One might say that it was responsible or that it was irresponsible. It is extraordinary to note that, of all the workers who supported the occupation, only two were picked out to be the subject of disciplinary hearings.

I have tried to find out from Mr. John Dennis, the district administrator, why he acted in that way. Is it that he wants war and not peace? Does he think that adopting a hard line will help him to be the general manager of the authority? If society is to act fairly—I speak as a barrister—one cannot arbitrarily pick out two people from the hundreds involved in a particular industrial dispute and say, "We will subject you to condign criticism, we will punish you publicly; we will make you scapegoats; we will set an example; we will show the public that we are not prepared to tolerate this by picking out two individuals."

In addition to the workers who started the occupation, there were thousands of members of the public. What is more important, if I can catch the Minister's ear for a few moments—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I apologise. I was consulting my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary for the Environment.

Mr. Sedgemore: I am glad that the Department of the Environment and the Department of Health and Social Security liaise. It does not always happen but perhaps a change for the better is coming.

It is also noteworthy that at least one third of the members of the district health authority supported the occupation, and, rightly or wrongly, that the two local Members of Parliament supported it.

As I said at the appeal hearing, the district health authority might have liked to try the two Members of Parliament and the one third of its own members, and it might have liked to take disciplinary proceedings against members of the public. Given that all these people with all these different roles in public and private life were involved in that occupation, how could one take those two individuals and say, "It is just you two whom we are bringing before this tribunal."

The first tribunal which dealt with Miss Andrea Campbell's case upheld her appeal and said that it would remove the dismissal notices and that she would be given a warning.

When I gave evidence to the tribunal, I found that it was relaxed, friendly and courteous. As I was giving evidence, I did not know what decision it would reach. The tribunal seemed to be conducted properly. When I gave evidence to the tribunal which dealt with Mr. Geoffrey Craig, it was rather different. To put it mildly, it was cold, abrupt and unfriendly. The tribunal consisted of Sir Robin Brooks, who was in the chair, Mr. D. Joines, a former treasurer of the authority, and a Miss B. M. Bartram, who is a nursing officer. I did not find their conduct satisfactory, which is why I am raising this matter, because I am not sure that the three of them should be members of the district health authority. If they are about to retire, I hope that their membership will not be renewed.

I do not want to be unkind to Sir Robin. I suppose that one way to describe him is to say that he is a dinosaur living in the wrong age; another would be to say that he is the sarcophagus of a philosophical theory that has perhaps seen its day. I detect from his conduct of the tribunal and his general conduct at the meetings of the district health authority that he appears to be motivated by political ideology, if not by spite.

I am unhappy about the way in which that tribunal was conducted. I am unhappy that one of the members of the district health authority, Ms. Lucy De Groot, gave evidence, but was not allowed to make a statement. After she had been asked some questions, she asked whether she could make a statement at the end of her evidence. That is a normal practice at a tribunal, as I know from my experience at the Bar. She was abruptly and discourteously told that she could not make that statement.

I have also spoken to Miss Dorothy Hardman, who conducted the case on behalf of Mr. Geoffrey Craig. She was treated in an unfriendly and discourteous manner. When tribunal hearings are being conducted, and when there is such sensitivity and public opinion has been outraged—there have been many difficulties over the past years—these things should be done differently.

I was also disturbed by the manner in which I was questioned at the second tribunal, not because I cannot handle it—good Lord, I used to go into the courts every day of the week—but by the way in which Mr. Joines seemed to be injecting prejudice into his questions. That is all right for a defence barrister in a criminal case where there might be a question of life or death or of someone getting three or five years' imprisonment, but in an orthodox tribunal hearing interested in the possible dismissal of an employee, people should not ask questions, all of which are leading, and seem to inject the prejudice of the questioner. What that and the whole atmosphere suggested was that the people on the tribunal had made up their minds before they had heard the evidence. That appeared to be borne out by the fact that, having heard the evidence over a number of days, the tribunal retired for about five minutes and reached an extraordinarily quick decision. It seems inconceivable that it could during that time have weighed up and balanced the evidence given at that hearing.

We should ask whether the three people involved in the hearing are fit to run tribunals. We should question whether they should now be on the district health authority. I have talked to many people and many MPs involved with the Health Service and they say that the City and Hackney district health authority has a reputation for being hopelessly out of date with its industrial relations. I do not know the history of that because I am fairly new to the area. I hope that the Minister is prepared to appoint more younger and more local people to that district health authority so that we can have a new start. If the Minister can tell me that——

Mr. John Patten: On a point of clarification, the Department does not appoint members to district health authorities; they are appointed by the regional health authority. The ministerial appointment to the district health authority is that of the chairman. The hon. Gentleman's remarks might best be addressed to the chairman of the regional health authority rather than to me.

Mr. Sedgemore: I am grateful to the Minister for that information. We all know the way that these political processes work. The region should be appointing, with the Minister's encouragement, more younger and more local people to the district health authority.

If when he replies the Minister can assure us that he will encourage such appointments, we can all go home for Christmas even happier and I can have an even more pleasant time in Venice than I would otherwise have.

11.5 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I hope that the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) has an agreeable and enjoyable time in that most beautiful of cities. I must apologise to the hon. Gentleman for appearing momentarily not to be paying his speech the closest attention. I was in consultation with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) whom I am happy to see on the Front Bench. He was telling me that in an earlier manifestation as one of my predecessors in the Department, he had answered a similar debate from another hon. Member from the area. My hon. Friend has a distinguished career in answering Adjournment debates. Indeed, today, 21 December 1984, will see my hon. Friend breaking his ton and answering his 100th Adjournment debate.

There are a number of things for which I must thank the hon. Gentleman. I join in the thanks of Mr. Freedman, for his actions during that unruly health authority meeting — which it is best to draw a veil over and to forget— for helping to protect him. The hon. Gentleman's considerable size and stature and his expertise, no doubt acquired during his distinguished rugby-playing career, must have helped a great deal when he protected Mr. Louis Freedman during the problems that were facing him during that lamentable series of occurrences.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health and myself are all deeply indebted to Mr. Freedman for the work that he did as chairman of the health authority. We wish his successor, Mr. Stone, a distinguished Queen's counsel, good fortune in what he does as chairman of the authority in the future.

I entirely share the hon. Gentleman's views about Mr. Hoodless. He is a man with an exceptional record and, because he has that exceptional record, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has recently renewed his appointment as a member of the regional health authority, where he has done such good work for such a long time. I know Mr. Hoodless and I greatly respect what he has done for both housing and health over the years. I hope that people will continue to give public service in the selfless way that he has during his career thus far.

When my right hon. Friend selects people to serve as chairmen of regional health authorities, as members of regional health authorities and chairmen of district health authorities, he invariably seeks, on the advice of officials, colleagues and people who know the community to appoint those people whom he believes will do the job best. I am convinced that the regional health authority that appoints members to the district health authority does exactly the same with regard to the City and Hackney district health authority.

I was looking at the list of members, and without wishing to read it out or go through their high personal qualities, the authority is lucky to have such a strong membership. I do not share the hon. Gentleman's views of Sir Robin Brook. We have complete confidence in the work of members of district health authorities such as Sir Robin and nominees of, for example, the TUC, such as Ms. de Groot. We are very lucky to have such people to help us to carry out Government policy, reflect the interests and demands of local people and help to mould health care in the City and Hackney area.

The hon. Gentleman made two real points. One concerned his feeling that the balance of the district health authority membership was not quite right, and that there were not enough young people on it. One often hears such a complaint about public bodies. Sometimes it is hard to find younger people to take up the job, which is understandable, because of the careers that they are following, they are just married, have mortgages to pay and all the other problems that make people say, "No, I shall not do a job at 30 or 40 that I shall be content to do at 50 or 60." It is a pity, but it is understandable. I shall draw the contents of the hon. Gentleman's speech to the attention of the chairman of the regional health authority. I shall send him a copy of Hansard so that he can read what the hon. Gentleman said and in future years, with his authority and membership panel, take the hon. Gentleman's feelings into account because I know that the hon. Gentleman does his best to reflect the feelings of those whom he represents.

The hon. Gentleman's second point, which was substantial, concerned his fears about the conduct of a tribunal that led to disciplinary action in a couple of cases. I know that he is motivated by the interests of the individuals and of making sure that natural justice was observed and they were treated properly. His own distinguished legal career suits him well for that purpose.

However, it would be inappropriate and probably highly improper of me to comment in any way on the details of the case raised by the hon. Gentleman because it is entirely a matter for the health authorities concerned. In a sense, the issue is also sub judice as regards his constituent and those authorities. Under standard Whitley council procedures agreed between employer and employee, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has no locus whatsoever in the case. I should like to explain that.

I was interested to see the facts when, through the assiduity of one of the characteristically alert civil servants whom we employ in the Department of Health and Social Security, I was warned that this topic was likely to be the one that my hon. Friend would raise. I am sorry, I meant the hon. Gentleman. I must not carry the Christmas spirit too far.

Each district health authority has procedures for dealing with disciplinary matters concerning its employees. They are set out in the authority's terms and conditions of service for its staff. They are based on the nationally agreed procedures set out in the Whitley council handbook, that voluminous and detailed tome. A district health authority's terms and conditions of service set out the full procedures for disciplinary matters — from warnings, either oral or written, through suspension to dismissal. In cases where the action leads finally to dismissal there is provision — as there is for written reprimand or warning — for appeal to the health authority. The procedure for such appeals is in turn set out in the authority's standing orders. All district health authorities up and down the land have that procedure written into their standing orders.

If an appeal to the authority is unsuccessful, the matter does not end there. The employee can seek redress elsewhere if he or she wishes. There is provision under section 40 of the general Whitley council handbook — which might be interesting Christmas reading for the hon. Gentleman in Venice — for an employee of a district health authority who has exhausted its procedures to seek an appeal to the appropriate regional health authority. Whether an appeal is granted is not a matter for Ministers but is entirely at the discretion of the regional health authority. The decision is for it. It has the responsibility for deciding whether there are grounds for an appeal. If the regional health authority decides that there are no grounds for such an appeal or if an appeal is heard and turned down, there is no provision for appeal beyond the regional health authority. Neither the Department of Health and Social Security nor Ministers, including the Secretary of State and my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health, have any locus in the matter.

That is the sequence of events under National Health Service procedures. For completeness, I should also mention, although I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is also aware of this, that an employee who feels that he has been unfairly dismissed can appeal to an industrial tribunal for it to review his case. The employee has to apply within three months of the date of dismissal.

Those are the procedures for disciplinary action and dismissal of district health authority employees. As I have explained, the Secretary of State, because of the very nature of an agreement between employer and employee and not for any other reason, is not involved at any stage. It would therefore be totally inappropriate for me to comment on the events described by the hon. Gentleman or, indeed, to respond to his specific questions. In this case, it would be doubly inappropriate because I understand that that case is in a sense sub judice. I am advised that the hon. Gentleman's constituent has appealed against his dismissal, as is his right, and City and Hackney health authority heard his appeal at three hearings on 12 and 19 November and 4 December, and that its recommendation went to the full authority for ratification or otherwise only last Monday, 17 December. When the appellant is notified of the result, he will need to consider what his next steps, if any, will be. I have tried to outline, in the hope of being as helpful as I can, what the next stages might be.

The hon. Gentleman said that the dismissal of his constituent was a draconian punishment. He criticised the members of the authority who heard the appeal, one of them quite forcibly. If the appeal is upheld by the full authority—I do not know what the result is—no doubt he will criticise it as well. He is, of course, entitled to his opinions on those matters, but this morning I cannot and must not comment on them because they are not issues that concern Ministers. That is not because we do not care about the fate of individuals who work in the NHS but because it would be totally wrong for Ministers to seek to intervene and vary procedures that have been set down through agreements that have been freely entered into between employer and employee. That is not what I would seek to do. I am sure that criticism would rain down on our heads if we sought to do so at any stage. In this particular case, we must await the outcome of events.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like to mention this matter before the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security leaves.

The House is in some difficulty. An important decision was made yesterday on the Gillick case about advice on contraception to girls under the age of 16. Naturally, one thought that there would be a statement to the House this morning. Late last night question 162 for written answer on this subject was tabled, and obviously there will be an answer in Hansard when we return on 9 January. I wonder whether you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, could consult Mr. Speaker to see whether there is any way in which the House can be protected in such a case, when on the last day before a recess something of national importance occurs. The Minister for Health will have either to accept or to reject the idea of altering legislation. Naturally our constituents, especially general practitioners, will be concerned—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman must not pursue the argument. It is not a matter for me. The Minister is here, and there are several other important matters about which the House would like to be informed.

Mr. John Patten: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Government do not control the sitting patterns of the courts, which take their decisions on days that suit them. The decision happened to be taken yesterday by the court. Further, the matter is still within the courts as my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health has announced his intention to appeal to the House of Lords against the decision.

Mr. Pavitt: I am most grateful.

Drinking and Driving

11.19 am

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): First, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I wish you and all my parliamentary colleagues a very happy Christmas. This debate on drinking and driving very much concerns the festive season. Christmas is a joyous time for everyone, but drinking and driving is a sombre topic. Every year some 1,200 people die as a result of road traffic accidents in which drink is a contributory factor. In 1983, 109 pedestrians were killed and 1,077 injured by vehicles driven by people who failed the breath test. It may be of interest to note, too, that one third of car drivers and motor cyclists who are killed have more than the prescribed limit of alcohol in their blood. On Friday and Saturday nights, between 10 pm and 4 am, the proportion rises to a dramatic two thirds.

There must be a responsible reaction to the problem. Many people in the licensed trade are as concerned as I am, but the public at large is desperately short of facts and information. We must make a concentrated effort to inform people of the effects of alcohol, the penalties for drunk driving, the relationship of various drinks to blood alcohol levels, and so on. Some members of the licensed trade have been extremely helpful. The Wine and Spirit Association recently produced a 15-minute videotape entitled "Alcohol Abuse — What Must Be Done". A copy has been placed in the Library. It acknowledges that it does not give answers but merely poses the questions, but it is an ideal introduction for discussion purposes, especially among young people in youth clubs and so on.

The Brewers Society has produced three road safety films to make young people aware of the dangers of drinking and driving and on 18 December it launched a nationwide campaign under the title, and much material has been produced in connection with that. I am glad to see that my hon. Friend the Minister of State is to answer the debate. As we have come to expect each year, the Department of Transport has launched its own campaign. That, too, is greatly to be welcomed.

"Don't gamble with your licence"

It is important to deal with some of the myths about drinking. For example, spirits are not invariably more dangerous than beer or wine. A product called "double gin and tonic" in 175 ml bottles can be drunk straight from the bottle but the strength of 11·4 per cent. is no greater than table wine. Spirits diluted in that way may be considerably less strong than some sherries. When mixed with tonic and the like, spirits are not nearly as strong as many people think. The key to any valid campaign to ensure a reduction in the tragic waste of human life through drinking and driving must be the principle of moderation. The aureum mediocritatem or golden mean of the Roman poet Horace is indeed a good guide to us all in this as in every aspect of life.

Alcohol in moderation can be beneficial. People who drink in moderation—under 20 units per week for men and 13 units per week for women—are likely to live longer and suffer fewer heart attacks than teetotallers. I am sorry to hear that teetotallers have been singled out as likely to suffer more, but that is substantiated by medical evidence. That, too, is part of the dilemma. Although in many cases alcohol can be beneficial, if taken to excess it can, like most other things, be positively harmful and dramatically dangerous not just to those who consume it but, more importantly, to innocent bystanders caught up in the tragic results of drinking and driving. I should explain at this point that one unit of alcohol is roughly equivalent to a single whisky, one glass of wine or half a pint of ordinary beer or cider.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on the Government campaign, which has been described as the "Stay Low" campaign. Although there has been much controversey about the campaign and the title has unfortunately been misleading, there is a beneficial aspect in that the campaign has been far more widely debated than it otherwise might have been. I hope that my hon. Friend will make it clear again today that to be fully safe people must not drink at all when they drive. In fairness to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, I will read the press release in its entirety, as that is indeed the message that comes across. It reads as follows:

"Don't drink any alcohol at all if you are going to drive. That's the only way to be sure you won't be affected by drink and liable to be convicted of a drink-drive offence.

And it's the best safeguard you can give yourself that you won't be involved in an accident.

Although the 'breathalyser' law puts a limit of 35 microgrammes of alcohol per 100 millilitres on drivers' breath, you can still be prosecuted below that limit if a policeman thinks your driving ability is impaired by alcohol.

So the only way to be certain is not to drink. That's what the Department of Transport means by its advice to drivers this Christmas to stay low—very low."

Taking the press release as a whole, that is clearly the message.

People must also be made aware of the cumulative effect of alcohol. An advocate who has represented many defendents charged with drinking and driving offences has pointed out that many people do not realise that a drink at lunchtime, for example, materially affects the degree of driving impairment if the person concerned has another drink before going home, because the earlier drink may not have been fully dissipated by that time. Equally, a person who goes out on a massive drinking spree in the evening and then sleeps for six hours or more—my hon. Friend the Minister of State and I have to manage on much less to carry out our parliamentary duties—he may think that he has "slept off" the effects, whereas in fact when he gets into his car the next morning he may still be substantially over the limit and therefore driving unlawfully.

I shall not go into the subject of the somewhat controversial intoximeter designed to measure the level of alcohol, the limit being 80 mg per 100 litres of blood or 35 mcg per 100 millilitres on the breath. We know that some free pardons have already been issued to people wrongfully convicted on evidence involving the Lion intoximeter. Nevertheless, even at a level of 50 millilitres per 100 litres of blood, driving is impaired although the level of alcohol is below the legal limit. A person with that amount of alcohol in his blood is already three times more likely to have an accident than if he had taken no alcohol at all. We must do more to warn and inform.

The Government commissioned a study of alcohol policy, and the report was ready in 1979, but it has never been published in Britain. It was published in Sweden. It recommended that the Government should make a policy statement on alcohol, but that has not been done. There is a great need for information about alcohol and its effects. In 1981, Government expenditure on health education advertising about alcohol was less than 5 per cent. of what the alcohol industry spent on advertising, which was about £100 million. The Government receive in revenue, directly and through VAT, about £6,000 million a year from the sale of alcohol. It is not too much to ask them to spend more than £5 million on health education.

Yet people still do not know the consequences. In 1982, the British Crime Survey contacted more than 3,000 drivers who provided information on drinking and driving since the beginning of 1981. The alarming statistic—one of many that I could quote but with which I shall not detain the House—is that about 40 per cent. of males aged between 16 and 30 who were over the limit and, therefore, driving unlawfully believed that they would pass a breathalyser test after drinking five units of alcohol.

One way of dealing with the problem that is within the power of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is to include something in the highway code about the effects of alcohol and the consequences of disobeying the law. That has the attraction of simplicity in getting across the message, and it means that one can be satisfied that at least once in a driver's life he will have had brought to his attention the consequences of disobeying the law and the effects of alcohol, because everyone must pass an examination on the highway code as part of the driving test.

Alcohol is eliminated from the body at a rate approximately equivalent to half a pint of beer or a single measure of spirits each hour. Of course, that is not uniform. A lighter person has less water in his body than does a heavier person and will reach a higher blood-alcohol level for a given consumption. The elimination of alcohol cannot be quickened. Coffee — popularly believed to be an antidote—may keep one awake, but it does not reduce the alcohol level. Therefore, it was with great anxiety that I saw about four weeks ago the launch of a product called "Alcaway". Its advertisement describes it as "the answer for all those occasions when a person has consumed more alcohol than he or she had intended."

Under the heading

"How much will it affect my alcohol level?"

the advertisement states:

"It depends. Perhaps 25 per cent. — or a 32 per cent. reduction. It could be as high as 45 per cent. On average about 30 per cent."

That is grossly iresponsible advertising. In view of what I have said about the inability to reduce the blood alcohol level, the advertisement could be extremely misleading.

Is there any validity in those claims? That was considered by Mr. John Teller, the director of Avon Council on Alcoholism in Bristol. He noted that it had been claimed recently in the press that blood alcohol levels can fall by as much as 77 per cent. in 30 minutes. He contacted Mr. Peter Bate of the company Five Swallows in Stansted, Essex, which is marketing that product in Britain. Mr. Bate sent to Mr. Teller the research upon which the claims were based. He sent him five documents, two of which were copies of published research carried out in South Africa in 1983—Alcaway is produced in South Africa — and in Australia in 1982. The two studies involved only 19 white males. Mr. Bate also sent two typewritten sheets describing the effects of Alcaway on blood alcohol levels. That study involved only 12 subjects. There were no controls. In that document we find the magic figure of a 77 per cent. reduction, although not in 30 minutes.

[Mr. Keith Best]

What worries Mr. Teller and what worries me is, first, that no tests were carried out on women. Secondly, increasing the rate at which alcohol is broken down by the body can cause poorer judgment, such as in driving. Thirdly, fructose, on which Alcaway is based—it is an apple-flavoured drink—can cause painful side effects. Fourthly, Mr. Bate does not know of any side effects. Fifthly, Mr. Bate expects to sell 400,000 cans of Alcaway before Christmas, and about 4 million cans next year. Finally, it is naive in the extreme to assume that people will not use Alcaway—the name leaves little to the imagination—in the belief that it will then be safe to drive after drinking. No guidance, advice or warnings have been issued to retailers or customers. The company hopes to market the drink next year in the United States of America under the brand name "Arrive Alive".

In fairness to Mr. Bate, I should say that he is reported as having said that, in his judgment, people should not drink and drive. But it is naive to believe that people will not be misled by the product.

As a result of my anxiety, I put down several questions about this—one to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport and another to the Secretary of State for Health and Social Services. I asked whether there was a policy about marketing products designed to reduce blood alcohol levels, and I received this reply from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State:

"If a product were marketed explicitly for the purpose of interfering with the normal operation of a physiological function, it would probably require a licence under the Medicines Act. If any such product appeared on the market consideration would be given to enforcing the requirements of the Act."—[Official Report, 19 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 71.]

I am glad to know that the Department is now considering the product carefully to see whether it should come under the Medicines Act.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State replied in this way:

"The rate at which alcohol is absorbed into the blood stream is affected by a variety of factors. While some products can slow down this process, I am not aware of any evidence which suggests that the elimination of alcohol from the body can be significantly speeded up. My general policy is to warn drivers of the risks involved in driving after drinking under any circumstances."—[Official Report, 19 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 46.]

There seems to be no doubt in the mind of my hon. Friend and her Department that no substance can artificially reduce blood alcohol levels. I hope that that message will go from the House to the general public, and also a message about the side effects that could be caused by a fructose-based drink.

I have written to the Advertising Standards Authority about this matter. I said in my letter:

"Although fructose does, in some instances, accelerate liver function the consequences of this can themselves induce drowsiness and inability to concentrate and in view of this the claims made for the product appear to be unsubstantiated. The statement 'research has proved beyond doubt' is derived from two small studies in South Africa when less than 20 people were tested. No structured or creditable scientific experiments can be discovered."

Not only the group of which I have the privilege to be chairman—the all-party parliamentary alcohol policy and services group—but the drinks industry expresses considerable reservations about the way in which the product is being marketed. The implication that it might be safe to drive after using Alcaway is especially disturbing. It is simply not true. As the final paragraph of the advertisement says,

"Only you will know how well it works."

No one will know that until he or she breathes into an intoximeter, and by then it may be too late.

The reply that I received from the Advertising Standards Authority on 20 November of this year was that this is being pursued as a matter or urgency.

I believe that the trade is concern about the marketing of this drug. In the Morning Advertiser of 21 November, under "Viewpoint", it was noted that concern was being expressed about the claims made for it. From the time that the breathalyser was introduced products have been launched at intervals making claims that they are antidotes to alcohol. The attitude of the trade has been made clear from the start. It will have nothing to do with such products. The trade has adopted the same attitude towards the various do-it-yourself breathalyser kits that have been marketed. Their comment is that they can only repeat the advice that has been given to licensees in the past and that they are reasonably sure that brewers take the same attitude—that is, to leave well alone.

There is the additional danger that immediate allegations will be made that licensees are only out to get customers to drink as much as possible without thought for the social consequences. By putting such products on the market for sale they would be putting themselves in danger of fierce criticism from several directions.

While accepting my congratulations on the campaign which the Government have launched, I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will realise that this is not the end of the story. There is much more that the Government can do and which I expect the Government to do in the form of information and helping to explain to people the problems of drinking and driving and its effects. I have made one or two suggestions which I hope the Under-Secretary will look at carefully. Ultimately we need to change attitudes. We need to ensure that there is moral condemnation of the concept of drinking and driving. This matter is as much in the hands of the public as it is in the hands of the Government. However, the Government can take a lead on information and education. I shall be satisfied if the result of the debate is that more people are alive and uninjured after the festive season than might otherwise have been the case. If so, this will have been a worthwhile debate.

11.42 am

Mr. Norman Miscampbell (Blackpool, North): I am well aware that my hon. Friend the Minister of State who is to reply to the debate wishes to do so fully. In those circumstances, my speech will be shorter than I had intended it to be. At the moment we are in the midst of the normal Christmas campaign. On this occasion it is a controversial campaign, although I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) that the very controversy may have drawn people's attention to the campaign. We should always remember that driving with an excess of alcohol in the blood is a continuing problem. It does not happen only at Christmas, although people may be well aware of the risks that they run and may be more careful at Christmas.

We have been given today the figures relating to accidents throughout the year. As many as two thirds of those who are involved in fatal accidents have too much alcohol in their blood. The level of alcohol in their blood is above the permitted limit. This year Derbyshire does not intend to have a special drive over the Christmas period. Last year, however, 935 people were stopped in Derbyshire and tested and were found to be negative. They were driving within the limit; only 53 positive results were found.

Once the figures are as far apart as that, one is getting virtually to random testing. I am not against random stopping and testing, but I believe that the time has come when we must make up our minds about where we stand on random testing. Car checks occur regularly on a random basis. Breathalysers are often used at the same time. The use of radar is random; it is not known that a radar check is round the corner. When a motorist is stopped, the breathalyser may be used. In this country, therefore, there is random testing and we must make up our minds about whether random tests should continue and stealthily increase. My view is that it would be better to acknowledge that random testing is taking place and that we should allow the police to stop anybody whenever they wish and test them if they wish. It is a continuing problem on our roads. It may lead to political difficulties. In the past we have made promises that this would not happen. However, every time anybody who has had a drink takes a car on to the road it becomes a lottery. Therefore, the Government would be well advised to take their courage in their hands and say that they will allow the police to stop anybody whenever they wish.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): I should like to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) and my hon. Friend the Minister of State for agreeing to my brief participation in the debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend upon the timeliness of the debate and I endorse all that he has said. In the interests of saving time I shall not reiterate any of his remarks, apart from stressing that anything that can be done to reduce the carnage on our roads, in particular at Christmas, is to be welcomed.

I declare a double interest in taking part in the debate. First, I am the parliamentary adviser to the National Union of Licensed Victuallers. Secondly, I am one of the only two licence holders in this place. The purpose of my intervention is to acknowledge what the licensed trade, both the licensees and the brewers, are doing to promote responsibility among pubgoers regarding drinking and driving. This week has seen the launch of a national campaign entitled "Don't gamble with your licence". I see that my hon. Friend the Minister of State is holding a copy of a poster which, she will notice, is drink and drip-proof. I have in my hand a drip-mat. It is an example of 15 million such mats that are being distributed throughout the country. The number of posters that are to be sent out is 100,000.

I welcome also the involvement in the campaign of some of the police authorities. Sussex is one. I am sure that there are others. Both the police and the licensed trade have a joint interest in promoting safety on our roads at Christmas.

May I also draw the attention of the House to two other measures that are being undertaken by the trade. First, the trade is stepping up its promotion of low content alcohol and non-alcoholic drinks. I accept what my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn has said about dubious products that make extreme claims about their safety in relation to alcohol content and ability to counter alcohol. This does nothing but bring the trade into disrepute. Advertising claims for such products must be backed by clinical evidence, or those who are involved in the manufacturing and marketing of such products are taking part in an activity that borders on the criminal.

Secondly, may I draw the attention of the Minister of State to the fact that public transport is being organised over the festive season by brewers and local licensed victuallers associations? One example is the Phoenix brewery in Brighton. This is very welcome. It may be continued throughout the year. It is unfortunate that in some areas public scheduled bus services stop running at 10.30 pm. At Christmas and the new year, with so many pub extensions, this presents considerable difficulties for those who want to get home without having to drive their own cars.

I should be grateful if the Minister could acknowledge what the licensed trade is doing. Will she also look into the problems presented by the proliferation of off-licence outlets for alcohol? We have seen a growth in the number of supermarkets that now sell alcoholic drinks, often with completely inadequate supervision of the age of those who purchase drinks. I am horrified to hear—I have yet to find the concrete evidence—that some garages are now selling alcoholic drinks in their off-licences. As we prohibit the sale of alcohol on motorways, some guidance must be given to magistrates to ensure that on no account should off-licences be granted to garages.

Let me conclude by quoting a statement made by Mr. Danny Trevelyan, the president of the NULV, when launching the "Don't gamble with your licence" campaign this week. He said:

> "Celebrating Christmas and New Year in a pub is a tradition in itself but drivers who exceed the limit are risking their licences, their livelihoods and sometimes their lives and the lives of other people. Licensees will welcome this opportunity to warn drivers to think before they drink before they drive."

I am sure that the House will join me in applauding that statement and the campaign that it introduced.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) on having this most timely debate and my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Miscampbell) who have participated. They do the House, and indeed the country through the media, a service in continuing to remind us of the potential fatality that any driver who is foolish enough to drink and drive or get on a motorcycle may cause, not just for himself and his passengers, but for anybody else who may be on the road or even on the pathway beside the road.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn is right to say that we need more education on the dangers of drinking and driving. In due course my Department is planning to give even wider information than has already been given out in the facts leaflet on drinking and driving from the road research laboratory because it needs to be much more widely available and influential.

Like my hon. Friend, I am worried by much of what he described this morning and I shall be taking up what he said with my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for

[Mrs. Lynda Chalker]

Health. The new 1981 legislation, which became effective in 1983, gave us procedures for dealing with high risk drink-driving offenders, but the problem of what alcohol does to one's perceptions needs to be taken forward in a rather different way in future.

My Department is reviewing the highway code, as it does from time to time and I shall see what entry in that might be useful in persuading people to do the sensible thing. Unfortunately, although the highway code is full of sensible advice, once people have taken their first driving test it is usually only those who go on to advanced training who look at it again. The fact that there are three copies of the highway code in my flat is something to do with the fact that I am always telling people what is in it. If only people would go back to it after they had passed their tests, a little more common sense might be produced on our roads.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Blackpool, North was right to remind us that drinking and driving is not just a problem at Christmas but a fatal combination at any time. Of course, we see a higher consumption of alcohol around this time of year, but the incidence of drinking and driving is not appreciably higher at Christmas than at other times of the year. I hope that it is the publicity, and indeed the debate that we have had about this year's campaign—just as we had a rather smaller debate about last year's campaign—which makes people aware just how stupid it is to drink and drive.

When Christmas and the new year are over, with, we hope, fewer fatalities, injuries and accidents than in previous years, we still cannot let the matter drop until 12 months hence. The threat posed by a drinking driver at any time of the day, night or year must be taken account of in our policies. However, successive Governments, including this one, have taken the view that a particular lead should be given at Christmas to bring home the appalling risks. There are two reasons for that. Inevitably, there is anxiety that if no action were taken people might begin to forget the alarming numbers of people who drink more than is probably wise for them over the festive season. Secondly, a continuous programme of major publicity throughout the year would not be as effective.

The present campaign documents, such as the facts on drinking and driving published by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory, and also the reminders which my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside gave us in the campaign that the brewing industry has launched this year, all help to make sure that we see more responsible attitudes and behaviour now and throughout the year.

For 10 years a substantial proportion of my Department's publicity budget has been dedicated to Christmas advertising to prevent drinking and driving. I am grateful too, for the parallel efforts made by some local authorities and many police forces. I echo the welcome that my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside gave to those organisations and companies which are helping to provide a safe get-you-home service with somebody else doing the driving, whether it be local car hire firms or the new year's eve free travel on London Regional Transport which is being provided by one brewery this year.

It is impossible to gauge the effects of campaigns; that my hon. Friends know that was clear from the way that they approached this debate. We must try to see whether our campaigns are getting through to the people on whom we have to make a positive impact. Surveys suggest that advertising has played a part in increasing general public awareness about drinking and driving. It is more encouraging that over the period that we have had such campaigns alcohol consumption and the volume of motorway traffic has been rising, but the incidence of drinking and driving appear to have at least remained fairly steady, and may even have dropped slightly.

We know, because of the problems that we face on road safety—so depressingly familiar and rather intractable some of the time—that there is a great need for a stimulus of fresh and innovative thinking if we are to have any chance of getting to grips with the problem successfully. We must present our message in a forceful and arresting way. The last thing that would be right would be for the campaign against drinking and driving to become just part of the traditional background to the festive season.

It is not enough just to go through the motions of condemning drinking and driving and to leave it at that. As my hon. Friend the member for Ynys Môn said, we must be ready to search for new approaches which persuade people to think afresh about what drinking and driving involves, to be conscious that they should never put the two together and to alter their behaviour accordingly.

The campaign strategy has been debatable, but as my hon. Friend said, we have had much more media coverage, and I hope that that in itself will this year save lives that would not otherwise have been saved. We are aiming this year's campaign particularly at young people who are at the beginning of their driving careers and—I do not want to call it a drinking career—but at least their experience of alcohol.

Young people face particular risks. They are inexperienced as drivers, even if they think that they are great on the road. They have not the experience of alcohol that older people have. They may not readily appreciate how easily alcohol can impair performance at the wheel or on a bike. The attitudes of young people are still at a formative stage. Therefore, there is a good chance that responsible habits developed at that stage will stay with them in later life. With that same aim in view, more attention is now being given to drinking and driving as an issue in traffic education in our schools.

We all know that the young are not an easy audience to reach. We carry out research in preparing all our campaigns. Research demonstrates that the response of young people to a message depends very much on its presentation to them. Every piece of evidence indicates that to adopt a heavy-handed, authoritarian approach produces an immediate switch-off. If we wish to communicate effectively, we must ensure that we do not switch people off. We must be conscious about the kind of message and the tone of voice to which young people will respond. That is why the whole thrust of the campaign this year has been to bring home the truly awful human consequences that can follow from drinking and driving. Commercials and posters put that message over in no uncertain terms.

I cannot accept for a moment—and I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn takes the same view—the criticism that the campaign lacks punch. One needs only to take a good look at posters such as "Too Much Punch For Judy," "Christmas For Carol" or "Stephen on the Terrace" to see that the criticism is untrue. As I stand at the Dispatch Box today, I go cold when I remember what is involved for a family who perhaps lose someone or have a disastrously injured person among them for the rest of their lives—perhaps an innocent victim of someone else's thoughtless drinking and then driving.

There can be no doubt about the message at the heart of the campaign. It is, "Don't drink and drive". That is what we have always said. I have said it this year on every occasion when I have been given the opportunity, and I shall go on saying it. The campaign gives no comfort to anyone who is tempted to run a stupid risk — or to gamble, as the Brewers Society advertisement says, with drinking and driving.

Why, then, does the message this year stop short of the explicit statement that people must drink absolutely nothing when they are driving? I will give the House two reasons. First, the law does not involve a complete prohibition on alcohol for drivers. The law says that they must not be over the limit, nor must their driving be impaired, whether they are under or over the limit. It is important that what we say in our campaign is consistent with what the law says. Indeed, there has been criticism in the past that our advertising appeared to extend the law by administrative edict.

Secondly, the stark injunction never to drink and drive is just the sort of message that turns off the target audience of younger people to whom I referred. They dismiss it, and then they do not listen and take further note of the message. So the campaigns are designed to produce a response. If we do not get a response, whether it be for a target group or for others, we know that we have to do something different.

People must not be misled by concentrating only on the caption "Stay Low". The campaign as a whole must be looked at. The overwhelming majority of the people in the 16 to 19 age group in the pre-campaign research thought that the symbol, the slogan and the message meant either "Don't drink" or "Don't drink and drive". That proves that the message has gone through to them.

I hope that the current campaign, which is one of the most powerful we have ever had—and the debate about it will ensure that over this festive season—and, with luck, beyond—the message goes home. My own contact with young people shows that the campaign is having an effect. I understand that Stevie Wonder has produced a record called, "Don't Drive Drunk". That should reach many young people. In all those ways, the message for which my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn asked is being brought home.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Blackpool, North went a little further than my other two hon. Friends. He told the House how certain police forces have conducted their campaign in trying to ensure greater safety on the roads at Christmas time. Those campaigns involve the breathalyser. I remind him that there was a new Transport Act in 1981, and that some of the measures were brought into force only in 1983. This is only the second Christmas period when the new penalties have applied —a maximum fine of £2,000, up to six months in goal, and the minimum of a year's suspension of a driving licence.

While we must watch exactly what each police force is doing, we must also watch exactly what the public are doing. We must know whether they are taking the message. I think it is right to wait for at least two years before asking whether there should be any change in the way that we operate the law. We are nearly at the end of those two years.

We do not have random testing in Britain but if anything appears to be wrong with a vehicle on the road it is liable to be stopped. Any police officer who smelled alcohol on a driver's breath would be failing in his duty if he did not then ask the driver to take a breathalyser test.

The debate is valuable for us all. My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside mentioned not only the get-you-home services but the fact that some garages seem to have off licences for the sale of alcohol. If such a development is taking place, I view it with considerable alarm. I know that the Home Office will also want to look at it. I think that many of us are concerned that alcohol is becoming available through various new outlets.

With regard to Alcoway and any other potential so-called alcohol remover that might be marketed, I do not know in detail about the product that my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn mentioned. I am glad that he has referred the advertising of the product to the Advertising Standards Committee. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services and I shall need to look with some care at any products, marketed in whatever way, which could perhaps mislead the public into thinking that they could get protection by using them.

I shall continue to look for new ways of improving education and awareness still further, and of winning the battle against unnecessary damage to life and limb, let alone to vehicles. There is only one safe way to drive on the roads, not just at Christmas time or the new year but throughout the year. My message to people is, "If you are going to drink at Christmas, by all means have a good time, but do not then get on your motor bike or into your car. Go home safely by public transport, or by letting someone drive who does not take alcohol. If you cannot get to your destination by either of those means, use your own feet." There is a good song:

"These boots were made for walking".

I remind people that their feet were also made for walking. If people have been celebrating at Christmas—which I hope everyone will enjoy—I beg them to have a care for others on the roads and not only for their own families. I ask people to make sure that they do not drink and drive.

Information Technology Industry

12.9 pm

Mr Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I applied for this debate because I believed that there were important problems in our information technology industry which should be brought to the attention of the House before we went away for the Christmas recess.

The information technology industry is vitally important for Britain. It is one of the few areas in which we can see economic growth and job creation, with the opportunity to improve people's living standards.

The Government are presiding over an industry that is in serious trouble and that the recent NEDO report described as being in crisis. In 1983, the industry had a deficit in our balance of trade approaching £1 billion, and that deficit is growing rapidly. Although the industry is growing and appears on the face of it to be reasonably healthy, it is only when we make international comparisons that we see that there is a very wide technological gap between Britain and Japan, the United States of America, France and Germany. This is very important for Britain.

The Government are displaying indifference to science and technology, and the recently announced moratorium on the Government's support for innovation scheme means that they are incredibly complacent about the future. This support is vital because many areas of advanced technology such as the microelectronics support programme are being deprived of the funds that they need.

Even more recently, during one of the most embarrassing climb-downs by the Secretary of State for Education and Science, the Government backed away at expenditure on science and technology because of the pressure from the House not to increase parental contributions to student fees. The upshot is that the Government are cutting their planned expenditure on equipment grants by £6 million, the Science Council will lose £3 million, and a range of other schemes, including the microelectronics programme, will lose about £2 million.

There is no doubt that the Government are fumbling. Their inconsistent and fragmented policies are accentuating the technological gap between Britain and its main competitors. The Government are showing themselves to be hypocritical towards the information technology industry. They use fine words, but they are very light on action to save the industry.

The consequence of this is that our indigenous information technology industry is dying before it has had a chance to blossom. I am convinced that many people are not aware of the seriousness of this. We are last in the technological race with our major competitors, and that means that the opportunity to create jobs, to stimulate the economy and to improve our standard of living is likely to be lost for ever if we continue the way that we are going.

The Alvey project is one of the major sources of Government support to the industry, and this has to be welcomed. However, I understand that the companies receiving grants under the project must be British or have a strong British base. What policy has the Minister to ensure that this Government's money being spent on these advanced projects will be exploited by industries in Britain? If I may put it another way, how will the Minister ensure that the multinationals, which are so strong in the microelectronics and information technology industry, do not exploit this research facility for the benefit of other countries' jobs and economic growth?

It has been suggested to me by a number of people in the industry that we would need to spend about 10 times the sum going to the Alvey programme to convert projects into commercial products that could be sold worldwide. If that is true, is the Minister confident that the estimated £3·5 billion needed to back up the Alvey programme will be forthcoming? Finally, is the £350 million currently being spent on it sufficient? When we compare it with what our international competitors are doing, I have serious doubts.

It is important that any Government initiative in information technology should be followed up. I refer especially to the Department of Industry's pilot project for "Office of the Future", which it initiated three or four years ago. How many of these innovative projects that his Department has supported have been replicated in other places in addition to the sites in which the trials were conducted?

The Minister will probably say that if there is some follow-up to be done, it should be done by industry, and that is a fair argument. However, I believe that the Government can create the market for these pilot schemes and advance research projects by having the right kind of procurement policy to support our home industries and British companies. The Government have control over the public sector, and that is a huge IT market. What plans has the Minister for introducing a procurement policy to support especially the new small and medium-sized businesses that are attempting to survive and grow in this fast growing but very competitive industry?

The NEDO report, "Crisis in the IT Industry", also highlighted the manpower shortages in the industry. This is a major factor inhibiting growth. I feel that the Government have made ghastly mistakes in their policy on training and education, and I have to refer to the ludicrous cuts made in the budgets of our universities. Clearly these will have an affect on education and training, and this at a time when there is a shortfall in skilled people in the industry. The Government's attack on the universities will result in our not having the people whom we want. Imposing cuts on technological universities such as Salford and Aston does not make any sense.

As a result of the Government's investigation into skill shortages, they are recommending a new initiative between industry and the colleges of higher education to set up new institutes. Bearing in mind the urgent need for skilled staff, why do not the Government use our existing universities? Will the Minister also say whether there are yet any firm commitments from industry to support these new institutions? Will he also say when fully trained students can be expected to emerge from these new institutions? What other initiatives will the Government be taking in the meantime to solve the crisis?

There is no doubt that our information technology industry faces serious international problems. The recent NEDO report said that the deficit of trade last year was over £800 million, and it has been suggested that that figure is on the low side. Will the Minister give us the exact trade deficit for 1983?

Our failure to keep up with our competitors means that our share of the aggregate market served by Japan, United States, France, West Germany and Britain has fallen from 9 per cent. in 1970 to 5 per cent. To put it another way, our share of the output of the five major countries in the IT business has tumbled by 50 per cent. since 1970.

Is the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who is to reply to the debate, worried about our rapidly accelerating trade deficit? About 50 per cent. of our home market is satisfied by imports. In contrast, imports account for only about 10 per cent. of Japan's home market and the comparable figure for the United States is 6 per cent.

The NEDO report suggested that unless urgent steps were taken to rectify the problems, our indigenous industry would die. Will the Government take urgent action to save that industry or will they allow existing trends to continue? What will they do, and when?

In October, my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) tabled a parliamentary question asking what action the Government proposed to take in response to the NEDO report. The Minister for Information Technology said that over the past five years there had been a significant shift in the Government resources devoted to IT. He said that the Government were not complacent about the problems created by international competition and that they shared NEDO's objective of creating a climate in which the United Kingdom industry will be able to increase its international competitiveness. The Minister said that the Government would continue to pursue that objective vigorously. How does the Under-Secretary square that statement with the moratorium on spending on the support for innovation scheme?

Mr. Eric Hammond, the general secretary of the EETPU and chairman of the electronic components economic development committee, wrote in a report to the National Economic Development Council on 5 December:

"My EDC has charged me to tell you that the moratorium has chilled the heart of the industry. The long term plans of companies will be held up while Government contemplates. This is especially damaging to the smaller and more innovative companies, but even the larger ones will be hurt because of disruption to their programmes."

Mr. Hammond said that at a time when the Government should be encouraging companies to expand they were giving them the "sweet and sour treatment". This year, the Government had increased spending on microelectronics, but had effectively neutralised that increase by withdrawing the 100 per cent. first-year capital allowances and by announcing the moratorium on applications under their principal microelectronics programme.

Mr. Hammond added:

"In the financial years 1981-84, Government support (excluding Regional Development Grants) totalled more than £2 billion to the steel industry and almost £650 million to shipbuilding, but only £126 million for the whole of microelectronics. It is time for the Government to finance the future as least as much as it subsidises the past."

I am inclined to agree with Mr. Hammond's statements. It is certainly questionable whether the support for innovation funding, which was £61·3 million in 1979-80 and is now only £155 million, at 1979-80 prices, is enough. It can reasonably be argued that because of the immense growth in the industry we should be matching that with our expenditure on support programmes.

The Government were wrong to impose the moratorium on the industry at this time. There is no doubt that the Government will reap the consequences of their inept decision.

The rapidly widening gap between, particularly, the information technology industries in Japan and Britain can be partly accounted for by the amount that we spend on research and development on defence. The proportion of our research and development budget allocated to defence is considerably higher than the proportion spent on defence in France, the United States, Japan and West Germany.

For example, the United Kingdom spends about 53 per cent. of its research and development budget on defence, compared with the 2 or 3 per cent. spent by Japan. That must be the reason why Japan is so strong in the civil IT sector. Surely the time has come for the Government to take early action to divert to civil information technology some of the massive resources spent on military research and development. What specific plans do the Government have for reallocating part of the massive research and development expenditure on defence?

I am very worried about the decline in the number of jobs in our IT industry. The steady decline over the past 10 years has been due partly to our industry's poor performance and particularly to the level of imports, which represented 54 per cent. of our market last year and are still growing.

Does the Under-Secretary realise that if we continue in this way, our IT industry will comprise merely a set of branch sales offices of the large multinational corporations? When will the Government start to provide the environment in which this vital industry can thrive and move out of the crisis that the Government have helped to create? The time has come for action, and I hope that the Government realise that if they continue with their current policies of slashing science and technology our indigenous information technology industry will be lost for ever.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I thank the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) for giving us an opportunity to debate the very topical issues that he has raised concerning the future of the British information technology industry. I am sure that he will agree that it is impossible to define the industry exactly. It is not just an electronics, software or computer industry. It now takes in a whole range of disciplines and activities whose effect on the economy is all-pervasive; hence our mutual concern to see that British skills and capabilities are enhanced, and indeed dramatically improved.

As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, the industry must be seen in the context of its general effect on economic growth and job creation. We must also consider whether there is a crisis and, if so, to what extent it should be a preoccupation of Government and others. There is no question of sweet and sour treatment for the information technology industry in the United Kingdom. We are most definitely not indifferent to the industry's prospects. We not only have fine words—as the hon. Gentleman put it—but our actions, too, have been very concrete. It was this Administration in the preceding Parliament who introduced the concept of a Minister for Information Technology. Indeed, I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the contribution made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) in driving forward information technology policy. We were unique in having such a Minister, and virtually still are. The former Minister for Information Technology introduced new budgets and objectives and took forward a significant number of new policies. Those policies still ride forward.

[Mr. John Butcher]

In that context, I shall deal with the moratorium. Expenditure under the heading of "Support for Innovation" for the financial year 1983-84 was approximately £190 million, which meant an increase from a fairly low base in 1979. That is a spectacular growth in spending under the SFI head of account. In the current financial year, projected expenditure across the generic heading, "Support for Innovation" is £230 million. Applications for funding have been subject to a moratorium purely because awareness of the various schemes available arrived like an express train both last year and this. For the first time we found ourselves spending up to the limits of our budgeted amounts in very short order.

Thus, whereas there had been a slight underspend on that head of account prior to 1983-84, we find that the work we have done on awareness has paid such dividends that—to put it a little more positively—the Department of Trade and Industry is now a victim of its own success.

Mr. Randall: If there is a demand for those funds—which I am delighted to hear about—why have not the Government responded by increasing the amount available to that crucial industry?

Mr. Butcher: That is precisely the sort of question with which the Department is now grappling. The hon. Gentleman will know that there are broader considerations involving, not least, how we rejig our spending within our budgets next year. They are generally considerations that affect my colleagues in other Departments, which may be reporting to the House in due course. But, like my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I shall not be tempted this week into trying to give some idea of the profile of spending within my Department in the coming financial year. Thus, I am sorry, but I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the detailed response that he may require. It is not that we are hung up on monetarism, but that we are anxious to continue to build on the achievements of the past three or four years. However, we wish to do so in a cost effective way that is relevant to the requirements of this important industry. I shall deal later with the Alvey programme, and also with the very important question of skill shortages, which concerns not only my Department but the Department of Education and Science, the Manpower Services Commission and all those who consistently look after the interests of the supply side of the economy.

With regard to skill shortages, we are anxious to ensure that our universities participate fully in what we now call the "new partnership" between industry and the higher education sector, including both polytechnics and universities. We are also anxious to ensure that no one is written out of participation in what we hope will be a very dramatic exercise during the coming years. I shall be delighted to report progress on the IT skills agency that the CBI is setting up under the auspices of its education foundation.

The Government are concerned about the deficit in IT trade. The information technology industry underpins so many other commercial and industrial issues. The Government attach great importance to the success of the industry and have placed a high priority on seeing it prosper. As a nation we are not alone in doing this, of course, for it is the fastest growing sector of economies throughout the world. And it is not just because the IT industry itself benefits the nation through its growth, but so, too, do the rest of our manufacturing and service industries as they take up IT products and so improve their own performance, viability and profitability. No modern, industrialised nation can afford to ignore the health of its IT industry. It is central to achieving a more general internationally competitive position for the United Kingdom.

That is why five years ago we embarked upon such an energetic programme of change aimed at raising the profile of the industry and getting over to all sections of our community the message that IT matters. Nobody surely can deny the spectacular success of that campaign. At all levels—school, office, home, shop and factory floor—there is now a readiness, even an eagerness, to find new ways of doing things using the products and services of the IT industry. That change will transform this country in time, especially as our youngsters subsequently turn their easy familiarity with IT to advantage in the working environment. Not only has our micros-in-schools programme provided us with this springboard for the future, it has given us an international lead in educational hardware and software on which to capitalise in overseas markets.

As I said earlier, the success of our awareness programme has made this country one of the most receptive in the world to the application of IT. For an example, we need only to look at the take-up of home computers. In an area of burgeoning demand, it is significant that we now have three or four British-based companies manufacturing products to satisfy that demand. Most of these companies are looking hard at exploiting the export opportunities that come from the dynamic home base.

However, our balance in IT has worsened, and now that we have achieved many of our major objectives in awareness we are correctly turning our attention to supply, and the contribution to be made by British-manufactured hardware and British-developed software.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that, in contrast to the picture presented in the NEDO information technology economic development committee report, the deficit could be as high as £2·3 billion. The obvious difficulty in arriving at reliable estimates of the balance of payments position for IT is in deciding what elements of the industry to include in the definition of IT. The picture varies depending on what categories are included, using a definition that embraces the hardware elements of IT, but not the software. I regret that figures are still difficult to come by. We estimate the deficit to be £2·1 billion for 1983. It is clear that on that basis the position has deteriorated during the past five years.

That suggests that the British IT industry has a major task ahead of it to retain international competitiveness, and the Government are not complacent about the level of overseas competition that our industry faces. But it is a mistake to adopt too pessimistic a view. There is a real and beneficial effect on the efficiency and competitiveness of our manufacturing and service sectors arising from this increased application. Concentration on balance of payments alone may be too narrow and, although we are concerned about it, we should also recognise the increase in efficiency within our economy generally through raised awareness and application of the products.

We have a policy of seeking inward investment, which is bringing significant benefits to the British economy in terms of technology transfer and international competitiveness. Inward investment projects such as Hewlett Packard at Bristol and IBM in Scotland will help to reduce the deficit as they meet United Kingdom orders and begin to export.

We must see the industry in an international perspective. Research and development expenditure by American industry or electronics and IT for 1983 was $8 billion. In the same year NEC and Fujitsu alone spent over $1 billion. The rate of growth in R and D expenditure projected for American and Japanese industries suggest that the Japanese figures will double in less than five years and the American figures in about eight years.

With a smaller home market and a lower turnover, a country of the size of the United Kingdom cannot match this effort alone, which is why we have attached a high priority to Europe, both as a market for our products and as a partner with whom to share the burden of research and development expenditures.

The Government's support for innovation in IT has been substantial. About £570 million has been spent since 1979. That compares favourably with support from other Governments. The recent IT economic development committee report on the industry rightly acknowledged the Government's contribution, especially that of my Department. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman skipped so lightly over this massive contribution. I recognise that it is the duty of the Opposition to oppose, to probe and to check for weaknesses, but I feel that the hon. Gentleman was less than generous in his acknowledgement of the Government's contribution, which has been £570 million of extremely cost-effective expenditure.

Perhaps one of the most significant events is the bringing forward of the Alvey programme. The hon. Gentleman referred to that, and the difficulties that British industry may experience in finding the finance to convert the output of the programme into commercially exploitable products. We are delighted that the Alvey directorate has established itself so quickly and effectively. Indeed, the speed with which progress has been made has surpassed our expectations. The first annual report of the Alvey programme, of which a copy will be placed shortly in the Library, shows that 300 research proposals have been made, of which about 100 have received technical approval. Over 50 companies, 43 academic institutions and five research establishments are involved in these projects. For example, under the computer-aided design for the VLSI programme, the Alvey directorate announced on 14 December approval of the first eight projects. These collaborative projects involve 15 companies, six universities and two Government laboratories and will cost £13 million in total.

One obvious difficulty that is faced by the industry is having to compete from a relatively low turnover and to build large and long-term R and D programmes. The Government can help by putting in some R and D funding, but ultimately United Kingdom companies must seek their own solutions through collaboration in R and D with overseas partners — for example, ICL and Fujitsu — through mergers or by attacking world markets vigorously and thereby generating the higher growth in turnover that is needed.

Japan grew fast by attacking the large American market as well as other markets and so must our industry if it is similarly to succeed. I accept entirely that further investment will be required to turn the results of research into products. That was understood by the Alvey committee and the proposed programme takes that into account. I would like to think that the objective of bringing products to the market will be reinforced as the programme develops. I am bound to say that our industries still have a long way to go, and much hard pounding, to attempt to gain the same presence in the American market and to achieve the same presence as Japanese companies. Apparently Japanese companies are finding it a little easier to achieve and maintain a presence than British companies: we too, must bring in new marketing skills to parallel the undoubted excellence of the United Kingdom industry especially in software and, I hope, more and more in the hardware sector.

The hon. Gentleman referred to our office automation pilot programme when talking about the office of the future. Industry has recognised that this market is potentially one of the most crucial for the future and sees other countries positioning themselves to exploit it. Industry has welcomed our pilot project initiative with enthusiasm. It is seen as yet another good example of the Government's imaginative policy towards the IT industry. Whether the fruits of the initiative are turned into internationally competitive and marketable products is largely a matter for the industry. We can provide the seed corn, but the industry must make it flower. Governments cannot do that. I certainly hope that companies will act because we have a real chance to be involved.

Mr. Randall: Does the Under-Secretary of State agree that the Government can provide the market? I asked whether we could formulate a procurement policy that would help to alleviate this problem.

Mr. Butcher: We have already formulated a procurement policy which is known as the public purchasing initiative. It clearly defines what we mean by enlightened public purchasing. It applies to IT products right across the board. We say, for example, that procurement departments should be buying British products, not just because they are British but because the policy, through its working, encourage the production of British products which are best — one buys British because it becomes best through enlightened purchasing. That means closer relationships between suppliers and buyers. It means post mortems if there is a failure on the part of one supplier. It means specifying the products profiles clearly and well in advance to the potential suppliers.

We are anxious to ensure within the generality of £7 billion of Government spending on capital goods and services that the private sector is used to good effect. As for IT products, we are anxious for Government Departments and those bodies which are Government funded to buy British products whenever possible. But we cannot specify that they must be bought simply because they are British.

Although I have laboured the point about producing an enlightened purchasing policy, I believe that our line of approach is the only effective line that can be taken— otherwise we shall suffer from the phenomenon, described by the hon. Gentleman, of products which are specified as compulsory and which are not relevant in the international market. An example is our telecommunications industry where a cosy buyer and seller relationship emerged and where our international market share plummeted during that relationship. We must ensure that our companies break out of the domestic market.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West did not deal with one aspect, that of standards. If we in the United Kingdom can take the lead in establishing European and international standards, we shall be well-placed to exploit truly open international markets. No doubt, the hon. Gentleman will have noted the debate about the proposed IBM-BT joint venture. In such an issue we can legitimately ensure that there are open markets and, therefore, gain benefits for British suppliers.

As I have made clear, there is a whole tranche of policies for the IT industry. Those policies must be highly complex. It is not just a question of swinging as much purchasing power as we can into British companies. We must first reassure ourselves that those British companies are capable of reacting to a public purchasing initiative rather than being undermined by it.

Defence research and development must be at the forefront of a modern type of high technology policy. It is not only that the electronics and information technology industries are among our strongest and fastest growing. They produce computers, telecommunications equipment, electronic devices and the software that is essential for civil industry. Some of the most valuable research results of the industries is come from the defence research laboratories. The royal signals and radar establishment at Malvern, for example, did much of the materials research for the now familiar liquid crystal display. Its work on electronics, materials and high frequency devices has a world-wide reputation. My Department has helped by spending more than £5 million on research to enhance the spin-off from Malvern's defence work. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has already announced his intention further to open up the work at some of his laboratories to enable the venture capital industry to assess opportunities for civil industry. Through his policy of placing the maximum amount of work with private industry, his Ministry ensures that the work is done by those in the best position to exploit the results.

I detect that one or two of my colleagues might wish to contribute to the new subject which is about to be launched, and so I do not intend this side of Christmas at this time on a Friday to prolong the debate unduly.

I say to the hon. Gentleman, who has done the House a service by opening up the debate that, first, the Government are not complacent; secondly, we are working hard on the issues that he has legitimately raised; and, thirdly, although we are worried about the trade deficit, we see signs to make us optimistic which may not have been evident two or three years ago. We can now tackle the skill shortages and help, where help is required, with hardware and software. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will bear with me to the extent that we cannot today give him the clear answer that he requires on how our future spending will be designed and allocated under the support for innovation head.

Bromley (Capital Expenditure Restraints)

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): On 18 July this year the Secretary of State for the Environment sent a letter to local authorities which was ostensibly a request to restrain their capital expenditure. In fact, the letter contained scarcely veiled threats — effectively to impose an immediate moratorium on capital expenditure of whatever character and however financed.

There followed a protracted correspondence between the leader of the council of the London borough of Bromley, Councillor Dennis Barkway, and the Department of the Environment and between me and the Department about the effect on Bromley of the moratorium, especially with regard to the use of the proceeds from the sale of assets. The Department appeared completely deaf to Bromley's case and, eventually, the stage was reached where it seemed necessary to ventilate the matter publicly and last week I applied for an Adjournment debate to do so.

Within hours of learning that I had succeeded in obtaining a debate, we heard a further announcement which was followed by a debate on Wednesday. We learnt that, far from taking into account the representations that had been made on Bromley's behalf, there was to be a further turn of the screw.

We are not talking about a council which imposes extortionate rates, which throws money about on grants to eccentric organisations or indulges in frivolous projects. The London borough of Bromley, represented in the House by my hon. Friends the Members for Ravensbourne (Mr. Hunt), for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) and for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) has been a model of rectitude. It has consistently kept its expenditure within the grant-related expenditure assessment; and it has consistently kept its expenditure within targets. Bromley has always complied with Government requests. It has diligently carried out Government policies. It has sold council houses at the rate of 1,000 a year, and as a percentage of houses sold it is top of the league of the London boroughs.

Bromley has sold unwanted land; and it has rationalised its school properties by selling land and premises, and that has often involved politically unpopular decisions. A few days ago, the Audit Commission issued a report urging local authorities to study their holding of school properties. Bromley has done more than that; it has disposed of some of them.

Earlier this year Lord Belwin, on a visit to the borough, complimented Bromley on its asset sales policy. The council has used roughly 50 per cent. of the proceeds to pay off debt and 50 per cent. to improve the borough's housing stock. It has taken full advantage of the housing improvement and renovation grants scheme; it has supported many of the housing associations which do such good work in the borough; and it has also used the funds to improve schools and on projects such as the high street relief road—and all that not on borrowed money.

The result of the moratorium is that there has had to be deferment of several schemes involving school replacements and adaptions and road improvements, and especially affected have been improvement and renovation grants. Even with the moratorium, it is likely that in the financial year 1984-85 Bromley will spend about £14 million on grants. If the present situation persists, in the next financial year Bromley will be able to spend £2 million, although there is a considerable demand for those grants, particularly for the improvement of pre-1919 houses.

A further clamp-down is proposed. We are told that some boroughs—it is not yet clear whether Bromley will qualify—may get an extra 5 per cent. allocation; in other words, an extra 5 per cent. of money that they are allowed to borrow. That would allow the building of five or six houses. Bromley would much prefer to be allowed to use its own funds to improve the thousands of properties that need such improvement.

Why has that situation arisen? Because the Government, in the shape of the Department of the Environment, although we all know that the Treasury is lurking behind it, are seeking to control all public expenditure regardless of its nature and of how it is financed. The argument centres around the magic words "public sector borrowing requirement".

How can spending money that one already has affect the PSBR? The Secretary of State says that if one sells assets, and uses the proceeds to pay off debts or make short-term loans, one is reducing the PSBR. Obviously that is right, but he goes to say that when one calls in those loans in order to spend the money that increases the PSBR.

I am not an economist, and I must say that I do not understand that argument. If it is true, it is an argument against selling assets, and we understood that the Government wanted authorities to sell assets. If one sells one's assets but, instead of loaning out the proceeds on a short-term loan, puts them in a sock under the bed until one wants the money, how does that affect the PSBR? That argument makes neither economic nor common sense. In any case, at the end of the day, the Department can still control the money that the local authority borrows.

I have referred to what Bromley does with the proceeds of the sale of those assets. It uses roughly half to pay off debts, as a result of which the borough has virtually rid itself of its rate fund debt. It uses half to finance new projects or improvement work. If the money is not immediately required for such purposes, either it is put in the bank where it earns interest or it is used for internal loans, either way helping to keep down the rates.

The argument put to us by the Secretary of State in the debate the other day was that if the councils were allowed to spend all their accumulated receipts it would immediately have a serious effect on the money markets and interest rates. That may be so if they spend the whole lot all at once, but of course they do not and would not. Any prudent and responsible council such as Bromley would spread its expenditure over a period, if only to keep within GREA.

I simply cannot see the argument for controlling capital expenditure of this character when the local authority is keeping within its target, nor can I understand why the Government are reneging on the clearly given understanding that the proceeds of the sale of council houses could be used for housing. Bromley relies heavily on capital receipts, but what incentive is there now to continue with its policy of selling assets?

This is not an unavoidable or inevitable situation. The so-called "voluntary restraint" of July and the recently announced imposition of restrictions does not have to take the form proposed, nor does it have to apply to all local authorities.

I hope that the Secretary of State will abandon these further restrictions on the use of proceeds from assets. For the reasons that I have given, it is not justified. I felt unable to support the Government in the Division on Wednesday and, if the proposals come before the House unchanged in the form of an order in the new year, I may well not confine myself to abstaining.

I offer a way out to the Government. I suggest that a clear distinction should be drawn between local authorities which co-operate with the Government and those which do not. The restrictions should not apply to local authorities which keep their expenditure within GREA and within target. That is a very simple solution. It is easily applied and requires no consultation. I can say on behalf of Bromley that if the Government were prepared to agree to that Bromley would happily forgo the 5 per cent. bonus in allocation to which it hopes it is entitled.

I do not expect the Minister to make an immediate response to that suggestion. Instead, I wish him a happy, restful and well-earned Christmas. Nevertheless, I ask him to consider carefully early in the new year the arguments that I have advanced and in particular the suggestion that a distinction should be drawn between different authorities. I trust that he will respond in a manner that will help rather than hinder local authorities such as Bromley which would much prefer to work with the Secretary of State than to be at odds with him.

Mr. John Hunt (Ravensbourne): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) on securing this Adjournment debate and on the formidable case that he has presented on behalf of Bromley, which I certainly echo and endorse. The presence of all four Members of Parliament for the borough shows the strength of local feeling on this.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst has recounted the history of this. He has told the House how the Government's restraints on capital spending were received with shock, horror and alarm by Bromley council. The original moratorium has now been intensified by the Secretary of State's announcements this week and further dismay and distress has been caused.

I understand that when the axe first came down on 18 July no fewer than 1,000 improvement and renovation grants were in the pipeline. That gives the House some idea of the heartache caused by the present policy. Like my colleagues, I have received many sad and anxious letters from pensioners, young married couples and many other people who feel baffled and resentful at what has happened. Their grant applications were on the verge of approval but have suddenly been axed.

I beg my hon. Friend the Minister to consider the social and human consequences of what he and the Department are doing. My constituents will now have to wait a year or more to repair leaking and draughty homes and to make other improvements which, although being carried out for those people themselves, also improve the housing stock of this country.

We are baffled and bewildered at what has happened and we feel resentful about it because we are frankly not convinced by the Secretary of State's convoluted arguments about the public sector borrowing requirement. In the debate on Wednesday my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) said:

"Local authorities have in their possession capital receipts. They could spend them on housing or whatever, without borrowing more money and without raising extra taxation. For the life of me, I cannot see the economic objection to that."—[Official Report, 19 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 306.]

Neither can I—and my hon. Friends are still awaiting a convincing answer to that challenge, which my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst has repeated today. As he said, in Bromley's case the resources have been accumulated largely as a result of the council's successful council house sales policy. Now Bromley is to be penalised for its success and for carrying through the policies urged upon it by the Government. There can be no logic or justice in that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst and I were preceded as Member of Parliament for Bromley in the House by Mr. Harold Macmillan, now my noble Friend the Earl of Stockton. The House will recall that his major achievement as Minister for Housing was the completion of 300,000 houses a year. At that time there was real understanding of the housing needs of our people—a sense of compassion and concern that is sadly lacking in some quarters of the Department of the Environment today. My hon. Friend said, and I know, that the real ogre in this affair is the Treasury, but my hon. Friend the Minister and his colleagues have acquiesced in the Treasury's demands and, to that extent, they must carry a heavy share of responsibility.

I hope that this short debate will help to convince my hon. Friend the Minister of the strength of feeling in Bromley and of the need to adopt a more flexible and sympathetic approach. I hope that he will respond to the suggestions of my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst. Local authorities such as Bromley have backed the Government in every way. They deserve help, encouragement and support, not the kick in the teeth that these measures represent.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) and to the Minister for allowing me to intervene briefly in the debate. I wholeheartedly support what my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst said against the Government's policy, and I look forward with him to maintaining pressure on the Government, with the possible threat that we shall be forced to withhold our support from any order that seeks to implement the policy.

Many of my constituents have been disappointed and frustrated because their pending applications for home improvement grants, to which they believe they had a right and which they believed were the subject of a binding promise, have not been allowed. The Government's decision came like a thunderbolt into local negotiations for housing improvement grants, and in many cases debts have already been incurred. There was a great physical need for the repair of some houses in my constituency which was dependent on obtaining housing improvement grants. Moreover, elsewhere in the constituency, the council has correctly and under pressure from the Government carried out a policy of selling its assets, including a large school and its grounds. The council expected that the money obtained from the sale would be of great value to my constituency as well as to the London borough of Bromley. Those expectations have been frustrated.

I deplore the Government's policy. The economic validity of their arguments is weak, and the political arguments go entirely the other way. By instituting such a policy the Government will cause dissatisfaction among their loyal supporters and will debase their promises. I implore the Government to reconsider this matter. I need not refer to previous occasions when there has been insufficient consultation with Members of Parliament, but I should say that the Government cannot continue indefinitely their cavalier treatment of local authorities in circumstances that reflect a turnround in Government policy. The London borough of Bromley deserves much from the Government, but it has been frustrated and insulted by the change of policy.

1.10 pm

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) and to the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment for allowing me to intervene briefly in this important Adjournment debate. I note that home improvement grants provide a notably labour-intensive form of capital spending and also help to tackle the problem of home dilapidation. I note, too, that, thanks to wise Conservative policies, there was nationally a sixfold increase in the number of houses being repaired and improved between 1978 and 1983. As one would expect, Bromley played a notable part in that expansion.

In 1978-79, Bromley council spent just under £300,000 on home improvement grants. In 1981-82 that figure had increased threefold: Bromley was spending just under £900,000 on home improvement grants. In 1984-85 that figure has increased to £12 million and will probably reach £14 million by the end of the financial year. This rate of expansion was perhaps too great to sustain, but I regret that the Government's restrictions upon capital expenditure in Bromley will result in a cutback in the home improvement programme from £14 million to less than £2 million.

As I wrote recently in a "One Nation" pamphlet, "Jobs Ahead", on both employment and housing grounds I hope that the Government will take action so that the volume of home improvements and repairs will again increase. Since the pamphlet appeared, the Government have moved in the wrong direction both for Bromley and the construction industry. I hope that the Government will think again before they bring their capital spending plans for Bromley and other local authorities before the House in the new year, otherwise I, too, may have to think again about my support for the Government's local government policies.

1.12 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): Nothing is more impressive than when the united parliamentary forces of an area speak to the House on such an issue as this, which is of passionate importance to the locality involved. Every single point that my hon. Friends have made about Bromley council is right. Bromley council is one of the best run councils in the land. Its leader and his group are among the most distinguished of our Conservative supporters in local government. In many respects they have given us stalwart support. I mention also the personal contribution of the leader to the development of policy over the abolition of the Greater London Council. There is nothing, therefore, that I would wish to argue about in what my hon. Friends have said but I must take issue with them on the fundamental choice that faced the Government.

My Department knows better than any other Department in Whitehall about the distress, difficulty, anxiety and real problems that have been caused for local councils by this policy. I personally meet, as do my right hon. Friends, delegation after delegation. At all times we are in close touch with our friends and officials in local government. We know the costs involved for them in such decisions as this. As Members of Parliament we know about the problems. I am the Member of Parliament for an inner city constituency, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State represents a constituency that is not far from Bromley. Other Ministers who are here today for other debates face exactly the same pressures and problems. We come across them in our surgeries and in letters from the worried people who have been referred to this morning.

Why then do we have to continue with the pain and grief that this particular policy creates? The only point that I want to take issue with was the comment made by my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) that there were deaf ears. That is not so. The Government know exceedingly well that their policy causes pain and grief for local authorities and for their supporters in many respects. But it would be wrong for me as a Minister, and perhaps even for my hon. Friends, to suggest that hidden somewhere in the depths of Government in a lair unknown to the rest of us, is an ogre who is enforcing on spending Departments a policy of his own, nothing to do with those of the Government, with no origins in the manifesto, with no backing from Cabinet Ministers, with no backing from the House, and that somehow that ogre so terrifies my Department that we have lost our wits and sought to cause unnecessary difficulties for councils such as Bromley, which is, as I say, among the best in the land. That is not so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) belongs to a distinguished group, of which I was once a proud member. Having assented to the Government's general economic strategy, I cannot now say, when it becomes inconvenient for my Department, when it begins to be troublesome to my supporters, that that policy must be abandoned. Let me reminisce briefly. In my previous Department I had some discussions with my hon. Friend about university spending. Again, I had to say that if spending is above Government plans it must be brought down.

It is not difficult to make the connection between that spending and the central economic policy of the Government. Some of my hon. Friends, not so much today but when we have debated the matter previously—we shall come back to it in the new year—have made a greater difficulty here than is necessary.

Local authorities have accumulated large amounts of money through the sale of land and houses. Some of that has already been spent. The remainder has been used in two ways. It has been loaned to people outside the council to offset the council's debts, or loaned to other accounts within the council to reduce borrowing from outside. Such legitimate strategies reduce the net borrowing of local authorities and thereby they reduce the borrowing of the public sector as a whole. The figures are exceedingly large. We are talking about something in the region of £5 billion. The potential effect on public borrowing is enormous. The overhang of those figures is enormous.

This year, we were heading for an overspend of the order of £1 billion. That makes things a little different from the matter of student grants which my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) implicitly referred to, about which there was some dispute recently. In that case, at the end of the day, it was possible for the Government, moving sums of £10 million to £11 million around, to make some modification in policy which it would be absurd to describe as abandonment of any central financial strategy. The figures, although uncomfortable for the Treasury which always looks for saving, were hardly central. But we cannot treat figures of the order of £1 billion a year as marginal to the Government strategy. There is no question whatever about their effect on PSBR. The PSBR is a net figure. There is no problem about that at all.

There may be two separate problems. There may be those, like my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who have some difficulty with the economy policy itself. But that is a quite different category.

There may be those, such as the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who take the view that different parts of the PSBR have different kinds of monetary effect. That is an argument which, as often happens with the beautiful arguments of the right hon. Gentleman, may be seen to dissipate a little when it is examined more closely. We can get into some rather curious difficulties if we take the view that different parts of the PSBR have different monetary effects. The implicit guarantees to the whole of the public sector have very similar effects.

We either have to say that we are assenting to the overall Government strategy or that we are not. We can say with regard to some things that, de minimis, there will be a £10 million adjustment to meet the legitimate worries of colleagues. But can we have any hope of being taken seriously by other spending Departments in Whitehall, by our own colleagues—or, indeed, by ourselves when we wave our Order Papers at the end of Budget speeches when taxes have been cut—if we say that figures of £500 million or £1 billion are marginal to the central strategy? I would say, with respect, that we cannot.

We shall look at the suggestions made by my hon. Friends to see whether there is any marginal way in which we can make the impact better or fairer, but the central argument is that we cannot abandon a great chunk of borrowing to its own devices and allow an overspend of perhaps £1 billion this year or perhaps hundreds of millions of pounds next year.

The hon. Member for Orpington suggested that the economic argument ran one way and that the political argument ran the other way. I have to take issue with my hon. Friend. I believe that two factors are absolutely central to the legitimacy of the Government. The first is that the Prime Minister and her Cabinet, backed by Conservative Members in Parliament and by our supporters in the constituencies, have restored a genuine pride and strength to Britain's position overseas.

The second aspect, which is central to the feeling of all our supporters, is that against all seductions — some from our own side and others, less attractive, from the other side of the House—we have stuck to the economic policy with which we started. Indeed, it is fair to say that we have stuck to it through thick and thin.

In my previous Department I used to have to say to our supporters, "I quite understand the importance of university spending, but at the heart of our mandate is the belief that we must stick to our guns on the broad economic policy. Are you really asking me to abandon it?" That is itself a political argument. Once the story gets about that the Government will in the end be pushed off their course, that will snap the thread that has bound us to much greater continuity of support — from the Conservative party and people outside it — than most other Governments have achieved in recent times.

Mr. Stanbrook: It is not the legitimacy of the Government that is at stake but their credibility. They appear to be dishonouring promises on which many people, including councillors, have acted. It is not good enough to say that the economic policy of the Government made that necessary. The political argument is that the Government must keep their promises, and that they must not let down people or local authorities. That is far more important in the long run, and far more related to whether the Government will be re-elected.

Mr. Waldegrave: I accept entirely the word "credibility". Perhaps it is a better word than "legitimacy". I am saying that the central, overriding promise of the Government was that they would see through an economic policy which we all knew, and which some people in advance believed was too difficult to follow through, and warned us that we could not do it. We are doing it, and we are sticking to it. That is the promise, both explicit and implicit, in a range of the policies that the Government have had to adopt—many of them very unpopular—and it is why it is so astonishing to the Opposition that, despite that, our support in the opinion polls does not disappear.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Enfield, Southgate?

Mr. Waldegrave: I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would not want to refer to that by-election from his party's point of view. The support has remained because people have said that they understand the often difficult decisions that we have had to take. They have a justification that makes sense, tough though it is, and which is what, above all, keeps us together.

I do not believe that it is easy to break the link between this kind of capital spending out of accumulated receipts and the PSBR. That link is quite clear. The link between the PSBR and the Government's central economic policy is equally clear. Following my right hon. Friend's statement and the emergency debate after it, I heard nothing from my right hon. and hon. Friends to make me doubt the linkage between those two. I have heard plenty of people saying that we must moderate or change the policy in that case. But then I run up against the argument that my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington used, only I use it in the opposite way and say that if we move away from the policy, we are lost, because we are left with the tough decisions that we have had to make over the years, having abandoned the policy, too.

I cannot resist referring briefly to the greatest of our noble Friends. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Ravensbourne (Mr. Hunt), I have a tremendous affection for Lord Stockton. However, I wonder whether, in retrospect, we shall see again that period of tremendously expanded council house building which he undertook as being the high point of his career. It is so often in those post-war housing estates that we face the most severe problems today.

Putting that aside, I want to call the noble Lord in aid because, when he was accused of having a policy of stop-go, he said in his inimitable way that he had never seen how it was possible to drive a car without using both the brake and the accelerator. That has always seemed to me to be a good answer. We had a period when there was underspend, and we tried to bring it forward and say that, without any damage to the central policy, we could afford to do more. This year, demonstrably, we are way over the top. All the indications were that we would be for next year. We decided that we had to slow down.

We are talking only about the phasing over a longer period of the spending of these receipts. If we go back into a period of underspend, the time may come to try to steer a little more spending. Inevitably, that makes very difficult the management of programmes in the councils. The interests and convenience of administration at one level are sometimes at conflict with the interests and necessities of national administration at another. This is sometimes inevitable, though it is part of the process of good government to try to diminish it as much as possible.

There is no question of the measures that we have taken having been introduced in any way as a policy aimed at Bromley or a policy which means that Bromley has failed or is at fault in some way. The policy has had to be applied nationally because of the danger to our borrowing limits. Since it derives largely from the overhang of past receipts, it is even more inconvenient for those with receipts. That, too, is inevitable. It causes problems of delay and gives us trouble over other high priorities, such as the housing improvement grants programme. However, it derives not from wilfulness or from the fact that the ogre referred to has terrified us out of our wits and out of our political senses, but from the fact that overspends of £500 million or £1 billion, directly reflected in the PSBR, cannot, if we assent to the Government's economic policy, be taken as other than matters of the deepest concern to all of us—in the Cabinet and, I hope, in the Conservative party in the House and in the constituencies.

However, I well understand the difficulties that I, like any other hon. Member, will have at the weekend in explaining matters to people who will be upset about not getting their improvement grants on time. That is a job of political leadership which we must undertake, difficult as it is.

Sport in London

1.30 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): This may be the only opportunity that I ever get to speak at the Opposition Dispatch Box, so I have seized that opportunity.

My reason for seeking an Adjournment debate on sport in London was the answer given by the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, who is responsible for sport, during Question Time last month. He said:

"Only in the last 12 to 18 months has the GLC started to show some interest in sport in the metropolis. The London boroughs and the metropolitan districts are infinitely better prepared to know what is required at local level. The GLC has only come along later to shell out our constituents' money for wrong projects."—[Official Report, 28 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 913.]

That statement was as profoundly oblivious to the truth as it was offensive to myself and my colleagues at county hall.

The Minister's apparent ignorance is exceeded only by his malice towards the GLC, but that is typical of Department of the Environment Ministers who try to cover up their appallingly weak case for the abolition of the GLC by a combination of bluster and insults.

However, there is no excuse for ignorance on the part of the Under-Secretary, who is to reply to the debate, or his civil servants, so I shall start by telling the hon. Gentleman what the GLC does for sport in London. He may stop me at any time either to identify what he described as "wrong projects" or to apologise for his comments.

When the Labour party won the 1981 GLC elections, I became chairman of the arts and recreation committee. I asked my vice-chairman, Mr. Peter Pitt, to take over responsibility for sport in London. He performed that task well and is now the chairman of the arts and recreation committee, so sport is well served by having him in that position in county hall.

However, although Mr. Pitt was the first person at county hall to be given specific responsibilities for sport, the London county council first established county hall's involvement with sport. The LCC started London sports championships in 1946; the GLC has built on that and organises 11 major championships ranging from cyclo-cross to swimming. The LCC started tennis coaching in the parks in 1951; the GLC had greatly expanded those schemes.

I must assume that when the Minister made his comments he knew that the GLC had met 50 per cent. of the running costs of Crystal palace—currently about £1 million from county hall — since the national sports centre was built in 1964. Indeed, Crystal palace is a GLC park.

The sports holding of the GLC includes two athletics stadia, four athletics tracks, 231 football pitches, including those at Hackney marshes, which has the greatest concentration of football pitches in Europe, 41 cricket pitches, 14 rugby pitches, 11 hockey pitches, three swimming baths, seven boating lakes, 116 tennis courts, seven bowling greens, nine horse riding facilities and two golf courses. Most of those facilities are located in the GLC's 5,500 acres of parks and open spaces and in the 11,000 acres of green belt land.

The GLC currently spends £41 million on parks, open spaces and recreation. That should be compared, for example, with the £7 million that the Sports Council has spent on sport in London over the past six years. The GLC is spending £41 million on recreation in this current year. But in the Local Government Bill, which is now in Committee, there is unfortunately no recognition whatever of that enormous contribution made by the GLC, or of the larger contribution, in financial terms, made by the metropolitan county councils.

One feels that the Minister has let down sport very badly. The Minister for the Arts was able to obtain an extra £34 million of central Government funding for the arts after the arts lobby really went to work on him; but I believe that the Minister with responsibility for sport has let down the sports community by singularly failing to secure additional funding, or certainly failing until now to announce what funding he has got. Frankly, he should be thoroughly ashamed of himself.

Apart from the Minister's failures, there are other reasons why sport does not seem to rate so highly in the priorities of this Government, or indeed in those of previous Governments. First, sport cannot mobilise the powerful establishment figures that the arts world can. There is no real sports lobby as such. Secondly, the Sports Council has proved itself to be toothless and ineffective in acting for sport in the political arena. Perhaps that is because too many administrators in sport are conservative with a small and a large "C". Thirdly, sport simply does not have the standing in our political community that it deserves.

That is in stark contrast to the situation in many other industrialised countries where sport is given a much higher political priority than Britain gives it. Fourthly, sports activities are largely working-class based in a society where middle-class values tend to predominate. In other words, we know very well what the Prime Minister thinks about Shakespeare and opera, but up to now we do not know what she thinks about sport. Perhaps one day she will let us know.

None of those reasons exonerates the Minister from the comments that he made in the House on 28 November. He seemed to assume that the London boroughs would take up the £41 million that the GLC is currently spending on sports and recreation facilities in London. That is nonsense; it is as nonsensical as when the Minister for the Arts said that the boroughs would take up the GLC's spending on the arts. But he changed his mind—or had his mind changed for him. However, the Minister responsible for sport seems to be just as blatant about that statement now as he was when he made it.

How can local authorities take up this enormous added burden? They have got rate capping. They have their own targets and there are also the penalties. We must continually bear in mind that sport rates as a discretionary service provided by local authorities and not as a mandatory one. Thus, if there is to be pressure on different services — as there undoubtedly will be given rate capping and further reductions in the expenditure of local authorities—it will be the discretionary areas of council expenditure that go. I am afraid that that will include sport.

When the Minister replies, I hope that he will say how he feels that the boroughs can in any way replace the GLC. For example, Mile End and Burgess parks were created by the GLC over several decades. The Lea Valley park would never have been created without a massive input from the GLC. The Brixton recreation centre is somewhat dear to my heart, because I was a member of Lambeth borough council when that project first came up. Lambeth has had to ask the GLC to take over responsibility for the centre, because, if Lambeth had to run it, it would soak up 40 per cent. of its amenity services budget, and put 4p on the rates in Lambeth. If the GLC is abolished, will Lambeth be asked to take back the Brixton recreation centre in 1986?

The Minister must address his mind to the whole question of sports centres in London—assuming that he can even be bothered to listen to me. It is quite obvious that the boroughs have those sports centres within their boundaries, but the centres themselves are regional in nature. Yesterday the GLC agreed a major package amounting to £1·75 million to support the construction of indoor sports halls in Peckham, Greenwich and Barking, and the upgrading of the Terence McMillan stadium in my own borough of Newham. I hope that the Minister will welcome that decision by the GLC—that is, if he can ever bring himself to say anything nice about the GLC. Because of the Government's expenditure restraints, especially on capital, local authorities would never have been able to consider the building of indoor sports halls without the support of the GLC. Will the Minister tell me whether the GLC was wrong to provide money for those facilities?

We need to know what the Government propose for those regional sports centres in London should the GLC be abolished. There is no mention of them in the Local Government Bill. If the Government manage to force the Bill through against good advice from both inside and outside the House, there will be calamitous results. We can trace what is happening already. For example, Hillingdon—a good Tory borough—closed the Uxbridge pool in 1982, despite 12,000 visits a year. It was reopened in 1984 by community groups with the assistance of the GLC. During the first eight months 48,000 visits have been recorded. Hillingdon intends to close the south Ruislip leisure centre on 31 December, yet that centre contains the only purpose-built gymnastic facilities in London. Only the GLC can rescue it. It is all very well to look at Albanian, Russian and American gymnasts performing for our television audiences, but what are we doing for gymnastics in London? We are closing down the only purpose-built facilities, and that is disgraceful.

Hammersmith and Fulham, another Tory borough, is considering selling the Eternit wharf sports centre and the Broadway squash centre. Will that authority be able or willing to take over responsibility for the West London stadium and Wormwood Scrubs should the GLC be abolished? Both those facilities are regional. It may be that the Conservative privateers are happy that local authorities should sell sports facilities, but unfortunately all that does is to reduce the access available to the poorest members of our community, especially the unemployed youth. The Scarman report had something to say about that, and I shall refer to it later.

The Minister may say that there will be plenty of cross-borough co-operation. I shall give him an example of that. In 1974 the GLC devolved Beckenham place park in south-east London to the boroughs — one third to Bromley and two thirds to Lewisham. To date, only Lewisham has contributed—it is bearing the full cost. What then are the chances of Barnet and Camden managing Hampstead heath on an amicable basis?

I wish to tell the Minister about some of the GLC's recent sports initiatives. He may think that many of them are wrong, and he can stop me and detail them if he wants to do so. The Scarman report influenced the GLC's policy on sports provision within the inner city. Scarman laid great stress on the role of recreational facilities. With 400,000 unemployed in London, clearly the provision of sports facilities as an ameliorative resource is something on which we must all agree.

The Government set up Action Sport in 1981 through the Sports Council. Again, due to cash limitations, the Sports Council has been unable to develop in the way that it might want. The GLC has given a grant to the Sports Council to help with the development of tennis and cricket initiatives in London. I understand that the Sports Council intends to give a further six months' funding for Action Sport, but the reaction from Hammersmith and Fulham is that it is not prepared to include such projects in long-term budgeting because of Government expenditure cuts and uncertainty. The fact is that the position in London is looking very bad, even before abolition.

The Sports Council, with which the GLC has a close relationship, developed its regional strategy with considerable assistance from the GLC planning staff. We were able to identify major areas of recreational deprivation in London. It would take a regional stategic authority like the GLC to tackle those problems in conjunction with the boroughs.

Among many other aspects of sport, the GLC has provided £1·8 million in individual grants to sports bodies during 1984 — for example, £100,000 to the British Olympic appeal and £68,000 to set up Sports Line for London, a telephone information service covering the whole of London. In the current year the GLC has given £55,000 to the Sports Aid Foundation, an organisation which I am sure the Minister supports. It does a great deal of splendid work in developing young sporting prospects. The London boroughs have given so far this year £350 to the foundation as opposed the GLC's £55,000.

The council has recently launched a series of major pilot schemes to encourage greater participation in sports by the disabled. It is developing a "football in the community" programme. The programme started at Fulham and it will be extended to other professional clubs in London.

I could list dozens of other grants and initiatives which have been made and taken by the GLC in sport. I shall give the Minister a copy of the council's reaction to the impact on sport in London should the GLC be abolished. The document is entitled "Recreation in Ruins". If he reads it, it might prevent him from making any more fatuous remarks about my council and its role in sport in London.

When the Minister reads "Recreation in Ruins", he will learn that the GLC is the largest local authority in the country that is providing sports facilities. The chairman of the council's arts and recreation committee, Mr. Peter Pitt, was correct when he said:

"If the abolition Bill is enacted, it will have a disastrous effect on recreation in the capital."

I shall conclude by asking the Minister some specific questions. I wish to be constructive. First, what extra resources will he be making available to the London boroughs when they take over the GLC's sports and recreation facilities should the GLC be abolished? Secondly, when will he be bringing forward proposals for a "limited" extension of central funding by the Sports Council, as promised by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on 11 April? How much will this "limited" extension amount to and when are the proposals to be put before us? Thirdly, which organisations has the Minister consulted over the future of sports facilities, events and schemes that are of "wider than local interest"? Those were the words used by his right hon. Friend on 11 April. If the Minister has consulted, what was the response of the organisations? Have the local sports councils of London been consulted? Is the hon. Gentleman prepared to meet a delegation from the London sports council's standing committee?

Fourthly, what is to be the future of the Brixton recreation centre and other GLC-funded sports centres in London which are regional in character? Who, for example, will take responsibility for Hackney marshes and the Herne hill stadium, which Southwark borough council has said it cannot afford to do? Fifthly, what is to be the future of Thamesday and the south bank weekend, each of which has attracted 300,000 visitors? What does the future hold for the Greater London horse show and the 11 greater London sports championships if the GLC is abolished?

Sixthly, the Minister said that the London marathon would be safe with the Government. Will the Government be prepared to provide funds equal to the GLC's effort to ensure that the marathon continues? Will it really be safe in the Government's hands? I remind the Minister that the previous Tory administration at county hall under the leadership of Sir Horace Cutler initiated a feasibility study on the possibility of holding the Olympic games in docklands. The present GLC wishes to host a future Commonwealth games. However, bids have to be made by the world's cities for these major international events. Who will speak for London if the GLC is abolished and there is no one authority speaking for sport and other areas of social activity and taking a citywide view?

The Minister has failed miserably to defend sport from the onslaught threatened by the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. The Local Government Bill scarcely acknowledges the existence of sports facilities. However, when the Minister answers my questions the sports world may feel less threatened than at present. If nothing else, I hope that I have demonstrated how ill-informed and gratuitously insulting the Minister was on 28 November when talking about GLC provision for sports facilities in London. I hope that he has learnt something this afternoon. I hope, too, that he will have the grace to withdraw his previous remarks and apologise to the House for what he said.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): I congratulate the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on his elevation to the Front Bench. He sells himself short if he thinks that he will not appear there again—I am sure that he will. The hon. Gentleman must realise that the time he has left me to speak will hardly allow me to answer all his points. I do not for one moment blame the hon. Gentleman for taking two thirds of the time of this debate.

I compliment the hon. Gentleman on his choice of subject, because this timing is all-important. His interest in sport, like that of the GLC in recent years, seems to be of recent origin. It is clear from his remarks that, to most people who genuinely believe in sport—not politics and sport — the greatest threat comes from the present occupants of county hall. Those who are genuinely concerned about sport believe that many events in recent weeks have proved that much of the ratepayers' money has been squandered in what has been described outside this place—I substantiate the point—as a sordid attempt to defend the GLC's record in a variety of spheres.

The hon. Gentleman has not provided us with a specific figure for that expenditure, part of which went to sport. For many people in London, it amounted to no more than a massive bulk purchase of whitewash. The hon. Gentleman should think about that point. I understand the difficulty the Socilaists and their colleagues have about county hall. The GLC was not set up some 20 years ago to oversee sport in the 32 London boroughs. The GLC has certainly had a part to play but it has not had a duty to oversee sport. In the past, the GLC has had a contribution to make. The fact is that, during the past 20 or so years, the GLC has lacked the historical expertise that is prevalent in the boroughs and the governing bodies.

We must oversee sport not only in London but throughout the country. We have the Sports Council, which was set up 10 or 11 years ago, and a regional council on sport and recreation which does great and good work in the south-east of England. The Sports Council has produced a strategy, "The Next Ten Years", and the Greater London and south-east regional council on sport has produced a report on sport in London and the south-east. The report is an excellent document, and I pay tribute to the work that has been done. The recommendations must now be implemented, and I believe that they would be better implemented by the local London boroughs.

The Government's record on sport generally is one of which we are justifiably proud. Since 1979 we have doubled the Sport Council's grant-in-aid to more than £30 million. My Department's contribution to the urban programme and the derelict land grant runs at more than £23 million a year. London has received a handsome share of that money. Since 1979 the Sports Council has made available nearly £8 million in grants and loans for well over 1,000 projects in our capital. No doubt the hon. Member for Newham, North-West will be delighted to learn that the London borough of Newham has received well over £500,000 for 16 capital projects, and that is just one small example of the assistance given.

We hear from the GLC of a range of statistics about its contribution to sport and recreation. The GLC's contribution is very recent. Let us be clear about the facts. The GLC's expenditure of £40 million a year, or whatever the lofty figure with which the hon. Member for Newham, North-West currently seeks to impress us, is not what it appears to be. At least £20 million a year goes on parks, tending flower beds and such services. They are important activities, and I certainly do not decry them. I take as much pleasure in London's parks as the hon. Gentleman does. He should not present this work and its annual costs as going to sport in London. The hon. Gentleman's figures tend to encompass the arts and recreation at its broadest. I ask the hon. Gentleman to concentrate the debate—today and in the future—on sport in London.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Macfarlane: I ask the hon. Gentleman to allow me to continue, because I wish to place a number of points on the record. Obviously, because of the many questions asked, I shall have to write to the hon. Gentleman in due course.

[Mr. Macfarlane]

The help for voluntary groups and projects that is trumpeted forth from county hall amounts, on the figures we have, to no less than £500,000. I certainly would not criticise individual grants, as the hon. Gentleman appears to ask me to do. They are mostly small grants, but they appear to be highly selective. They appear to be dotted around the London boroughs on the scattergun technique. Our criticism would be that such grants are a strange use of the funds and powers of a county council. Helping small clubs and schemes is surely a matter for the borough concerned. They have the necessary local knowledge. My criticism is that the GLC is highly selective and does not genuinely help all sport in our capital city. That is the change that we seek; we see no need for a massive bureaucracy such as the GLC to assist sport in minor ways by a few small grants. The boroughs should do it. That is our policy. They have the knowledge.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the GLC's contribution to Crystal palace. That has a strange ring to it. I have much more confidence in the future of the Crystal palace under the London borough of Bromley. It is a substantial regional facility, and the GLC has contributed significant funds to it. It is also, of course, a national centre. We propose, therefore, to enable the Sports Council to take over all the running and operation of Crystal palace to maintain its national and international place and reputation.

It is unfortunate but, alas, typical, that the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues should have decided, within recent months, to use such a popular facility as Crystal palace as a new stage for their threats and intimidation, and, as people involved in sport have said to me, what border on bully-boy tactics. The GLC promised grants and support and now it is going back on its promises. I ask whether that is consistent with the fine words that we have heard today about the GLC's contribution to sport.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for paying attention to the important role that the boroughs play. It is important to place on record the fact that the boroughs, despite the difficulties that they face, have increased the amount of money that they have spent on sport and recreation during the past year. The figures coming from the GLC show that that amounts to over £160 million. The importance of strategy has been mentioned, but there is no sporting strategy coming from county hall. The fundamental strategy for sport in London is participation, action sport and sport for Londoners. Those are the Sports Council's strategic priorities for the development for sport not just in London but throughout the country.

Mr. Macfarlane: My hon. Friend is perhaps better qualified than anyone in the House to talk about sport. He is a member of the Sports Council and he is a London Member who has represented his country at the highest level.

The fine words that we heard from the GLC spokesman this morning ring rather hollow. The GLC was not set up to cater for a strategy for sport in London. That is the problem that has confused so many of the people, who are responsible for local government and those who are on the governing bodies of sport. They are the best placed to run their sports at all levels.

My major criticism is that the GLC has sought to introduce politics into sport in a way that we have never seen before. It has pulled out of supporting our national centre at Crystal palace. It is not helping those people who represent and live in that part of London. That is sad. When it comes to it, I think that the GLC will sacrifice the interests of a major sporting facility in London simply because of political expediency. That is a poor example.

There have been many wild and exaggerated claims in recent months about the future of the London marathon. In recent years, many people have thought that it has been a highly successful event. I congratulate the major organisers, Sir Christopher Brasher and John Disley. They have made it the success that it is. Zetters pools has provided the use of a computer for processing all the applications.

Mr. Tony Banks: What about the GLC?

Mr. Macfarlane: It is nothing to do with the GLC. It is a wonderful event, which has been run by an organisation, and my Department has promised every assistance to the organisers since the first London marathon. The Department offered them one of its royal parks and the use of various routes through its royal parks.

The Government have also taken the lead elsewhere by stimulating investment in major new facilities. The Olsen shed project, which I launched in September this year, is a magnificent new project in docklands which arguably will be one of the finest centres in north-west Europe. It is a partnership, with money provided through the Government. They have contributed £3·2 million in a consortium of major national companies and the athletics governing body. I shall give further details in due course when I take up many of the points that the hon. Gentleman made. Early next year we shall be announcing—as we have for the past couple of years — pound-for-pound schemes, with the Government providing money with the private sector. Action sport has been a huge success here and in Birmingham. It has enabled 3,000 opportunities to be developed.

With the Sports Council and the regional council on sport and recreation, the structure is there, together with the 32 London boroughs. They are the ones who are best placed to know what is best. It is obvious that there is still a great deal to be done for sport in London, as, indeed, in most of our capital cities, but the Government are alive and alert to the measures that have to be introduced.

The demand for new facilities grows daily as leisure time increases. I agree on that with the hon. Gentleman. The Government recognise how important recreation is to the social fabric of our capital city, but, unlike the GLC, we have achieved a great deal in the past three or four years, and we shall continue so to do. The most important thing is to create the right structure outside politics and let sport run itself. The Sports Council and the regional council on sport and recreation are the experts. The hon. Gentleman and his acolytes in county hall are not.

Baha'i Community (Iran)

2 pm

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): The House will soon be adjourning for the Christmas recess. In this country, Christmas is a time for the unity of the family and religious worship. It is essentially a happy time. For Members of the Baha'i community, of whom there are some 5,000 in this country, it will not be a happy Christmas because they will be thinking of their families, friends and relatives in Iran who are still suffering great persecution. It is to that community that our thoughts and actions should turn. I am grateful for the opportunity of introducing this brief debate on the intense suffering of the Baha'i community in Iran and I am particularly grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office for coming to reply to the debate. His great interest in the subject is much appreciated.

I emphasise that since my hon. Friend's answer to a written question on 16 May this year, the situation in Iran has worsened. While it is true that recently relations between Britain and Iran have improved — I much welcome that—I do not believe that the position of the Baha'i community has improved at the same time. I ask Her Majesty's Government constantly to remind themselves of the plight of the Baha'i community. I hope that the Minister will have the chance to affirm to the House today that the Government will take full advantage of the recently improved relations with Iran to alleviate in any way they can the problem of the Baha'i community.

I have maintained correspondence with some members of the Baha'i community in my constituency. They live in constant worry for members of their families among the estimated 300,000 Baha'is who have not been fortunate enough to escape from Iran. That fear for the lives of their relatives and friends is profound, and understandably so.

Before explaining the exact nature of the present Baha'i problem, it may be beneficial to the House for me to describe briefly the nature of the Baha'i faith, which is relatively new to me and has been explained clearly by my constituents. It was born and developed under Islam in the middle east in the 19th century. Arnold Toynbee described the faith as "an independent religion, on a par with Islam, Christianity and other recognised world religions. Baha'ism is not a sect of some other religion; it is a separate religion and has the same status as other recognised faiths."

The implication is that the Baha'i faith is no heresy or perversion of an existing religion, but should be respected as a separate religion.

The Baha'is' creed does not threaten the existing regime in Iran in any way. A fundamental theme is the oneness of mankind, and the teachings of the faith are auxiliary to that principle: they are beliefs in education, individual freedom and equal respect for men and women.

Members of the Baha'i faith support efforts to bring about international unity which, they believe, will ensure progressively more equitable distribution of world wealth. They regard other world religions, however antagonistic their beliefs or morals, as providing the key to international unity.

I draw attention to the comments of Lord McNair who correctly said in another place on 10 February 1982 that the Baha'is reminded him of the Society of Friends, showing the same gentleness, tolerance and rejection of force. They have, however, been persistently subjected to intense persecution in Iran.

Although the 1979 revolution was hailed as a breakthrough for political liberty, persecution has since escalated. Since 1978, 188 named Baha'is have been executed and a further 15 have disappeared. A further 750 are believed to be in prison, 19 under sentence of death. I ask the House to consider the grave implications of that for their families and friends in this country and throughout the world. One of my Baha'i constituents has told me that since 1982 three members of her immediate family have been imprisoned and then hanged. I have also received specific reports of relatives being tortured. The House will understand if I do not go into the details here.

The House should roundly condemn the false justifications advanced by the Iranian Government for their behavior. The Baha'is have been accused of supporting the previous regime. Yet they refused all political appointments under the Shah. They are accused of being anti-Islam. On the contrary, they accept the divinity of the Koran as well as the Bible. Their headquarters in Israel is said to show Zionist sympathies. Yet that headquarters was established 80 years before the creation of the state of Israel. Finally, they are said to form part of a Western conspiracy concocted in the 19th century by the British Foreign Office in league with the United States and Russian Governments and have therefore been arrested on charges of conspiracy. If the Baha'is are not executed for their beliefs but for their alleged illicit activities against the state, that is a paradox as their religion forbids them to be involved in any kind of political activity.

In 1975, the Government of Iran ratified the international convenant on civil and political rights. They have also ratified several other significant covenants which together encapsulate the fundamental rights to life, freedom from torture, fair trial and freedom of conscience and opinion. In 1981, the Islamic Council issued a universal declaration of human rights, granting freedom of creed and protection from harassment by all official agencies. In addition, the Koran itself declares that minority religions must be protected under Moslem law. The treatment of the Baha'i community is therefore in direct contravention of the Iranian Government's own moral and religious principles.

The world in general and Britain in particular are justified in urging the Iranian Government to observe the basic principles of human justice and religious liberty. Those are the cornerstones of our society, and we should not be ashamed of championing those principles and broadcasting their importance to all Governments, especially Iran's. So far the British Government can only be congratulated on their contribution to the efforts o international organisations in condemning Iranian policy.

The United Nations has maintained constant pressure, and as my hon. Friend the Minister said in a written answer in May this year, the United Nations Economic and Social Council has vociferously deplored the persecution. In May 1984, the council decided to appoint a special representative to make a thorough study of the position. I understand that that was endorsed by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights on 29 August. The House would appreciate some information from the Minister as to how matters stand in relation to the United Nations resolution that has the endorsement of the Commission on Human Rights.

Similarly, on 10 April 1983, the European Parliament called upon Iran to suspend the persecution and condemned the "gross violation of human rights."

The European Parliament asked individual Foreign Ministers to "make representations . . . in order to . . . halt all manner of persecution and discrimination to which the Baha'i minority is subject."

That is a round condemnation and a clarion call. In addition, Australia, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland, Canada and the United States of America have all condemned the Iranian persecution.

While the persecution increases, the Government should increase their pressure on Iran. Full advantage should be taken of the recent improvement in relations between the two countries—an improvement which I wholeheartedly welcome. Regrettably, the openings for such action may be limited. The House will realise the many limitations upon direct pressure and persuasion, but the Government should continue to pursue this matter within the forum of international organisations.

The opportunity exists for the Government to exploit the thaw in relations for the good of the Baha'i. Those who are suffering in Iran, and those in my constituency, other constituencies and throughout the world, who live in constant fear for the lives of their families and friends in Iran, beg the Government to do all that they can and to use all their goodwill and muscle, directly and indirectly through international organisations, for the sake of the Baha'i community in Iran.

2.12 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Richard Luce): My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) has done the House a service by raising this important matter, and I congratulate him warmly on the great deal of thought that he has put into the issue and on the knowledge that he has displayed of the plight of the Baha'i people in Iran. I assure him that I listened carefully to his views.

This matter causes the Government much concern. Indeed, they have taken several positive steps to try to help the Baha'i community in Iran, and I shall describe some of those steps in a moment. My hon. Friend echoed the disquiet that has been expressed by many hon. Members for many months, if not years. I have received many letters from hon. Members expressing anxiety on behalf of their constituents about the position of the Baha'i community in Iran. I will go further and say that I maintain close contact with representatives of the Baha'i community in the United Kingdom. Only yesterday I met the Secretary of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United Kingdom, Mrs. Hardy, who also visited me in 1983 to express her worries about the Baha'i community in Iran. The assembly in this country keeps me and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials carefully briefed about developments there and their own anxieties—above all, about the imposition of the death penalty on many Baha'is. I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue to keep in very close touch with the leaders of the community in this country.

My hon. Friend spoke with great knowledge about the background to the Baha'i faith which, as he said, was established in Iran in the middle of the last century. It grew out of Shia Islam and its adherents describe it as an independent religion but one which is not opposed to Islam. It is a monotheistic faith. It acknowledges all past revelations but to the fundamental believers of Islam the Baha'i faith is regarded as a heresy. Baha'i communities exist in over 150 countries. In 23 countries, over 1 per cent. of the population are Baha'is. It is estimated that there are about 300,000 Baha'is in Iran, a very large number in India and several thousand in Europe. The community in the United Kingdom numbers about 5,000. They are organised into about 190 local assemblies, all of whom elect representatives to the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of the United Kingdom.

There are persistent accounts of the persecution of members of the Baha'i community in Iran, including a number of executions, to which my hon. Friend referred. The Baha'i community is able to produce a good deal of evidence of discrimination and ill treatment. Unlike the Christian community in Iran, the Baha'is are not a protected minority under the constitution. The Iranian authorities claim that no Baha'i has been persecuted or discriminated against as a result of his faith. Rather, they take the line that any Baha'is that suffer punishment do so for other reasons, such as political opposition to the Government, a point to which my hon. Friend referred during the course of his speech.

I should like to comment, first, on the attitude of Her Majesty's Government to human rights as a whole. We deplore the abuses of human rights that occur in many parts of the world. Indeed, in 1978 I wrote a pamphlet on the subject of human rights and foreign policy. A central element in our foreign policy is to work to defend and strengthen human rights in many parts of the world. We all share a sense of outrage over gross abuses, such as summary execution, torture, detention without trial, denial of political rights, repression of religious minorities and many other abuses of human rights. I believe that we in this House all share the desire to use Britain's influence to help to make the world more humane.

In my view, there is no one way of doing this. It is a continuous process of choosing the right means and the right time to take action which is likely to be effective. There is a range of options that we can and do pursue. These include bilateral pressure, representations in conjunction with our partners in the Ten or with other countries in various parts of the world and by taking a leading part in the United Nations—for example, the Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall maintain all our efforts in this crucial field of human rights. We must, in each individual case, judge the best approach to adopt in order to help those whose rights are violated. The kind of influence we can best bring to bear will vary in each case.

As for Iran, one of several countries in which human rights abuses cause us great concern, the Baha'i community is subject to real and particular suffering. Our overriding concern as a Government, and that of my hon. Friend, is the safety and well-being of those to whom we are trying to give help. We must never at any stage do anything that we believe might jeopardise their prospects. Western representations on behalf of the Baha'i community have, on occasions, served only to strengthen Iranian feelings against the Baha'is. Britain is not the country best placed to make bilateral representations on behalf of the Baha'is. Our historical involvement in Iran is an important factor that militates against our success in this matter at the moment. We must take care not to take action which is counter-productive. I am sure that my hon. Friend would agree with that.

Equally, we shall not be afraid to voice concern and disquiet where that is necessary, appropriate and helpful. Against that background, in general, our best approach on the issue is to act in concert with our partners in the Ten and to couple that with action in international forums. A good deal has been done in both those respects.

The Ten—this is an important area in which we can help with some influence—view the persecution of the Baha'i community with great concern. The Iranian authorities have been made fully aware of the Ten's attitude in that matter through direct contracts with the Iranian Government. We have joined our partners in the Ten in a series of démarches by the representatives of the Ten.

The most recent example of such a démarche was on 2 October this year when representatives of the Ten in Teheran drew the attention of the Iranian Government to the deep concern felt by the Ten over continuing reports of the persecution of the Baha'i community in Iran. The representatives of the Ten handed over to the Iranians a list of the Baha'is reported to have been executed in the previous six months and explained the damage done to the image of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

It was pointed out that the Ten member states, together with Iran, are signatories of the international covenant on civil and political rights, and consequently are under an obligation to take an interest in the matter. The Ten asked for assurances concerning human rights in Iran and the status of the Baha'i community.

The Ten followed that up on 29 November in a speech given by the Irish presidency on behalf of the Ten to the third committee of the United Nations General Assembly drawing attention to the persecution of the Baha'i community and reiterating their support for the appointment of a special representative of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights to make a thorough study of human rights in Iran.

The Ten urgently renewed their appeal to the Government of Iran to adhere to their obligations under the international covenant on civil and political rights. I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue to urge the Ten to act vigorously in that way.

Then we come, as my hon. Friend rightly said, to action that we can take in the United Nations. A special representative was appointed following a resolution, co-sponsored by the United Kingdom, on human rights in Iran which was adopted on 14 March at the 40th session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. The resolution specifically referred to the Baha'is. In his speech, the United Kingdom delegate to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, Sir Anthony Williams, urged the Government of Iran to accord to all their citizens all the rights to which they are entitled, in particular the right to life, liberty and security of person, the right to a fair trial and the right to profess and practise their views and beliefs—religious, political and other—even when those do not chime with official dogma. Sir Anthony noted that persecution for religious reasons is, in the view of the United Kingdom, as intolerable as persecution for racial reasons. The United Kingdom will continue to take every opportunity to express its views on human rights in Iran at the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. May I suggest to my hon. Friend that this is the most important forum as far as the United Nations is concerned?

My hon. Friend has launched a valuable debate and I have no doubt that the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran will note the views that he has expressed—views that have been echoed in other ways by many other hon. Members. I have sought to set out the Government's position and I have explained carefully the reasons for the steps that we have taken over the past few months. I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue to take seriously the views expressed by the Baha'i community and by my hon. Friend and many others.

I shall consider carefully the other points made by my hon. Friend. The plight of the Baha'is is a matter of legitimate international concern, and Her Majesty's Government will continue to take whatever action we judge to be the most helpful in partnership with the international community. I assure my hon. Friend that the anxieties of the Baha'i community will remain a matter of deep concern to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and myself in the coming months.

Mr. Freeman: I am sure that the House will be very grateful for what the Minister has said. Has he any intelligence on whether the representative appointed by the United Nations commission to which he referred has been able to visit Iran? If not, will the Minister assure the House that when he has some information on the point he will communicate it to those who are interested in the subject, not only in this House but outside?

Mr. Luce: It will be the task of the representative to report back to the United Nations, and that will happen before too long. With regard to the activities of the representative and how far they have gone, I think that it would be best for me to write to my hon. Friend in due course. I shall let him know as soon as I can what progress the representative is making.

High Rise Flats

2.26 pm

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): May I start, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by wishing you a happy Christmas and all the best for the new year? As it is Christmas, may I extend greetings to the Under-Secretary of State? I am informed that he is about to score his century in terms of replying to Adjournment and other debates. I hope that after today he will declare his innings closed and, for his own sake, move on to something different, as I think that he has been put in the hot seat rather too often. I regret that that is the last cheerful thing that I am able to say this afternoon.

The problem of families living in high rise and tower blocks is so desperately serious that, even at this time of the year, I have to express my concern—and that of thousands of others—at the plight of such families. I should like first to recall the history of this enormous social problem.

I understand that between 1945 and 1951 the Labour Government saw the future of housing policy, the relief of the problems of inner city areas, and the provision of decent homes, in terms of a major development in new towns. That policy was reversed in 1951, when the Conservative Government came into office. Instead of new towns being developed, there was increasing emphasis on slum clearance in the inner cities. The feeling was that the only way to achieve that aim was to build flats at a very high density. The construction industry welcomed the proposal and moved into system building. The larger firms in the construction industry develped some very healthy business in producing the major housing works in the inner city areas.

The problem of high rise blocks was particularly exacerbated by the Housing Subsidies Act 1956, which gave a higher subsidy for flats the higher they were built. That provision, along with system building by the construction industry — which enabled less skilled workers, at lower wages, to do the building—resulted in a proliferation of high rise blocks and tower blocks in many inner city areas.

In 1967, under the Labour Government, a new subsidy system was introduced which took away the incentive to build so high. In 1968 we had the Ronan Point disaster, and this began to make people think about whether we ought to be developing our towns and cities in this way. By the 1970s, very little high-rise or tower block building took place.

But, by the..., the damage had been done. I do not seek to blame anyone in particular, but it seems to me that a generation of architects, planners, civil servants and politicians of all parties was to blame for allowing the destruction of communities and for allowing a system of building in our cities which has caused havoc and will go on causing havoc until we tackle the problem in a way that we are not doing at present.

If I may be allowed a little historical latitude, I suppose that it can be said that a French architect, Le Corbusier, is probably one of the main people responsible, if we trace the architectural descent of these buildings——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Donald Thompson.]

Mr. Dubs: I was saying that Le Corbusier, to my mind, carried a great deal of the responsibility. But in fact all those involved in decision making at the time were responsible for what has happened to many of our cities.

The effects of this type of building have influenced many people, but the direct consequences lie on those who live in high rise and tower blocks. Figures are not too easy to come by, but my understanding is that about 800,000 households live on the second floors or higher and that about 250,000 households live on the fourth floors or above. Altogether, some 300,000 children under the age of 16 live in flats on the second floors or higher. Most of these are local authority dwellings, of course, and the problem is especially serious in London where a large proportion of the tower and high-rise blocks have been built. I understand that about 170,000 children under the age of 16 live on the second floors or higher of these developments.

Living in these conditions has posed a number of serious problems for the people there. First, there is safety. I do not wish to use this debate to discuss the problems of Bison and the other systems building difficulties which have been the subject of numerous discussions and of much concern. I mention them only in passing. But the safety problems have involved everything from concrete falling from higher levels to fire hazards. It is no coincidence that the families on the top floors of one on my council estates are having to be moved out, much to their relief and pleasure, because there are not adequate fire safety exits.

We have had difficulties with asbestos. The Livingstone estate in my constituency has had to be emptied of its tenants so that the asbestos could be cleared out. The same asbestos problem has been found on other estates. We had the Ronan Point episode. We have had the Bison problem, and there have been others. We also have smaller problems such as defective windows and windows that cannot be locked properly.

Far and away the most serious problem is that of the isolation of people, especially families living in high-rise blocks. One has only to walk along those dark corridors, often without windows, with nothing but blank front doors, to feel the sense of isolation. There are no windows from these halls and stairways. The only windows are to the outside, from which no one can be seen walking by because they are too far above the ground. Some of the families living there feel a desperate sense of isolation.

Families cannot supervise their children if they wish to play outside. There was a tragic murder of a little girl near the Doddington estate in Battersea park some time ago. I am not saying that the murder was caused by that environment, but the fact that it occurred made parents even more reluctant to allow their children to play out of their sight.

There have been a number of tragic accidents and even falls from some of the higher blocks. Children have fallen. Adults have fallen. I shall give one or two examples in a moment.

The flats lack play spaces, and children are either not allowed to play outside or are cooped up for long periods. They cannot socialise. They cannot play outside and the flats are not big enough to allow them to play with their friends. There is a desperate sense of isolation.

All the evidence from many experts and successive surveys confirms that the physical and mental health of people living in tower blocks suffers. When they move out, their health improves. Even statistics on school attainment suggests that children in tower blocks do badly.

There are also problems of dampness, water penetration at higher levels, condensation, inadequate heating and rust affecting the steel reinforcements of buildings. In this modern technological age, we ought to be able to solve the problem of defective lifts. Lifts are out of order all too often in tower blocks. When that happens, how can people get out, go about their business or go shopping? They cannot do so unless they are prepared to talk down 16 floors. That is out of the question for a mother with a pram.

Pevsner wrote about the Doddington estate in his book on the architecture of south London. The estate is on the south side of Battersea Park road and consists of post-war council housing. Pevsner says:

"chiefly Wandsworth's disastrous mistake of the 1960s, the Doddington estate . . . by Emberton, Frank and Tardrew . . . The grey chequered concrete slab blocks marching beside the railway are a chilling monument to that mistaken era of high-rise and industrialised building . . . The homely brick details of the low shops, library, and health centre, loosely grouped around a pedestrian square off Battersea Park road, cannot compensate for the arid, empty spaces over the car parks, the bleak upper access ways, and the inhuman scale of the whole conception."

That is pretty clear.

There have been a number of tragic deaths in tower blocks. Children have fallen from balconies and out of windows. There have been suicides. A few years ago, a three-year-old child who wanted to play threw his tricycle from a 10th floor window, threw his plimsolls after it, climbed out after them and fell to his death. There are such tragic cases in many parts of the country and they demonstrate what can happen when children are cooped up in difficult conditions.

Some people say, "They manage to live in high-rise blocks abroad." The luxurious New York penthouse suite is a byword in the living style of the rich. However, the Department of the Environment's study "Families in Flats" revealed that even a fairly brief investigation in Europe showed that people on the Continent did not like high-rise living.

The only people who like high-rise living are those who are childless and fairly affluent and have a way of escape at weekends. For them, it is not so bad, but for people for whom life on the 15th floor is a reality day in and day out, it is tragic. They have no way of escape and usually they cannot afford to get away for the day, let alone for the weekend.

Last month, I asked the Secretary of State for the Environment about children in high-rise flats. The Under-Secretary of State for the Environment replied:

"The Department's report 'Families in Flats' was sent in 1981 to the local authorities known to have multi-storey family dwellings in their stock. It concluded that it is preferable for families with young children to occupy houses or flats below the second storey. My right hon. Friend does not consider that further advice is needed." — [Official Report, 26 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 400.]

Of course it is preferable for families to live at a lower level, but that is a rather complacent statement and surely understates the gravity of the problem.

Tower blocks will be home for some people for the rest of their lives. Although they may want to get out, they cannot do so. My difficulty is that it is hard to know whether it is right to remind people of the awful conditions in which they live, and thereby increase their dissatisfaction, or whether I should hold off and say less. I have come to the conclusion that it is right to describe such things exactly as they are, and to accept that on some of those estates the majority want to get out. It cannot be any way to live if most people are saying, "I can't stand it here. Get me out at any price." But those people cannot get out, because of the combination of the Government's policies and in Wandsworth's case, the council's policies.

The recent announcement of a cut in housing investment has only made the problem worse — a problem resulting from cuts in housing investment ever since 1979. The people cannot afford to move out and to buy elsewhere, because they just do not have the money. Many of them are on supplementary benefit and many are desperately poor.

Wandsworth council is selling not only council flats to sitting tenants, but almost every single council property that becomes vacant on any decent council estate. As a result, there are no empty flats on the nicer estates into which people from the tower blocks could move. That is so, even though the need for such a move may be compelling and urgent and have a high medical priority. That is why people feel trapped and are desperate. That is why, at almost every Friday evening surgery that I hold, people burst into tears in their desperation, and plead with me to help to alleviate their housing problems. They almost always come from such estates.

The real insult is that a mile or two away from some of those high-rise estates in my constituency is something called the Easthill estate. It is a low-rise estate that was built by the Labour council and completed by the Tories when they took over after 1978. The whole estate was sold to people who for the most part did not come from the area and were not on the housing waiting list. They moved over from the north side of the Thames. The ultimate insult to those on the Doddington estate, or living in York gardens and on the other estates is that the Easthill estate has "for sale" signs, as those who bought their properties are now trying to make a profit and to move away.

What action can we take? First, we need recognition of the seriousness of the problem. Secondly, the Government should provide more information about the defects in those high-rise and tower blocks. On 23 October, the Government announced that there was to be an inquiry into large panel systems. I wonder what progress there has been. Will the Government consider encouraging local authorities to develop works programmes so that defective blocks that can be improved, are improved rapidly? Above all, will the Government state not that it would be nice if people with children were not in tower blocks, but that it should be the urgent priority of all local authorities to ensure that parents with young children do not live in such blocks, and certainly do not live above the second floor.

Of course, the Government cannot say that at the moment because there are no houses into which people can move. Therefore, we need a change in attitude towards housing policy. We need cash for investment, and local authorities and central Government must accept that the problem is urgent and that it should be tackled by recognising it, and by having enough money available so that houses and low-rise flats can be built, thus enabling people to move out of the tower blocks.

If the defects in existing high-rise buildings cannot be remedied—and in some cases they cannot be—there is no alternative but to bulldoze them. But high-rise blocks are suitable for some people, provided that the defects can be tackled. There are young people, single people, students and childless couples who might well say that if the lifts are working and the main defects are put right, they would be happy to live there. But for people with children, that is no way for them to spend their lives.

I should like to make a plea on behalf of the hundreds and thousands of families living in such flats. It will be a bleak Christmas and a depressing new year for them. There will be many bleak Christmases and depressing new years for them while they are cooped up with their young children in such flats. We have no right to deny our fellow citizens decent housing and decent lives. But as long as they are living in such conditions, we are denying them just that. We need not complacency from the Government but something that recognises the problem and indicates that action will be taken.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): This is an important debate on a very important subject. It has been introduced, as one would expect, in a fluent and compassionate way by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs). Like him, I represent thousands of people who live in high rise flats. I cut my political teeth canvassing the residents of tower blocks in Wandsworth and Clapham 15 years ago. In about 40 minutes I will be at my advice bureau in Acton, doubtless seeing people from the south Acton estate who will be raising with me exactly the sort of problems mentioned by the hon. Gentleman.

When I looked at the Order Paper and saw the subject for debate, I thought that it had a familiar ring to it. Indeed, it was the subject of my first Adjournment debate in this House 10½ years ago. I confess that, in opposition, I felt a mild sadistic pleasure in keeping up late at night a whole series of Ministers who had to debate with me important subjects such as the height requirements for entrance to the police force, the problem of take-away food shops in London and the need for better provision for cyclists.

Shortly before the 1979 election, after my 10th such Adjournment debate, I had no idea of the scale of retributive justice that would be visited on me. My private office tells me, with a visible lack of enthusiasm, that since 1979 I have participated in a further 89 Adjournment debates, making this—as the hon. Gentleman rightly said—my 100th. I have no idea whether that is precedented. A number of my ministerial colleagues set out on the same path in 1979, but they have either displayed enough independence of action and originality of thought and been promoted or they have displayed too much and been sacked. My sympathies lie with the occupants of the Chair and my hon. Friends from the Whips Office who have had to sit through all this, no doubt to report to their chiefs any incipient trace of incoherence.

Looking back at what I said 10 years ago, and listening to the hon. Gentleman this afternoon, I find that our concerns are very similar about the way in which the very hostile physical environment of our high rise blocks can lead to social and family stress. I said then that high rise blocks were no place for families with children. At that time, 500,000 families were living in them. Since I spoke in that debate substantial progress has been made in reducing the problems in several different ways. Large numbers of families with children have been moved out of tower blocks. We know a great deal more about the physical improvements that are needed to make these estates more acceptable places in which to live. We know far more about the importance of accessible, responsive local management and we have learnt something from experiments with different forms of tenure that seek to involve the tenants more directly either in the management or, in some cases, the ownership of the block. In a few cases, we have had to accept that the condition of the blocks has deteriorated beyond recovery, and that demolition had to be considered together with a fresh start.

I share the hon. Gentleman's analysis of the problem. The majority of high rise housing was built in the early 1960s when the local authorities, with the best of intentions, were clearing slums and were encouraged to build so-called units of accommodation quickly to overcome the severe shortage of housing. At that time, system building and factory methods of construction using concrete and other materials were in fashion, but often untried.

As a result, we had concentrations of high density housing in major conurbations, which created estates that soon became subject to physical deterioration and decline. That was compounded by remote and impersonal management with stereotyped and insensitive allocation policies, reinforced by an often ineffective repair and maintenance service. In turn, that contributed to feelings of insecurity and alienation among the residents and, in some cases, the residents reacted against that environment and began to abuse it. That completed the cycle of decay.

As I said 10 years ago, and repeat today, tower blocks are rarely suitable places for young children to grow up in. There are the practical problems, mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, of young mothers with small children trying to get to the 15th floor when the lifts are out of action, with all the problems of moving shopping, prams and washing. They are compounded by the sense of isolation, the strains of keeping children quiet and anxieties about the children's safety. Appallingly, between 1973 and 1979 about five children a year living on the second floor or above were killed falling from their homes.

In turn, the problems of the children have an impact on the parents. The study that we carried out with the National Children's Bureau showed that children who live above the first floor do worse at school and are more disturbed than children who live in houses, ground floor and first floor flats. They are affected by their mothers' dissatisfaction with multi-storey living.

The Department took the problems seriously as early as 1973. Under a Conservative Government, it issued guidance to local authorities in a circular making it clear that allocating high level flats to families with children was undesirable and should be avoided. In the debate that took place a decade ago I called for a stop to the building of high rise blocks. Modestly, I claim little personal credit for the fact that that period marked the end of an era of high rise council building. At the same time I asked the then Labour Government to issue advice and guidance to local authorities to enable them to use the high rise blocks that they already had to the best advantage. That advice finally appeared under a Conservative Government in 1981 in the Department's report entitled "Families in Flats", to which the hon. Gentleman referred. We sent copies to 120 local authorities which were known to have multi-storey family dwellings in their stock.

Progress is being made. Over the past few years local authorities have done much to reduce the number of families with children living in tower blocks. In Birmingham, for example, 16 per cent. of the local authority's stock was high density housing in 1980, and 300 of the council's 420 tower blocks have now been designated as child-free. The national general household survey shows that the number of families with children under 16 living above the first floor has fallen by about one third between 1981 and 1982. Given the problems facing families living with children in tower blocks and high rise developments, that is only right.

There have been physical changes and physical improvements. High rise blocks need not be undesirable places in which to live for those without children merely because they are high rise. Numerous privately owned blocks here and abroad give witness to that fact. A recent report published by my Department entitled "Housing Initiatives for Single People of Working Age" gives examples of where enterprising local authorities have successfully converted multi-storey family dwellings into homes for the single. I understand that the London borough of Wandsworth has successfully let multi-storey flats to single people. Other improvements, such as the provision of entry phones, have given added security to the elderly, who without the problems associated with children in the block, such as noise, vandalism and break downs, can live in the blocks satisfactorily. The elderly often prefer their privacy, the views and the quietness in tower blocks without children.

My Department has helped this process directly through the urban programme. It has supported a wide range of schemes that compensate for the problems of living in high rise blocks. These projects range from the provision of entry phones, the conversion of empty flats into accommodation for community purposes, the provision of play and recreational facilities, general environmental improvements and improved management schemes. The cost of such schemes will run to several million pounds in 1984-85.

Thirdly, I mentioned the importance of good management. When it is not possible quickly to transfer families out of flats—for example, because of the lack of suitable alternative accommodation—much can be done by good, accessible management to make the flats more acceptable dwelling places.

My Department has worked with a number of local authorities through the priority estates project in improving the day-to-day management of these estates, by local authorities. In 1981, one of our project consultants gave some advice to Wandsworth borough on a management initiative on the Henry Prince eatate. I understand that this, together with modernisation of these pre-war flats, has been highly successful.

Some of the flatted estates require capital expenditure, and when this is made available one has to beef up the locally based housing management in the way that the priority estates project has shown; otherwise we invest the capital and the benefits are frittered away. In too many places, housing staff do not devote the time and effort required to ensure that repairs are carried out expeditiously and tenancy agreements are properly fulfilled. The problems of management are more complex on flatted estates where, for example, vandalism or the neglect of common parts affects many more people more directly than on so-called cottage estates.

My Department is convinced that more locally based management is needed, which operates within defined revenue expenditure budgets and is genuinely able to manage and co-ordinate essential functions such as repairs, caretaking and cleaning, lettings, rent arrears control, enforcement of tenancy conditions, all of which fall within council policy guidelines. It is essential that this duty is discharged with the maximum amount of consultation with and involvement of the residents. If hon. Members think that their authority may be unaware of the lessons of the priority estates project, there is an excellent report on local housing management which was published by my Department in February 1984 and which is available in the Library. I understand that Wandsworth is currently proposing to take some initiatives on the Doddington estate in Battersea, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. In some respects, this is similar to the approach advocated by my Department.

Fourthly, there are changes to tenure, and here I part company with the hon. Gentleman who referred disparagingly to council house sales. I do not accept that such sales exacerbate the problems. When a tower block is sold, it can help to reduce the problem by injecting private capital, which may not be available to the local authority, and the physical improvements that are necessary. Increasing the status of the tenants and their dwellings fosters a sense of responsibility and commitment. Enhanced tenancy participation in the management of estates has, in many cases, had the effect of reducing or eliminating many of the problems I have discussed. An extra capacity in the private sector has many benefits. There are several interesting examples of multi-storey blocks being brought into use by private developers who have bought the blocks, improved them and then resold them to single buyers and couples—usually first-time buyers. In a few cases we have had to cut our losses, demolish the tower block and start again. With the progress I have described, I hope that that last resort will become more rare. Much progress has been made. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not accuse me of complacency, because much more still needs to be done.

As the last speaker before the House rises for Christmas, I take this opportunity to wish a happy Christmas to you, Mr. Speaker, your Deputy Speakers and the Officers and staff of the House. No one is looking forward to Christmas more than Ministers in my Department. I note that, unlike the usual principle of last in, first out, this time it is last out, first in, because when the House resumes Department of the Environment questions will be raised. By that time we shall be reinvigorated and refreshed, and I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker and the rest of the House will be similarly refreshed. I take this opportunity to wish you, Sir, a happy Christmas and all the best for 1985.

Mr. Speaker: Before I adjourn the House, may I thank the Under-Secretary of State and congratulate him on his century. I imagine that the hon. Member hopes that the next century will be more slowly achieved. I wish the Leader of the House, the whole House and the staff a happy Christmas and a new year of good order.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes to Three o'clock, pursuant to the resolution of the House of 19 December.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authorities (Expenditure)

1. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has so far been made in his inquiry into the use of sections 137 and 142 of the Local Government Act 1972 by local authorities.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): I hope to be in a position shortly to advise the House of the details of the intended impartial inquiry into these and other issues.

Mr. Amess: I wish my right hon. Friend and all other hon. Members a very happy and successful new year. However, is my right hon. Friend aware that a growing number of my hon. Friends are becoming impatient at the Government's seeming slowness in introducing legislation to curb the wasting of ratepayers' money by local authorities on political propaganda? Is my right hon. Friend also aware of the seeming inability of district auditors to act in the matter, because of their very narrow remit?

Mr. Baker: I thank my hon. Friend for his good wishes for 1985. I am sure that we shall need them all.

The spending of money by councils on political propaganda is scandalous. My hon. Friend's own council spends money in that way. The Greater London council has already spent about £10 million and the metropolitan counties £3 million. As many hon. Members will know, Westminster city council has won the first round of a court case against the Inner London education authority, which wishes to spend £750,000 of ratepayers' money. The case is going to appeal.

This is an area of some clouded views. If the court case does not resolve the matter, we do not preclude legislation.

Mr. Conway: Has my right hon. Friend's Department consulted the Government Law Officers on this matter? If such consultation takes place, will he direct the attention of the Law Officers to the placing of advertisements by local authorities in organs such as the Labour Herald?

Mr. Baker: Yes, we have consulted the Law Officers, and I shall certainly draw to their attention the point that my hon. Friend has raised.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: Is it not a complete disgrace and an absolute abuse that local authorities such as the Labour-dominated Warrington borough council should use ratepayers' money for the support of striking miners, especially when many of those ratepayers are, through no fault of their own, unfortunately unemployed?

Mr. Baker: There is no doubt that certain Labour-controlled authorities are using their powers under section 137 in a way never envisaged in the original legislation. That is why there is to be an impartial inquiry into that abuse and many others as well.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Minister tell the House how much taxpayers' money was spent on bringing out the Conservative party propaganda leaflets entitled "After the GLC" and "After the Metropolitan County Councils"? Was the material based on the Central Office handout just released by the Department of the Environment?

Mr. Baker: The two admirable leaflets which the hon. Gentleman is holding up are not political propaganda. They contain an explanation of the main points of the Government's proposal. It is well precedented for Governments to produce such leaflets of explanation after Second Reading. It was done in the case of the Telecommunications Bill and of the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill. The cost was about £9,600, which would not buy even half a page in the Daily Mirror.

Mr. Straw: While the power of local authorities to spend money for information purposes is closely regulated under legislation passed by the Conservative party in 1972, is it not true that central Government have a wholly unfettered power to spend taxpayers' money, and that it is the Government who have spent money scandalously, in support of abolition proposals which have not been approved by the House, of their tendentious defence policies and of privatisation?

Mr. Baker: The conventions regarding the spending of advertising money by the Government are well known and have been observed by successive Governments. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we have acted within the conventions that successive Governments have followed.

Departmental Costs

2. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further action he is taking to control the total running costs of his Department.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): I shall continue to use MINIS and my Department's budgeting systems to keep these costs under close and regular review.

Mr. Thurnham: Is my right hon. Friend satisfied that local authorities are doing everything in their power to control their running costs?

Mr. Jenkin: Many local authorities are, but I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the series of value-for-money reports being produced by the Audit Commission which suggest that if all local authorities followed the precepts there laid out they could save many hundreds of millions of pounds. That would be of great value to ratepayers.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the Secretary of State agree that the best judges of whether a service is good value for money are ratepayers and taxpayers? Does he further agree that the best facility to enable them to make such a judgment would be for the right hon. Gentleman to announce this afternoon that his Department will support fully the Bill, which is to be introduced soon, to secure freedom of information and access to information in local government? Will the right hon. Gentleman make such a commitment and carry it through during the rest of this Session?

Mr. Jenkin: That matter goes wider than the original question. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to await the Government's reaction to that Bill.

Mr. Steen: Has my right hon. Friend considered closing down the public land registers, which cost his Department about £250,000 a year to maintain and which, in the past four years, have sold only 2,000 acres of publicly held land? Does he agree that the best thing would be to auction off publicly held land which is dormant, redundant and derelict?

Mr. Jenkin: I cannot accept my hon. Friend's suggestion. The land registers have proved an immensely valuable means of bringing to the attention of builders and others the fact that public land is available and should be put on the market. Many hundreds of acres have been sold. I have now made the first orders, using my statutory powers, to oblige certain authorities to disgorge land for which they do not appear to have any valid use. That would not have been possible without the registers.

Mr. Janner: Does the compulsory, squalid and practical asset stripping of local authorities, especially those such as Leicester which have been rate-capped, not so add to the dictatorial powers of the right hon. Gentleman's Department that the running costs of the Department are bound to increase if, as is extremely unlikely, the Government are to give any decent service to people who have been served well by local authorities?

Mr. Jenkin: I am not sure that the hon. and learned Gentleman would want that question reported too widely in the Leicester Mercury, as I suspect that the great majority of ratepayers in Leicester are pleased that, for the first year, they are getting some relief from their rates under the rate-capping legislation. I should have thought that there was universal support for the view that land which is held by public authorities and which is not needed by them should be sold so that it can be put to good use. I am astonished that the hon. and learned Gentleman does not accept that proposition.

Hyde Park Memorial

3. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on proposals to establish a flower garden around the Hyde park memorial to the soldiers, civilians and horses killed by a terrorist bomb on 20 July 1982.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): Eighteen thousand spring and autumn flowering bulbs have recently been planted in the vicinity of the memorial plaque which will become naturalised in the grass and provide an annual display of blooms in the area. I am grateful for my hon. Friend's help in this development.

Mr. Greenway: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and his Department for their great co-operation in planting a beautiful garden around the memorial to the 12 soldiers, six civilians and seven horses who were killed in that appalling outrage. Some of the many hundreds of subscribers to the funds that I have raised for the purpose —many are of humble means, such as pensioners—are disappointed that roses have not been allowed. I understand that there is a horticultural problem in that it is difficult for rose trees or bushes to be planted in the area, but is there any way in which that problem can be overcome?

Mr. Macfarlane: I think that we must be guided by the advice of the bailiff of the royal parks. Each case must be considered in the context of the park. I believe that what we have now will provide a natural and harmonious display in spring and autumn. It is a most fitting and lasting tribute to those who so tragically lost their lives in July 1982.

Dr. Glyn: As a former officer of the Household Cavalry, I had the honour, while a Member of this House, to command the Queen's Lifeguard during a Session of Parliament. I am indeed grateful to the Minister. Is he aware that the incident is recorded permanently by the carrying of swords by the Queen's Lifeguard each time it passes the scene, as it does when it passes Buckingham Palace? This is a signal honour. We are delighted that the Minister has taken so much interest in this site. We shall welcome any additions for extras that he can provide.

Mr. Macfarlane: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. The regiment, the royal parks bailiff and officials in my Department have, I believe, provided the best and most suitable harmonious display in memory of those who lost their lives.

Rate Support Grant

4. Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the local authority associations in response to his rate support grant proposals.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: At a meeting of the CCLGF on 11 December the associations gave me their initial reactions, which, as might be expected, varied widely.

Mr. Park: Is it not a fact that the Secretary of State has had no support from the local authority organisations? What communications, if any, has he received in support of the proposals?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. For example, the Association of County Councils welcomed improvements in targets for low spenders. Indeed, I have received a number of letters from individual authorities which have expressed their appreciation for the fact that we delivered the commitment that we made this time last year. They also welcomed the increased emphasis on GREs as a basis for grant distribution. Of course there have been criticisms from other authorities and associations, and no doubt we shall have an opportunity fairly shortly to debate this matter.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Will my right hon. Friend take note that one of the Government's most loyal local authorities is Solihull, which, for its good stewardship, has been penalised £2 million in rate support grant?

Mr. Jenkin: As my hon. Friend knows, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government has agreed to meet him and a deputation from Solihull. We are constantly pressed by the local authority associations for improvements and changes in the GRE system, but when these changes are made they inevitably result in different effects on different local authorities because they are intended to be more accurate and and to reflect more precisely the circumstances of individual authorities.

Mr. Nellist: Is the Secretary of State aware that his predecessor visited the north east part of Coventry—the are represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park) — and described the housing conditions there as among the worst he had ever seen? How does the right hon. Gentleman justify the decision just before Christmas to reduce to less than £8 million the housing allocation to Coventry? That is a third of what the city needs for its council housing, and according to council housing officials it means that it will take nearly 35 years for private housing in Coventry to be repaired and renovated to any sort of decent standard. How does the right hon. Gentleman justify these cuts?

Mr. Jenkin: That goes wider than the original question, which was about rate support grant. We should increasingly ask ourselves how those properties got like that. It was not the tenants. Who was it? How did they get like that? I believe that the record of many local authorities in relation to the management of council housing estates is a scandal, and I have no doubt whatever that many councils could do a great deal better if they really buckled down to it.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: When my right hon. Friend considered these representations, how did he justify the fact that a 25 per cent. discount is applied to London rateable values because they are so high, but that the same fair treatment is not applied to Hertfordshire, Berkshire or Surrey, as a result of which they lose rate support grant?

Mr. Jenkin: I am well aware of my hon. Friend's point. It is made regularly by the home counties. I must tell him that the differentials in rateable values in the Greater London area by and large justify the variation to which my hon. Friend has drawn attention. It could not be said to apply to the counties outside London. That position has now obtained for a number of years and is built into the statement that I made in December.

Mr. Straw: Is the Secretary of State aware that at least 16 Conservative-controlled shire counties have lost, in aggregate, £120 million of grant for next year over this year, including Essex, which has lost £19 million, Hertfordshire, which has lost £14 million, and Surrey, which has lost £16 million? Have those 16 authorities welcomed the rate support grant settlement?

Mr. Jenkin: Many points have been made to the Government about the rate support grant settlement, but there is general recognition, especially by many members of the ACC, that there is merit in restoring the councils' accountability to local ratepayers by reducing the share of expenditure which is met by the Government. In that we are merely following the practice of the previous Government. That is the main reason why the grant to those authorities has been reduced.

Water Supplies (Nitrate Pollution)

5. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress he has made in measures to reduce nitrate pollution of public water supplies.

Mr. Macfarlane: Trials of full-scale treatment plant to denitrify water supplies have been completed satisfactorily by the water research centre and the Anglian water authority at the authority's works at Bucklesham. Other research projects are under way. My Department is establishing a group of experts, with the help of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, to evaluate information on nitrates and consider action to limit nitrate concentrations in water supplies. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is about to publish a code of good agriculture practice designed to minimise water pollution. It will include a section on fertilisers.

Mr. Taylor: Is my hon. Friend aware that levels are still rising? Is it not unreasonable that my constituents in Southend and many others are faced with the choice of paying much higher water rates to cover the horrendous costs of removing nitrates from water because of the health directive, or of receiving ever-increasingly polluted water supplies? Why are the Government so reluctant to curb the amount of nitrates going into water or to make the polluters pay, which happens in every other industry?

Mr. Macfarlane: My hon. Friend must be pleased that we have set up the group of experts. The co-ordination group will hold its first meeting on 14 January. Its terms of reference are to provide a forum for the evaluation of information collected about the sources, pathways and concentrations of nitrates in water. We shall see to what extent those levels, which he claims are occurring, are developing. We have acted thoroughly and positively and that group meets next week.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Minister accept that, in addition to a priority for research, there must be proper priority for development regarding this grave problem? Does he accept that concern should be displayed not merely for public water supplies but for the contamination of virtually every water course and every wetland area in many parts of our islands?

Mr. Macfarlane: That is an important consideration, which is why my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and our officials are getting together urgently to evaluate all the facts and background information.

Mr. Key: Will my hon. Friend be talking to the water authorities about the widespread concern that exists about the condition of rivers? The finger is pointed at fish farming, but there is increasing agreement that nitrates are a major cause of pollution in rivers. There has been a sad decline in the environmental aspects of river management.

Mr. Macfarlane: Yes, I shall also draw that to the attention of the nitrate co-ordination group.

Dr. David Clark: Will the Minister assure us that we shall have both research and urgent action, because this is a serious matter? Only recently one of the Minister's chief scientists told me that he regarded it as the greatest environmental time bomb facing Britain. Will he also assure us that when the European Community directive on clean water is introduced there will not be major exemptions for waters that are affected by nitrogen?

Mr. Macfarlane: I must make it clear that since the beginning of last year my Department has started collecting regular information about public water supplies with high nitrate levels, and that there has been no overall increase in nitrate levels in those supplies. The group has many things to do. The House will agree that action can follow only the most exhaustive research, which is why we have responded quickly and why the first meeting takes place on Monday of next week.

National Infrastructure

6. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take in response of the recent National Economic Development Office report on the state of the national infrastructure of roads, housing, the water and sewerage systems.

The Minister for Housing and Construction (Mr. Ian Gow): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be discussing this report at a meeting of the National Economic Development Council later today, at which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be in the chair.

Mr. Hamilton: As the report is of critical importance to every member of our community and is a devastating criticism of the Government's current policies, and as almost every independent policy review institution is now asserting that public investment is the best and the most effective way of reducing unemployment, will the Government accept the verdict of the general public, or will they wait until 5 million or 6 million people are on the dole before they see the error of their ways?

Mr. Gow: The best and most effective way of reducing unemployment is by pursuing policies that will result in honest money and sound finance, and by creating an economy in which there is low inflation and high investment. That is precisely what is occurring.

Dr. Hampson: Does my hon. Friend agree that if the Government's oil revenues will be £1,000 million more than expected because of the strength of the dollar, he could improve the infrastructure, especially housing, by taking a more relaxed view of how local authorities may use their accumulated receipts from the sale of council houses and other assets?

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend knows that that matter was debated in the House on 19 December and that the Government secured a majority of 100 in that debate.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: Is not one of our problems that the civil servants in the Treasury, whose job it is to advise the Chancellor of the Exchequer, know nothing about the problems of our northern cities? Would it not be a good idea for the Department of the Environment to organise coach trips at the weekends to take civil servants there so that they can see the problems that many Labour Members see every day?

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friends and I, as Ministers in the Department of the Environment, rightly make extensive visits to all parts of the kingdom to study precisely the matters to which the right hon. Gentleman referred.

I have one further thing to say in response to the right hon. Gentleman's question. He was a member of an Administration—indeed, a member of the Cabinet—when the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), wrote on 15 December 1976 to the then managing director of the International Monetary Fund:

> "It is . . . essential to reduce the public sector borrowing requirement . . . in order to create monetary conditions which will encourage investment and support sustained growth".

The Government are following those policies.

Mr. McCrindle: Has my hon. Friend seen the editorial in this morning's Financial Times under the heading of "Hard facts on infrastructure"? Does he note that the editorial concedes that a debt burden would be bad for future generations, but so, too, would a crumbling infrastructure? Leaving aside for the moment arguments about the benefits to the relief of unemployment that may flow from greater investment in the infrastructure, may I ask my hon. Friend whether he believes that, purely in terms of the infrastructure, there is a strong argument for additional investment in the very near future?

Mr. Gow: Of course I agree with my hon. Friend that it is important to have proper investment in the infrastructure. It is precisely for that reason that expenditure in the water industry will increase from £686 million this year to £769 million next year, and as planned to £870 million in 1987-88. The House will know that expenditure on roads will increase from £806 million this year to £824 million next year, and to £870 million in 1986-87. There is a programme of increasing investment in exactly the areas which my hon. Friend described.

Mr. Rooker: Does the Minister accept that the lack of public investment in the infrastucture back to 1976—the year which the Minister quoted—is holding up further private investment? What is his reply to the statement by that most moderate of employers' organisations, the Federation of Civil Engineering Contractors, which is responsible for 90 per cent. of the infrastucture, that > "we are becoming increasingly fed up with the current propaganda campaign being waged by the Government to discredit the case for more infrastructure investment"?

Mr. Gow: The hon. Gentleman will want to be reminded of some remarks by the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) — [Interruption.] I was asked about the construction industry, and I was about to quote a comment by the right hon. Gentleman, to whom we shall all want to send our very best wishes. The right hon. Gentleman said:

> "We used to think that you could spend your way out of a recession by boosting Government spending. I tell you in all candour that that option no longer exists and that in so far as it ever did exist it worked on each occasion since the war by injecting a bigger dose of inflation into the economy."

I must tell the Opposition Front Bench that the best prospects for the construction industry are those that have been described, rightly, by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, namely, that we secure a soundly based economy. We do not intend to revert to the policies followed by the Labour Government of borrowing where they dared not tax and printing what they could not borrow.

Rate-capping

7. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to make a visit to all local authority areas designated under the Rates Act 1984.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: No, but I and other DOE Ministers make many such visits in the normal course of our duties.

Mr. Smith: In the course of his visits the right hon. Gentleman will doubtless have become aware of the anger of many residents in the rate-capped areas at the Government's proposals. Will the right hon. Gentleman at least say whether he is now prepared to meet a joint delegation from the rate-capped authorities? Will he also say what statutory basis, if any, exists for the date of 15 January which he has set down to the rate-capped authorities for the making of representations?

Mr. Jenkin: The rate-capped authorities should be aware that the timetable requires that we shall very shortly be laying the orders setting out those rate and precept limits that have not been agreed. Therefore, the time left for them to exercise their statutory rights individually to seek to argue for a higher rate or precept limit is running out rapidly. I urge any which are contemplating that to do so quickly. Once the orders have been laid it will be very much more difficult to secure any change. If I have an application—and I have not yet—for representatives of all the 16 or 18 authorities to meet me collectively, I shall be very happy to see them.

Mr. Couchman: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the great offence taken by taxpayers and ratepayers when they are assailed by notices telling them that they have entered a rate-capped, nuclear-free zone and are wished a happy festive season by such as the London borough of Lewisham, which has painted expensive notices expressing good wishes and giving some political slogans denigrating the Government's action? Does my right hon. Friend agree that this reinforces yet again, if it needs reinforcement, the action that he has taken to cap their rates?

Mr. Jenkin: I agree with my hon. Friend, and it is a scandal. The Association of Labour Authorities in London has now voted to spend £350,000 on this campaign. The ratepayers in those authorities should know that £350,000 would buy no fewer than a quarter of a million meals on wheels. That is the alternative.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Secretary of State aware that in some of the local authorities now facing the axe from this Government one idea being canvassed strongly amongst their leaders is that they should refuse to pay any further instalments on local authority debt? The right hon. Gentleman should not be surprised at the action that might be taken in that respect. If it is right for banks such as Johnson Matthey to be trading in an insolvent fashion and then to be rescued by the Bank of England with a nod and wink from the Government, why should not the authorities do the same? It is the only way to salvation for some of them.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman studies such matters closely and he will know that debt repayments are a first charge upon the revenues of a local authority. He may or may not know that when one recent London local authority leader threatened not to pay his debt interest, his brokers swiftly ran him round all the money markets to say that it was pure political propaganda. That is the reality. Of course the local authorities will pay their debt charges. The people who will suffer if they do not will be their staff, who will not be paid, and the clients of the local authority services, who will not get their services.

Mr. Spencer: If my right hon. Friend receives representations from Leicester, will he take time to point out the impressive rejuvenation of the inner area that has already taken place under the inner area programme as a result of grants totalling more than £20 million which Leicester has received during the past four or five years?

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. and learned Friend is right. Leicester has had much help from the Government. I have not yet had from any local authority, certainly not from Leicester, an application for an increase in the rate limit that I have set. As I said earlier in reply to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), time has now almost run out for that. If they wish to come forward, they should do so promptly.

Dr. Cunningham: Does the Secretary of State recognise that his statement of willingness to meet the authorities will be welcomed? Certainly I welcome it. I hope that he will not hold rigidly to the date of 15 January, especially as two of the three weeks that have elapsed since he made his statement have been taken up by the holiday period, which as every sensible hon. Member knows, is a time when local authority business, like much Government and House of Commons business, does not take place.

Will the Secretary of State accept that his refusal in a Parliamentary answer to me of 18 December to spell out the principles on which he has exercised his discretion under the Act in fixing rates for authorities will inhibit the negotiations in which he says he is willing to engage? Will he rethink his answer?

Mr. Jenkin: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his welcome, but I must make it clear that my readiness to meet a deputation cannot constitute an application from a local authority for a revision of the rate or precept limit. That can only be made individually by each authority. We have to proceed strictly by the legislation. It is only if there is negotiation about the limit, instigated by an application by an individual authority, that it would be appropriate, according to my clear legal advice, for me to become involved in spelling out the assumptions that have been made. If any authority wishes to object to the rate limit it must do so swiftly and individually and enter upon a discussion. The hon. Gentleman knows the parliamentary procedures, and we shall have to make the orders fairly soon.

Housing Statistics

8. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the proportion of the national housing stock which was either demolished or ceased to be used for occupation in the last 12 months for which statistics are available.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): In 1983-84 about one in a thousand of the total English housing stock was demolished or ceased to be available for housing use.

Mr. Hardy: Does that answer not demonstrate that the Government's complacency is outstripped only by their negligence? Is it not clear that if present policies are maintained, houses built today will have to remain in a habitable condition for longer than the life of even the oldest occupied building in our islands? Do houses built today have a life expectancy of 1,000 years?

Sir George Young: That is a rather naive question, because it does not take into account the age of the stock that we are considering. The rate of demolition has been falling for a number of years, not least because local authorities perceived the social damage that resulted from wholesale demolition in the 1960s. Under this Government the rate of demolition has continued to decline, but there has been a dramatic escalation in expenditure on improvement grants. Those trends should be commended rather than deplored.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Does not the freezing of council assets produce problems of principle out of all proportion to any theoretical benefit that the Treasury might derive? Will my hon. Friend confirm that one of the main points of selling council houses is to give to local authorities the capital that they need to meet their many and various requirements, particularly in housing?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend has raised a slightly broader point, which we debated at length on, I think, 19 December. For next year we have made available about £3 billion for public investment in housing. That is broadly the same amount as was available this year and, indeed, in the two preceding years. Within that figure I hope that the local authorities will be able to tackle the essential elements that need attention within their housing stocks.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Why does the Minister pretend that he is not cutting housing investment programmes? Does he not realise that there have been massive cuts in the amount of money available for improvement grants and new house building, and that the Government's policies will lead inexorably to the return of the bulldozer and to massive slum clearances? Why has Sefton council, a Conservative-controlled authority which introduced a moratorium when the Minister requested restraint, had a massive cut in its housing investment programme, and why has it received only 30 per cent. of what it asked for? Housing will continue to decline, stocks will become worse, and yet improvement grants will not be given.

Sir George Young: Perhaps I can refresh the hon. Gentleman's memory. In the last year of the Labour Government £90 million was spent on improvement grants, while the figure for the last year was £900 million. That puts the hon. Gentleman's figures into perspective. The major cuts in public sector investment in housing took place between 1974 and 1979, when such investment fell by 45 per cent. after allowing for inflation. The hon. Gentleman should bear in mind that the comparable figure for this Government is 17 per cent. I hope that he will redirect his criticisms.

Mr. Powley: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is quite disgraceful that a Member of Parliament should be unable to obtain figures from local authorities for the number of council properties in their ownership that have been empty for up to 12 months? Is it not incumbent upon us to know the figures and to know what problems are so that we can see how to solve them?

Sir George Young: I agree with my hon. Friend, and that is one of the matters that may be considered by the inquiry to which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has referred. About 25,000 units have been empty for more than a year and it is essential that we do all that we can to bring them back into use. I regret that Norwich city council has not considered it necessary to give the Department essential information about its housing stock.

Mr. Alton: The Minister has told us that expenditure last year on improvement grants amounted to £900 million, but why did he not go on to say—as he said in a letter to me yesterday—that this year the level of expenditure on improvement grants is likely to be £700 million, meaning a reduction of £200 million? Does that not mean the return of the bulldozer to many of our cities? What will he do to ensure that the limited housing improvement grants are used in housing action areas?

Sir George Young: If the figure of £750 million were achieved, it would have to be compared with the figure for the last year of the Lib-Lab pact, which was £90 million. There is an element of hypocrisy in some of the questions that are directed at the Government about expenditure on improvement grants. That expenditure is at a record level.

Basildon (Rate-capping)

9. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from Basildon district council on the subject of rate-capping; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Basildon council has made a number of representations about rate limitation, but it has not yet said whether it accepts the proposed rate limit which my right hon. Friend announced on 11 December. The council has until 15 January to make representations about the proposed limit.

Mr. Proctor: Does my right hon. Friend think that Basildon district council has not contacted his office because it is embarrassed over the extravagance of its earlier claims over the impact of rate-capping, or because of its embarrassment over its extravagant spending on items such as housing administration? What does Basildon district council have to hide?

Mr. Baker: It is difficult to probe the motivations of Basildon district council. It budgeted for growth last year of 20 per cent., which is totally unrealistic. It can certainly live within the rate limit that we have set. The Audit Commission produced a report on Basildon, showing that it spends £600,000 more than the average council on its housing administration, and £180,000 on public relations.

Rate-capping

10. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has had with those local authorities designated under the Rates Act 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: None of the selected authorities applied for a redetermination of its expenditure level. In setting proposed rate and precept limits my right hon. Friend took account of a number of representations. I await comments on those proposed limits before 15 January.

Mr. Cartwright: Is the Secretary of State prepared to delay the laying of orders under the Rates Act for as long as possible in order to encourage the rate-capped authorities to argue their case with him? If they do not seek changes in the limits, is the Secretary of State committed to making orders that confirm the rate maximum that was laid down in his statement of 11 December?

Mr. Baker: Greenwich and the other rate-capped authorities have had since July of last year to come and discuss with my right hon. Friend and myself in the Department the actual expenditure levels. They declined to do so. Since 11 December they have had opportunities to come and discuss the rate limits. I have encouraged them to do so. I believe that the limit we have set for Greenwich is appropriate. We have used the figures that were available to us. I think that many of the ratepayers of Greenwich will welcome the rate limit, which is a reduction this year of about 19 per cent. The actual rate increases which the hon. Gentleman's constituents have had over the last three years have been 11 per cent., 59 per cent. and 20 per cent.

Construction Industry

11. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received over the past three months regarding the state of the construction industry.

Mr. Gow: I continue to maintain close contact with the construction industry. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be discussing with the National Economic Development Council later today its recent report on the infrastructure. My right hon. Friend and I hope to meet the Group of Eight next month.

Mr. Winnick: When will the Government recognise the appalling housing plight of so many people who need rented accommodation, as well as those tenants who are living in pre-war council dwellings that need to be modernised? The Minister referred to the Labour Government. Is it not a fact that in 1978, the last year of that Government, well over 107,000 housing starts were made in the public sector, compared to an estimated 40,000 last year? This year the figure is expected to be even less. Why do the Government refuse to take action to help people who need somewhere to live?

Mr. Gow: As the House knows, total public sector provision for housing in the coming financial year will be £3,055 million. Of that, £2,324 million will be made available to local authorities. I think that the hon. Gentleman will want to join in a tribute to the private sector, which in 1984 completed 150,000 houses, the highest figure for 10 years. I must remind the House of what my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary said earlier. Public sector investment in housing fell by 45 per cent. in real terms between 1974 and 1979, and between 1979 and 1984 it has fallen by 17 per cent. on the same basis.

Mr. Heffer: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Group of Eight is representative of all sides of the industry and that the employers' side is as much concerned, in fact even more concerned, than other sections of the industry? Is it not clear that he should make a stand on this issue? The press has said that he thought of resigning. Can he indicate whether he has obtained any concession from the Government so that in the coming year we may see positive results in the construction industry and not a further decline, such as we have seen over the last three years?

Mr. Gow: Of course, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that on the Group of Eight there are representatives of the trade unions as well as of employers. As I said in my earlier reply, my right hon. Friend and I keep in close touch with the construction industry and are looking forward to our meeting next month with the Group of Eight. In reply to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, it is wise not to believe everything that one reads in newspapers.

Mrs. Renée Short: All of us who represent industrial areas know very well that the housing stock needs to be renewed and replaced. It is not surprising that ancient houses, built 50 years ago under the first public housing legislation, are standing empty when they have not been modernised and brought up to standard. Is the Minister aware that there are 400,000 or so unemployed building workers and that large amounts of building and construction machinery are lying about unused all over the country? Why on earth does the Minister not get these people back to work and see that houses are improved, and new houses are built, for those on the long waiting lists in all industrial areas?

Mr. Gow: It is a great mistake to believe that the best way of creating further employment is by higher public expenditure. The way in which we shall be able to create lasting jobs is by having no inflation and a more efficient economy. Certainly the prospects for revived employment depend crucially on a strong private sector.

I want to say one other thing to the hon. Lady in response to her question. It is a continuing scandal that 25,300 houses and flats owned by local authorities—most of which are Labour-controlled—have been empty for more than 12 months. We would be able to make a significant contribution to solving our housing problems if we could bring that stock back into use.

Mr. John Fraser: Is the Minister aware of the words of the president of the Building Employers Confederation early in December? He said that it cannot be good husbandry to pay 400,000 construction workers to do nothing while the nations's building stock slides further into decay and even larger bills for the future are run up because of lack of maintenance now? The Secretary of State must be regarded as the £5 billion Judas by the construction industry and the local authorities after putting another 50,000 people on the dole as a result of his statement on 18 December. Has the Secretary of State received one letter of support from any part of the construction industry for the savage programme of cuts which he introduced that day?

Mr. Gow: The hon. Gentleman overlooks the truth that output by the construction industry on repair and maintenance has grown and continues to grow. In 1983 £8·4 billion was spent—nearly £500 million up on the year before. We expect output in the construction industry to continue to grow. It is a great mistake to believe that the only engine of growth is in the public sector.

North-west Region (House Building)

12. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will indicate how many houses were completed in the north-west region in 1979, and 1983; and how many are expected to be completed in 1984.

Sir George Young: Dwelling completions in 1979 and 1983 were about 23,900 and 18,200, respectively. The Department has made no estimate of the 1984 total, but completions in the first three quarters were about one fifth more than in the same period of 1983.

Mr. Lloyd: Is not that reply a disgrace to the Government? Are they not becoming the Government of slum dwellers because housing stock in the north-west is not being replaced or improved fast enough to ensure that its quality does not deteriorate dramatically? The Minister said that he did not threaten to resign. Is it not a shame that he did not take that step and so provide relief for all local authorities in the north-west?

Sir George Young: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will consider the broader picture, in particular private sector starts in the north-west. In 1982 and 1983 there were more private sector starts than in 1979. I am confident that that figure will be exceeded in the current year. Rather than concentrate on public sector housing, one must take a broader view of what is happening in the north-west. Completions in the first three quarters of 1984 were higher than in the preceding year. I hope that we can maintain that trend.

Enterprise Zones (Glanford and Scunthorpe)

13. Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new companies have set up in the three enterprise zones in the constituency of Glanford and Scunthorpe, giving their names; how many net new jobs have been created thereby; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The best information that we have, which was provided by the local authorities, is that two firms have set up in the Glanford zone and five in the Scunthorpe zone since designation. To save the time of the House, I shall write to my hon. Friend with their names. We do not yet have details of jobs in the zones.

Mr. Hickmet: Is it not a fact that free enterprise zones, development area status, a massive building programme by English Industrial Estates and Government assistance to Scunthorpe should enable it to reduce unemployment significantly? Will my hon. Friend bear in mind anxiety about the local authority's decision to allow a retail development covering eight acres in one of the enterprise zones, which will cause damage to the town centre?

Sir George Young: I welcome the optimism in my hon. Friend's opening remarks. He has expressed concern to my Department about the retail development to which he refers. The evidence shows that retail developments in enterprise zones do not adversely affect existing retail projects in nearby shopping centres, not least because the economy of the area as a whole benefits from the injection of an enterprise zone. We have the matter under review and we shall be monitoring this year the new enterprise zones set up a few years ago.

Rate Support Grant

14. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many authorities are now likely to suffer grant holdback in 1984-85.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: One hundred and thirty-nine local authorities in England are incurring grant holdback on the basis of their budgeted expenditure. The final number, which I hope will be fewer, will depend on their outturn expenditure.

Mrs. Clwyd: Why does not the Secretary of State follow the advice of the Audit Commission report and end those iniquitous penalties, which cause instability and higher rates to the tune of £400 million a year?

Mr. Jenkin: We do not accept the view of the Audit Commission's report, and at the moment that matter is before the Public Accounts Committee. Many of the Audit Commission's recommendations were sensible, and we are acting on some of them. However, we do not accept some of the figures and reasoning. The matter is before the Public Accounts Committee, and no doubt will come before the House in due course after the Committee has reported.

Mr. Yeo: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is widespread support for his efforts to reduce the central Government contribution to very extravagant local authorities, but that equally, there is great dismay in counties such as Suffolk, which face the prospect of holdback although they are spending substantially below the GREA level?

Mr. Jenkin: I know that my hon. Friend will welcome the fact that — I am speaking from memory — Suffolk was one of the authorities which received the biggest increase in the target over this year's budget, which should have made it much less likely that it will exceed the target and so incur penalties. Our target methodology for this year for low-spending shire counties has been widely welcomed.

Methyl Isocyanate

15. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received regarding the environmental implications of the use, storage and disposal in the United Kingdom of the chemical methyl isocyanate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: Since the tragedy in Bhopal on 3 December my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received a small number of representations about the use, storage and disposal of the chemical methyl isocyanate. That chemical is not manufactured in the United Kingdom. It is used and stored by Ciba-Geigy at its factory near Grimsby, where a maximum of eight tonnes is stored in 40 drums containing 45 gallons each. I understand that in the Bhopal disaster 45 tonnes were stored in a single container. Very small quantities of the chemical are stored for research purposes at four other places in the United Kingdom. In all cases, storage is subject to strict control by the Health and Safety Executive. That chemical is included in schedule 3 to the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984, which came into force yesterday. Before and after the Bhopal disaster, officers of the Health and Safety Executive inspected the factory at Ciba-Geigy and are satisfied as to the safety of the operation. I am advised that the disposal of that chemical is not considered to be a significant problem.

Mr. Eastham: I thank the Minister for his statement. He referred to storage, but is it not a fact that nowadays there are grave misgivings about drivers not complying with regulations, which also applies to private haulier contractors who have been contracted to pick up that material? Is it not about time that we had legislation whereby environmental health officers had some control, not only over factories and chemical works in towns and cities, but over the routes taken by those vehicles?

Mr. Gow: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. Of course safety is important in transit as well as in places where that chemical is stored permanently. If the hon. Gentleman has any evidence, I shall look into that and discuss it with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Will my hon. Friend undertake a wider inquiry and review of the relevant planning law and practice to ensure that when there are applications for the manufacture and storage of toxic materials the safety of the local community is fully ensured?

Mr. Gow: I give my hon. Friend that undertaking. Following the amendments made last year to the general development and use classes orders and the publication of advice on planning control over hazardous development, we have consulted on proposals for strengthening those regulations and controls, and legislation will be introduced as soon as possible.

Dr. Cunningham: Although no one wants to be alarmist, does the Minister accept that his statement is bound to cause some anxiety, not least because chemicals such as methyl isocyanate and others, which are extremely toxic and dangerous, are stored in urban locations—as he said but did not name — and problems can arise, particularly at the point of change from storage to transport? Is the Minister satisfied that he can expect the public to accept Government assurances in this kind of case when the Government have presided over a rundown of almost one third of their own target for the Factories Inspectorate, the people responsible for the monitoring, checking and supervision of these important matters?

Mr. Gow: There is no cause for public disquiet about this, because officers of the Health and Safety Executive visited the chemical plant near Grimsby before and after the tragedy at Bhopal. The officers of the Health and Safety Executive are satisfied that the operation at that factory is being carried out with full and proper regard to safety and strictly in accordance with the standards laid down.

Mr. Madden: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the point of order arise directly out of Question Time?

Mr. Madden: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that you will be concerned that, of the 35 questions tabled for reply today, only 15 were answered, primarily, in my view, because of the long-winded, ponderous replies given by Ministers. In view of the considerable expense incurred by officials and others in preparing for Question Time, and given that low reply rate, do you agree that unless Environment Ministers speed matters up next time they are in danger of being seen as an uneconomic unit?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot be responsible for the length of supplementary questions or the answers, but I have sympathy with what the hon. Member said. We should have got a little further than we did today at Question Time.

Michelin Tyre (Redundancies)

3.32 pm

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"redundancies at the Michelin Tyre company in Stoke-on-Trent."

The matter is specific, because the Michelin Tyre company announced yesterday that tyre production in Stoke-on-Trent was to be slashed, and that 2,400 workers there would soon lose their jobs. It is important, because the lives of thousands of workers will be transformed. They will be plunged into the poverty of unemployment and, unless something is done about it, into the despair of long-term unemployment. They will even, tragically, be denied hope for future jobs for their children. I am pleased to see that the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry is present.

The matter is important also, because the dismissal of 2,400 workers shows that there is no steady economic recovery as the Government have claimed. It gives an ominous warning to the whole of British industry that if an efficient manufacturing firm such as Michelin cannot compete effectively at home and abroad, given the low value of the pound, then British firms are far more vulnerable to foreign competition than anyone has yet admitted.

The matter is urgent, because most of the workers are to lose their jobs by the end of April. The redundancies will add 2,400 to the already high unemployment total of 24,000 in north Staffordshire, giving a rate of about 13·5 per cent. It is calculated by Keele university that the knock-on effect — the kind of Maynard Keynes multiplier in reverse—will add a further 1,600, making a total of 4,000 more unemployed people in the area. If these figures are correct, the unemployment rate will shoot up to 14·4 per cent.—well over the national average of 13·2 per cent.

The matter it is also urgent—I address the Minister of State, Department of Industry, directly — because only a few weeks ago the Government designated areas for regional aid which excluded north Staffordshire. But in the light of these new circumstances, there should obviously be an immediate reappraisal. We need to debate the fact that the case for north Staffordshire to be given Government aid, formerly powerful, is now overwhelming and very urgent. In addition, emergency aid for north Staffordshire is now vital.

The matter is also urgent because the Michelin company needs help both to reduce the immediate job losses and to preserve tyre-making capacity for the future. We need to debate, as a matter of urgency, how the Government can advise and aid manufacturing companies such as the Michelin company, which are being crucified by foreign competition.

Unless action is taken very soon for the whole of British industry as well as for Michelin and north Staffordshire, our national manufacturing capacity will suffer a dramatic decline and we shall become a nationally derelict area. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will allow time to be found for an emergency debate on these vital issues.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) has asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter which he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"redundancies at the Michelin Tyre company in Stoke-on-Trent."

I have listened with great care to what the right hon. Gentleman has said. I regret that I do not consider that the matter which he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

British Embassy, Oslo (Union Information)

3.38 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I was able to tell you, Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago, but only then, because I heard the information only at 3 o'clock, that I should like to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of drawing attention to a matter of urgency which should take precedence over other business, namely,

"the decision of the British embassy in Oslo to demand information from a Norwegian trade union about the extent of its financial support for the National Union of Mineworkers."

[Laughter.]

Hon. Members may not laugh when they hear the implications of agreeing that foreign embassies in Britain can make direct approaches to organisations here.

The British embassy in Oslo has approached the Norwegian National Union of General Workers to demand an answer to two questions: first, "Have you provided financial support for the National Union of Mineworkers?"; secondly, "If so, how and in what form?". In my judgment, this development raises important issues, which I should like very briefly to summarise.

First, who authorised this action? Was it the Foreign Secretary, the Cabinet, the Prime Minister? Secondly, why was no report made to the House? Thirdly, what implications does this have for international relations? Is it now the view of the Government that foreign embassies in London can make demands on any organisations that they choose in pursuit of their own policies? Next, does this indicate that the Government are now a direct party to the dispute——

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): No.

Mr. Benn: Well, if the British embassy in Oslo is now seeking to pursue this matter, that makes it a direct participant in the dispute.

Is the sequestrator working under the direction of the courts or of the Foreign Secretary? Is the coal board, which is a party to the dispute, responsible for commissioning the embassy to make this inquiry?

The House should debate this matter. The action of the embassy is a sign of desperation by the Government, coming on top of the failure to secure a return to work and the possibility of a rail strike and an interruption of fuel supplies. Such a debate, which would be of considerable national importance, could be easily accommodated within this week's business.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter which he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the decision of the British embassy in Oslo to demand information from a Norwegian trade union about the extent of its financial support for the National Union of Mineworkers."

The right hon. Gentleman and the whole House know that the only decision that I have to take on these applications is whether the matter should have precedence over the business set down for today or tomorrow. I listened with care to what the right hon. Gentleman said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter which he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10; and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Miss Hilda Murrell

3.41 pm

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I raised with you at midday today my intention to raise under Standing Order No. 10 a matter——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not say that.

Mr. Conway: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance on how I can raise a matter of particular and singular importance to my constituency. Throughout the Christmas recess and as recently as yesterday, there has been considerable national coverage of the allegations made in the House on 19 December by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) who has, in the view of my constituents, impeded the apprehension of the murderer of my former constituent, Miss Hilda Murrell, by giving information to the House on 19 December which the police have subsequently denied. The hon. Gentleman alleged British secret service and intelligence involvement in the murder of Miss Murrell.

It is important that the House should have the opportunity to hear the reply to the hon. Member's allegations and to urge him to cease impeding the police in their inquiries.

Mr. Speaker: First of all, the hon. Gentleman should not raise in the House matters that he has discussed privately with me. Secondly, his point of order is not a matter for me. No doubt he had the opportunity to be present for the debate on 19 December and he must find other ways of pursuing that matter.

Weather Conditions (Heating and Shelter)

3.42 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you advise me on how issues affecting our constituents can be raised in the House today? Many elderly people desperately need assistance to pay their fuel bills and are suffering a great deal because of the bad weather.

Why has no Minister come to the House to give us a statement about what assistance, if any, is to be given to our elderly constituents? The Government have authority to make payments when there is a severe winter. That was last done in January 1982. Why has not the Secretary of State for Social Services or any of his ministerial colleagues come to the House to deal with the matter? So many elderly people live on inadequate incomes and they will not turn on their heating because they are frightened of the quarterly fuel bill that will arrive in four or six weeks. It is an appalling situation and we should have a statement from the Government.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of order for me. The hon. Gentleman is an experienced Member, and I need not advise him on parliamentary tactics. I am sure that he will realise, on reflection, that there are many ways in which he can raise such matters.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): On another point of order, Mr. Speaker. Has any Minister suggested to you that the Government are prepared to make a statement about the homeless who are living on the streets in London, Liverpool and other places? Clearly, some are likely to die unless urgent steps are taken to provide shelter for them. Have Ministers given you any indication that they are taking emergency steps to deal with the problems caused by the present bad weather?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The answer to the hon. Gentleman is exactly the same as the answer that I gave to his hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). There are other opportunities for raising these matters, and I have not received any such request.

Youth Charter

3.45 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to promote opportunities for young people in International Youth Year 1985 by establishing a youth charter giving rights and representation to young people: and for connected purposes.

I am pleased to be able to seek the leave of the House to bring in this Bill on the first sitting day of 1985, which is International Youth Year. At the earliest possible opportunity in the year, the House could, by giving me leave to bring in the Bill, express its concern for the problems faced by our young people, and its faith and confidence in them, by extending to them the rights and opportunities that would be contained in the youth charter that I propose.

I have referred to the problems faced by many young people. Regrettably, for many, this new year is no new dawn of hope. Four unemployed people out of 10 will be under 25 and 350,000 people will be on training schemes without the certainty of a job at the end. With 22,000 fewer university places than five years ago—equivalent to the closure of two universities the size of Cambridge — many young people will have their academic aspirations frustrated and will be denied the opportunities enjoyed by myself and my contemporaries only a decade ago. In 1985 drug abuse by young people will reach unprecedented levels, as will juvenile crime.

It is idle to expect that one Bill could remedy these many wrongs. Other political measures requiring Government initiative will be necessary. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I would welcome the appointment of a Minister to co-ordinate Government policies affecting young people. We are in danger of allowing a generation of young people to grow up many of whom feel totally alienated from the society and community of which they are members. During International Youth Year, my hon. Friends and I will try to bring before the House a series of measures which, if supported, would signal to the young people of our country our awareness of their problems and our willingness to respond to them.

In proposing a youth charter, it would be all too easy for me to fall into the trap of patronising the young or telling them what is best for them. Rather than do that, the charter would seek to establish rights and to create a framework within which young people could participate more fully in the affairs of the community and the decisions that affect or shape their lives. I hope that the charter would reflect the themes of International Youth Year: participation, development and peace.

Under the heading "participation" we would hope for greater involvement by young people in decision-making. We would propose a lower voting age and a lower age for candidature. At a time when the future of the world is in the hands of two super-power leaders in comparison with whom our own Prime Minister is a young chicken, is there any relevance in considering those at the other end of the age scale? The young have an important stake in the future, and what they lack in experience may be more than compensated for by the fresh ideas that they can bring forward. A number of causes now coming to the fore in politics — for example, environmental concern — were espoused by young people long before they gained political respectability.

At local level, we believe that there should be a right of youth representation on a number of local committees, including health councils, school and college boards and local education authority committees. There is a precedent in the case of the churches for the inclusion of representation on local education authorities. It seems reasonable, therefore, to extend the principle to the consumers of the system.

We believe that there should be an input into the local Manpower Services Commission committees from young people on youth training schemes. Those who take part in the schemes could put forward useful proposals for their improvement. We also believe that there should be greater youth representation on the local police authority. That view is in line with the recommendation of Lord Scarman in his report on the Brixton riots. This is yet another example of how involvement, and the responsibility that goes with it, can break down the barriers of hostility and alienation which are often found in relations between young people and the police.

We also recommend democratically elected local youth councils. They would be a forum in which young people could express their anxieties to statutory bodies in their areas. The worries of young people in decaying inner cities are very different from those of young people in rural communities, and it is important that someone should represent and communicate the views of young people.

With regard to development, a young person must be able to develop his personality. He can do that inadequately if he is unemployed, insufficiently trained or educated, or poorly housed. We should establish as a right the opportunity for all teenagers between the ages of 16 and 19 to have a real choice between continuing in full-time education, taking a place on a much improved training scheme and finding employment. I admit that that would require resources, but it is not an especially new or radical suggestion. In International Youth Year, we should be prepared to look to the examples set by France and West Germany in the training and education of young people.

When young people want to take the initiative and create their own employment through co-operatives or self-employment, for example, statutory bodies such as the Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas, the Welsh Development Agency and the Highlands and Islands Development Board should have a remit to provide financial assistance and, more importantly, legal, managerial and marketing advice and expertise.

I am aware that some young people fail to develop their personalities through disadvantage, especially because of race or disability. The charter proposes a youth service which is managed substantially by young people to cater for the needs of such groups.

Development will not be confined to the individual—the wider community would benefit from the greater involvement of young people. A recent opinion poll, which was published in The Times, showed that 78 per cent. of 15 to 24-year-olds support a scheme for all young people to do voluntary community service on leaving school. Some voluntary schemes already exist. With the minimum of bureaucracy, we should like local bodies to be set up to ensure proper co-ordination between community and voluntary efforts.

The measures that I have outlined are by no means exhaustive. The third theme which ties them all together is peace.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): What about young miners?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Wallace: It is regrettable that we cannot legislate to create peace. However, we can establish a framework and an environment which fosters and promotes peace. A youth charter would try to do just that. It would try to ensure peace of mind for a person who might be frustrated by inadequate employment, unemployment or because his academic aspirations have been thwarted. It would promote peace in communities by encouraging participation and trying to break down barriers. When the House debates the great issues of world peace we should remember that few have a greater interest in it than the youth of today.

In commending the Bill, I ask the House to support measures that will promote the cause of youth, and allow the voice of youth to be heard. Perhaps more importantly, I ask the House and politicians of the older and not so old generations to listen to the voice of youth and pay heed to their anxieties and ideals in International Youth Year.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Wallace, Mr. David Alton, Mr. Simon Hughes, Mr. Alex Carlile, Mr. Malcolm Bruce and Mr. A. J. Beith.

YOUTH CHARTER

Mr. James Wallace accordingly presented a Bill to promote opportunities for young people in International Youth Year 1985 by establishing a youth charter giving rights and representations to young people; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 19 April and to be printed. [Bill 55.]

Orders of the Day

Shipbuilding Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

3.53 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Lamont): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This is a short and essentially technical measure. Its purpose is twofold. First, it extends the life of the Great Britain and Northern Ireland shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme by 18 months and, secondly, it formally writes off certain irrecoverable outstanding loans made by the Shipbuilding Industry Board to Upper Clyde Shipbuilders in the period 1968-72.

The shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme was first introduced in 1978, shortly after the nationalisation of shipbuilding. In introducing the Bill on Second Reading, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) described it primarily as a scheme "to alleviate the human problems caused by any contraction of the industry".

He went on to acknowledge that "shipbuilding industries all over the world are facing the inevitability of contraction" and that

"this country cannot isolate itself from that trend".—[Official Report, 16 January 1978; Vol. 942, c. 173-5.]

Those were wise words, of which from time to time we have had cause to remind him. He also emphasised the original limitation of the life of the scheme. At that time it was limited to two years. That was the period that the right hon. Gentleman then thought would take us past the then approaching slump in shipbuilding. In that regard he was perhaps less prophetic.

I recall the occasion well because I was the Opposition spokesman who had the task of welcoming the Bill. I did so, though with a slightly different emphasis. I saw it not just as a measure to alleviate the inevitable misery of redundancy but as a tool to help smooth the path of transition to competitive manning in the industry and to help people thus made redundant to move to the industries of the future. I still hold that view. No one would dispute that the scheme has contributed significantly over the years both to the alleviation of the problems of redundancy in a contracting industry and to progress in relation to the problems of contraction itself. It has proved a valuable tool in the management of change within shipbuilding and has helped in an extremely difficult period.

That is why in 1982 we introduced an order prolonging the life of the scheme until June this year. It was clear then that further contraction was likely. It would have been wrong to have allowed it to have lapsed during such a period of uncertainty, and prolongation seemed the sensible course. As events have shown, with the continued rapid decline in the fortunes of the industry and the consequent reduction in the work force, that was the right decision.

British Shipbuilders has taken advantage of the scheme to a considerable extent. About 35,000 workers in British Shipbuilders have benefited under the scheme at a total cost of £130 million since it began. Today, some 7,000 people are in receipt of the weekly payments. We are now approaching the end of that extension, and the Government have had to decide whether to ask the House to extend the scheme once again. We took the decision to bring forward the measure before the House in the light of the industry's present position.

Merchant shipbuilding continues to face an enormously difficult market. Apart from the upturn of 1979-80, it has, for the whole period of nationalisation, fought an uphill struggle in a deep recession against highly competitive far eastern producers. The inevitable contraction, seen and accepted by the Opposition in 1977, has happened. The merchant shipbuilding sector of British Shipbuilders has halved and is now about 11,000 men, including engine building.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): The hon. Gentlemen refers constantly to the statement by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). Then we had a Labour Government who were working for an upturn in the economy. Since then we have had a Conservative Government who have allowed the shipbuilding and other industries to decline to the extent that there is now a continuing crisis. Is not that the basic reason why we are again facing this problem?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong. Shipbuilding deals in an international market, and now, as then, there has been a substantial contraction internationally. As the hon. Gentleman knows, shipbuilding contracted at that time, and the words of the right hon. Member for Gorton which I have quoted showed that he envisaged that there would be some contraction. I do not blame the right hon. Gentleman for not foreseeing that the period of recession in international shipping would last very much longer than the period thought likely to be the case in 1979.

In the past 12 months, alongside the retrenchment, we have also seen within British Shipbuilders some encouraging signs of improving performance. British Shipbuilders is beginning to see marked improvements in throughput per man, even at a time of low work load. That is the period when productivity gains are the hardest to make.

Nineteen eighty-four will be remembered in British Shipbuilders as the year in which common sense prevailed, when a vital agreement on flexible working practices was signed and when the Cammell Laird work force voted with its feet to defy the militants. I hope that 1985 will prove to be the year when the benefits of a positive approach by management and work force show through in vitally needed new orders.

We must be under no illusions. British Shipbuilders still has a long way to go to achieve real stability and a firm future. It would be foolish to ignore the genuine risk that the market will force yet further rationalisation on the corporation. We must all recognise that, even to maintain its market share, it must become more competitive, which in turn means fewer people building the same number of ships.

Meanwhile, the Government intend to push ahead with the policies of privatisation stated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in July 1984. We shall seek to return as much as possible of the industry to the private sector. More immediately, we intend to sell the warship yards by March 1986. Taken with the privatisation of ship repair yards and the disposal last year of Scott Lithgow, this means that by the end of 1986 the public sector will account for less than one-third of the United Kingdom's shipbuilding industry and will employ only 17,000 to 18,000 people — 11,000 of them in British Shipbuilders — even if no further redundancies take place either in British Shipbuilders or in Harland and Wolff.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Does the measure affect those formerly employed in the yards of British Shipbuilders who are now working for private companies?

Mr. Lamont: It does not affect them, because yards that have been privatised do not benefit from the scheme. A person who is already in receipt of benefits under the scheme will not be affected by the Bill. The hon. Gentleman can rest assured about that.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I wish to take the question a stage further. The Government intend to privatise some yards. What would be the fate of workers in yards which are now publicly owned and which become privately owned who may be made redundant? Would they qualify under the scheme?

Mr. Lamont: I shall obviously outline that in my speech.

The background to our decision about whether to extend the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme is thus one of the continuing risk of further rationalisation in merchant shipbuilding coupled with a huge reduction in the size of the state sector that will result from the transfer back of certain yards to the private sector.

In our view, it would be wrong in those circumstances to let the scheme lapse now. Since the last prolongation it has served well as a means of alleviating the distress of those made redundant and of enabling the corporation to achieve the inevitable contraction both smoothly and efficiently.

While there remains a need for further rationalisation and a real risk of further contraction of merchant shipbuilding, and while the complex and difficult process of privatising the warship yards is under way, it would be inequitable and inappropriate to remove the scheme. However, we do not propose prolongation because we, British Shipbuilders or Harland and Wolff have plans for further major redundancies in merchant shipbuilding. There are no such plans. But we cannot ignore the risk that further rationalisation will be necessary. It is against that contingency that we are proposing this extension today.

Nor do we expect preparation for privatisation to result in any further retrenchment in the warship yards. The recent job losses at Swan Hunter and Vospers were the result of a failure by those yards to achieve merchant or export orders—an essential complement to the base load of work for the Royal Navy. The impetus to efficiency that will result from the return to the private sector promises in the longer term to generate jobs rather than to lose them. We believe that the scheme should be prolonged, but at the same time we do not believe that it should be prolonged indefinitely.

The scheme applies only to the state sector. Like all statutory schemes, it is inevitably more costly to administer than company-based arrangements.

When the state owned most of the industry and a long period of massive retrenchment lay ahead, statutory redundancy payment schemes made practical sense. By the end of 1986 the state will own less than one third of the United Kingdom industry. Moreover, if it is to survive, the remaining merchant shipbuilding sector will by then have had to fight its way back to a competitive position and to have found a level of reasonable stability. The need and justification for the scheme will thus have passed. We have concluded that it should be extended only this one, last, time to the end of 1986. I cannot tell the House what the cost of the scheme will be, because the cost of extending it will depend on the redundancies that take place. As a guide to what might happen and to indicate the "ball park" area, the cost of the scheme in 1983-84, when there were 7,000 redundancies—that is vastly in excess of what is likely to happen in the much smaller state-owned merchant sector—was £34 million. That covered both some payments for that year's redundancies and some payments to people made redundant in previous years.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): It is significant that the Minister said that there would be no redundancy provisions after 1986. Presumably there will still be a British Shipbuilders in operation, building merchant ships, whatever happens to the Government's privatisation proposals. Is not the Minister in effect saying that workers who do not accept redundancy from British Shipbuilders before the end of 1986 will not receive redundancy payments? Is he not therefore placing a threat on them to complete redundancy schemes before the end of 1986?

Mr. Lamont: Obviously, I am coming to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's point which the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) also raised. I shall deal with what will happen to the yards that are privatised and with what will happen in the remaining state sector after 1986. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman will let me finish my remarks, I shall address both questions.

The Northern Ireland scheme covering Harland and Wolff has always run parallel to and on the same basis as that for British Shipbuilders. It would, therefore, make sense to maintain it for the same period of 18 months. The Bill does that. There will naturally be anxiety about what will follow the schemes. The management of British Shipbuilders, Harland and Wolff and their work forces must resolve that matter. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and I propose to ask both organisations, in consultation with their unions, to establish appropriate successor schemes by the early autumn of 1986. It is too early to predict the details of such schemes. They will be negotiated between the management and work force, just as in the private sector. However, at this stage there is no need to worry that the work forces may end up worse off.

I recognise that there has always been anxiety that it is inequitable for the scheme to be available to the public but not to the private sector. Those with the interests of the present private sector in mind may argue either that the scheme should be extended to the whole industry or should be abolished now. I am quite clear that an extension to the private sector would be the wrong solution. A statutory scheme for the entire shipbuilding industry would be expensive, bureaucratic and wrong in principle. Employees of the warship yards will not be able to claim under this scheme after those yards join the private sector. They may be assimilated into an existing scheme, if one is already provided by the new owners, or a new scheme may be established as a result of negotiations between the new owners and the work force at the time of privatisation.

The reverse argument—that the scheme should go now—has been put forcibly by, among others, the Shipbuilders and Ship-repairers' Independent Association. I ask hon. Members who take that view to accept the Government's judgment that the interests of shipbuilding and of its work force are best served by a limited prolongation through the contribution that it will continue to make in the management of any contraction in the state sector.

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): I know that the Government's policy is to keep their hands away from manufacturing industry, but will the Minister intervene to encourage the unions and management to reach redundancy agreements similar to those that we are talking about now?

Mr. Lamont: I can give no such commitment. I shall ask the management of British Shipbuilders to negotiate a scheme. Equally, for the privatised yards, it will be for the unions and managements to negotiate agreements. It would be wrong for the Government to lay down conditions or to say what the benefits of any scheme should be.

On that basis, I commend this final extension of the scheme to the House as a sensible contribution to our support for the shipbuilding industry.

Clause 2 writes off the outstanding irrecoverable loans made between 1968 and 1972 by the Shipbuilding Industry Board to Upper Clyde Shipbuilders Ltd.—a company now in liquidation—and reduces the assets of the National Loans Fund accordingly. In the "Accounts relating to issues from the National Loan Funds" for 1982-83, published on 12 December 1983 and presented to Parliament, it was stated that parliamentary approval to write off those loans would be sought in the financial year 1983-84. No suitable opportunity arose in that year. This Bill is the first suitable vehicle affording such an opportunity. That is all that I need to say about clause 2.

I commend the Bill to the House.

4.12 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): The Minister presented the Bill as a small technical operation designed simply to extend the redundancy payments scheme for a further 18 months beyond the period already sanctioned by Parliament. However, towards the end of his speech, as he explained the implications of the Bill, it became clear to me and to my right hon. and hon. Friends that something much more important was afoot. The Minister said that the Government had no intention of prolonging the redundancy payments scheme beyond the end of 1986 and that they do not propose to have similar schemes for the yards that are privatised as a result of the Government's privatisation policy.

The Minister would think us naive if we did not immediately ask him some searching questions on the implications of the Government's decision not to continue the scheme beyond 1986 and not to seek similar schemes in the private sector. What will happen to workers, as we near the end of 1986, who fear that they might become redundant in 1987? The Minister says to those workers, "You need not worry. You will be no worse off because I hope that a scheme will have been negotiated between British Shipbuilders and its work force that will give you redundancy protection." If the scheme has to be negotiated, how can the Minister say that the workers will be no worse off? The negotiated scheme could be considerably worse than the present scheme, in which case the workers would be worse off.

The Minister cannot say that the workers will be no worse off unless he gives us a guarantee today that he will insist that any negotiated redundancy payment scheme is no worse than the scheme currently available. He signally failed to do that. I hope that before the end of the debate the Minister or the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will make the Government's position clear. For the purposes of our debate at present, it seems clear that the Government will not insist on similar schemes and that the Minister's statement that the workers will be no worse off is meaningless and has no validity.

The second crucial aspect is that workers in the private sector, and workers in enterprises that will be sold over their heads to the private sector, will have worse redundancy protection than will the workers who remain in British Shipbuilders. That is undeniable. That factor will affect the thinking of the workers in the industry as they see their conditions of work worsening materially as a result of the Government's privatisation policy.

Another and perhaps more sinister aspect arises from that. What will be the view of workers who are considering their futures in the period before privatisation? Might they be tempted to say, "It would be wise to apply for redundancy before the yard is privatised so that I can have the rights under the existing scheme. If I do not apply for redundancy before privatisation, I will lose my rights after the yard is privatised." An elderly worker who has spent all his working life in the shipbuilding industry—as is not untypical in most shipyards—will be tempted to apply for redundancy which he might not want and which it might not be in the interests of the company to give him. However, the temptation will be such that he will take redundancy to ensure that he receives as much compensation as is available at present, bearing in mind the possibility that he might get no compensation after privatisation.

Is that not a way of reducing the work force immediately before privatisation, with the bill for redundancy being paid by the taxpayer so that the new private owner takes over a much smaller work force and has no obligation to pay the social costs of the changes in the industry? An extremely devious proposal is being put forward under the apparently innocent and generous terms of the Bill.

I am surprised that the Minister has not interrupted me while I have been making those allegations to say that I am wrong. I suspect that I am right about those facts, and the Minister is silent because my allegations are true. That will cause anxiety throughout the shipbuilding industry for those who will remain in the public sector and even more so for those who will be affected by the Government's privatisation proposals. It is a new twist to the saga of privatisation that was not revealed until the Minister made those remarks towards the end of his speech introducing this apparently innocent Bill. No doubt those features of the proposals will command most of our attention during the debate, and I am sure that my hon. Friends will wish to ask some searching questions.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is not true to say that this is an entirely new development. When parts of British Shipbuilders were privatised—this is what happened with Tyne Shiprepair Group Ltd. and Scott Lithgow—workers lost their entitlement under the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme. Compensation for that was the subject of negotiation. The state scheme applies to the state sector. It would be inappropriate for smaller state sector, employing 11,000 people in British Shipbuilders, to have the full panoply of the state scheme. That is simple common sense.

Mr. Smith: The Minister has put none of my fears at rest. I am not sure what happened with the other privatised yards, but my hon. Friends assure me that it was not quite as the Minister described it. Compensation was given to those workers in respect of the loss of their prospective redundancy payments. I do not know whether that is proposed in the case of the privatised yards. Is the Minister saying that at Yarrows, which appears to be the first candidate for privatisation, compensation will be paid to the workers for the loss of prospective redundancy payment rights under the present scheme? If not, why not?

If the Minister rests his case by saying that he is doing nothing different from what happened with the privatisation of the Scott Lithgow yard and compensation was given to those workers, why does he not offer compensation to the workers at Yarrows, who will lose the right to participate in the present scheme? The answer is that he will not do that. Those workers will lose out. The parallel drawn by the Minister is extremely inept. He has chosen a boomerang as a weapon.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Is it not true that the workers in Tyne Shiprepairers were each given £2,100 as a lump sum payment to come out of the shipbuilding redundancy scheme? What the Minister says is not true. It is misleading the House to say that this has happened previously, because the workers in Tyne Shiprepairers were bought out of the redundancy scheme.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, whose deep knowledge of the shipbuilding industry is yet again of great value to the House. That is a very good example of how the Minister was seeking to lay a false trail across our path with his reference to previous privatisation exercises.

As a result of what my hon. Friend said, it is an odd state of affairs that some people were compensated for their loss of rights when they left British Shipbuilders, but that those who stay in British Shipbuilders after 1986 will lose rights in respect of which they will get no compensation. Their reward for staying in the state corporation is that they will lose rights. The Government's approach is thoroughly unsatisfactory and will cause a great deal of fear and worry throughout the shipbuilding communities.

At the end of the day, it worries me most of all that it will be said to workers in yards which are to be privatised that they ought to leave soon so that they will get the benefit of redundancy pay, and that will obviously be of advantage to the incoming privatiser, because he will take over a much smaller work force, with no social obligations. Once again the taxpayer will have to foot the bill for social change, while the very large profits likely to be made in the warship yards will go to private sector employers who will take them over, perhaps at knockdown prices, with almost no social responsibilities.

This is a much more significant Bill as a result of what the Minister said in his closing remarks than appeared on a first reading of it. To the extent that the Minister has revealed the Government's devious intentions, I suppose that we ought to be grateful to him because we are now forewarned about what is to happen.

The reason why we have to discuss redundancies at all is the crisis in the shipbuilding industry. We debated this on 27 November last year, in official Opposition time, when we drew attention to the deepening crisis in the industry. There has been very little improvement since then, and the worry in the industry is growing.

I had the opportunity just before Christmas to take part in a conference of shipbuilding workers in Newcastle, organised by the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union, representing nearly all the workers in the shipbuilding industry in Tyne and Wear. I was left in no doubt about the very substantial worries and fears in the industry amongst the work force, many of whom have given most of their lives to that industry. They are acutely aware of the problem which Sir Robert Atkinson mentioned in a speech only a few months ago, which is that the real worry and fear in the shipbuilding industry, particularly on the merchant shipping side, is that one yard will close after another. The more that one listens to the Government's plans, the more it becomes clear that they are unconcerned about whether one yard closes after another.

The fact that the former chairman, Sir Robert Atkinson, speaks in those terms is extremely interesting. He can hardly be accused of being a Labour sympathiser. He has described himself as a great admirer of the Prime Minister, but he said that it broke his heart to see what had been done to the shipbuilding industry in recent years. We know that the crisis has deepened significantly over the last two or three years, and not just as a result of the decline in orders internationally.

The Minister will be acutely aware of perhaps the most significant comment by Sir Robert Atkinson. He said that during his period in charge of British Shipbuilders he was never asked by Ministers about research and development and about the future of the industry. He added:

"But if I talked about closures or redundancies, their eyes shone."

That is the former chairman of British Shipbuilders talking about the Government's attitude to the vitally important shipbuilding industry, and I repeat it because it is worth listening to again:

"But if I talked about closures or redundancies, their eyes shone."

Presumably the Minister of State was one of those whose eyes shone on these occasions.

Sir Robert went on to describe the Government's privatisation policy as "political dogma." He said:

"The Government wants rid of British Shipbuilders."

Given that context of Government policy, it is no surprise that we have had more redundancies recently, and it looks as though there may be more in train. What the Minister said today about the redundancy terms of the Bill makes us worry that, either by inducement or by fear, there will be the acceleration of a large number or redundancies in the yards which are about to be privatised.

I hope that the Government will think carefully about the terms of the Bill. I hope that they will think carefully about the foolish decision not to extend the redundancy scheme beyond 1986. They ought to think carefully about having a fair relationship between those in the privatised sector and those remaining in the public sector so that, as far as can be achieved, justice is done, and on the same basis, to everyone who works in the shipbuilding industry.

Even more important than that, there must be a real effort to try to save the shipbuilding industry. It is not just an ordinary industry to be looked at from the point of view that some industries rise and other industries fall and that we have to accept that almost as we accept the fates. The shipbuilding industry is extremely important to the United Kingdom because of its close connection with the shipping industry, which itself is a crucial industry, for vital reasons of trade and defence.

No maritime nation such as Britain can be without a proper shipping industry. As was made clear in a recent debate, we know the worry and concern in all parts of the House about the decline of our shipping industry, which is running down at the rate of about two ships a week. From having one of the largest merchant shipping fleets in the world, Britain is rapidly slipping down the league table to the point where it will probably be impossible for us again to mount a merchant shipping back-up for a military expedition such as the Falklands.

It is also crucial for a country which depends on trade for so much of its national wealth to have an adequate shipping facility, because for the foreseeable future most of our trade will be carried by sea.

It is therefore crucial to have a shipbuilding industry to back up that shipping industry. I recommend to the Government once again the idea of a national maritime strategy, which has been urged not just from the Opposition Benches but from all parts of the House, whereby the Government decide that there must be a real incentive to maintain a British shipping industry and that in turn there must be real incentives not only for ships to be ordered but for ships to be built in British shipyards.

The Japanese shipbuilding industry was rescued by a large order by the Sanko shipping company of Japan. Despite the fact that a one third price discount is available to Japanese shippers if they buy their ships from Korean yards, not one Japanese shipping company has put an order outwith Japan. I wish that we could say the same about the British shipping industry.

Whatever the attitudes of British shippers, they should be given the maximum incentive, and the disincentives introduced in the 1984 Budget by the Chancellor of the Exchequer are having a bad effect. I hope that in 1985 the Chancellor will rethink his position so that we start having fiscal as well as other policies which will support a national maritime strategy.

I hope, too, that the Government will end this folly of privatisation. We saw another evil aspect of privatisation revealed in the Minister's speech. Let me remind the House about what is proposed. The most profitable section of British Shipbuilders, the part of the industry which is almost the pensioner of the Government because it fulfills only Government orders and operates generally on a cost-plus basis — that jewel in the crown from the profitability point of view — is to be sold off to the private sector, apparently with as few obligations attached to it as possible. The rest of British Shipbuilders has to survive as it may without the help of any cost subsidy from the profitable section. We shall be left with beleaguered merchant shipping yards open to the fierce winds of competition, and they may very well close one after another. We shall be left with a warship building capability dependent on Ministry of Defence orders and a merchant shipbuilding industry which may have almost vanished. In those circumstances, to hand over those assets and to allow the others to wither, or for there to be an obligation for the others to be picked up by the state, is nothing short of ludicrous folly.

The extension of the period of tender seems to have resulted in industrial bloodhounds sniffing around those yards which are to be privatised, looking for some easy pickings. We know from experience that some British companies are adept at seeing what can be got from declining industries at the cheapest possible price. They then start new and profitable businesses out of investment which was made previously by the public sector in businesses which are available to them at knockdown prices. I hope that the Government will take great care to avoid that. I am told that there are already considerable fears among, for example, the work force at Yarrows over the number of bidders that there may be for that yard. Yarrows and Hall Russell appear to be the first in the privatisation stakes.

Finally, let me make a special plea to the Government to deal with the consequences of redundancies in the shipbuilding areas in a more imaginative way than simply by continuing, even for a limited period, the redundancy payments scheme. In many industries the Government are under the illusion that it is sufficient to compensate people for the loss of their individual jobs. They fail to understand that, although the individual may be compensated for his redundancy, the job is lost for ever to the community. It is not enough in the mining industry, the shipbuilding industry, the steel industry or any of our heavy industries where redundancies have occurred to think that the book can be closed from a social point of view when a certain amount of money has been paid to a person who has been made redundant. The community in which that person lives and his descendants will have lost the opportunity of employment.

In part of the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), about 49 per cent. of those on the unemployed register are skilled workers. That must be a unique situation in the United Kingdom. We know the loss that that community has suffered. Will the Government consider giving special help to those areas affected by the rundown of the shipbuilding industry? I am sure that the situation that I have described in Newcastle can be found in other areas where there has been a heavy concentration of shipbuilding.

It is folly at this time to devalue the regional policy instruments which were previously available to such areas. Under regional policy changes there has been the abolition of the special development area incentives. When one cuts through all the waffle of the Government's statement, that is the most important change, apart from the cutback in the amount of money committed to regional development.

I hope that in the near future we shall have an opportunity to debate these matters at great length. I merely say now that of all the times to take such steps in areas affected by the rundown of shipbuilding, this seems to be the most stupid. Therefore, I ask the Government to consider providing some special help for those areas. This has been achieved in other industries; for example, by British Steel Corporation industries, and such provisions have been talked about for the coal mining industry. I do not know whether it will be suitable to give such help under the aegis of British Shipbuilders, or whether it should be given by some other Government task force mechanism, but I hope that the Government will give serious consideration to a special regime which can be introduced into those shipbuilding areas which have experienced redundancies so that communities, as well as individuals, receive some assistance. It is not good enough to look at the matter in terms of individuals. We must think of the individuals who have yet to come and others dependent on the industries in the community.

The rundown in some parts of the shipbuilding industry in Britain has been savage and severe. It has been as savage and severe as anything that has been suffered in any other part of the country by any other industry. Other areas and industries have received special help and I can see no good reason why the shipbuilding areas should not do so as well. Instead of bringing the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme to an end in 1986, I hope that the Government will think more seriously about much more imaginative measures, such as those that I have suggested.

We cannot accept the Minister's speech today with complacency or with a feeling of satisfaction. He has raised many serious fears and he will have to come to the Dispatch Box a few more times before those fears are finally relieved.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): I wish to intervene briefly on a modest and useful little Bill. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) went wide, as he is entitled to do on Second Reading, and I am tempted to follow him further. However, I have spoken in previous debates on shipping and shipbuilding and I shall not, immediately after Christmas in our first debate of the new year, break a rule that I have set myself to be extremely modest in my contributions in the House. I know that one can tax the patience of one's colleagues beyond endurance, so I shall be brief.

My hon. Friend the Minister did not go far enough in his comments on clause 1. What is his timetable for the privatisation of the warship builders? I declare a constituency interest because I have one such yard in my constituency. I have received a clear message, from both the management and the work force—if the yard is to be privatised, for heaven's sake get on with it. I think that both sides of the House will agree that the worst position is to be in a state of limbo, both from the point of view of a yard's customers and the obtaining of orders, and also from the point of view of morale within a yard. Therefore, if our local yard of Vosper Thornycroft is to be sold, as I gather it is, for heaven's sake get on with it and tell us when it is to be sold and on what terms. I know that the Labour party disagrees with the Government's policy, but, given that it is the policy, I think that even the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East will agree that there is a great advantage in speed in the despatch of such matters.

I know that the right hon. and learned Gentleman, coming from the part of the country that he does, has an interest in Yarrows, as a lead warship yard. He will agree that the degree to which compensation to redundant workers will be necessary in the warship yards depends on the extent to which the Ministry of Defence places orders. I and the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) have time and again raised in the House the question of the type 22 frigates. That is not even a Treasury matter. The Ministry of Defence does not have to extract money from the Treasury. It has been in all the estimates. But when will orders be placed for the two type 22 frigates for which the hon. Member for Birkenhead and myself are waiting? The delay has gone on for 15 months.

That raises the wider issue. Can we not get out of the Ministry of Defence an agreement that there should be a programme of future naval ordering that is generally known within the industry? It does not mean that it need commit itself on every order to a particular yard because it can be argued that if such a commitment were made years ahead a yard would go soft, and so on. One knows the arguments. But, given the five-year programming of Government investment — we have an annual White Paper on that—I see no reason why there cannot be a five-year programme for naval ordering by the Ministry of Defence.

That does not seem to raise any ideological issues; it just means prudent forward thinking. The House will notice that I forbear to use the word "planning". It may be unacceptable to some of my right hon. Friends. I simply use the words "forward thinking". I see no reason why that cannot be done. All the evidence from such relations as I have with the armed services is that that would be acceptable to the Ministry of Defence at the operating level. That again would assist us on the issue of the labour force within the remaining warship building yards. I offer it as a positive proposition upon which I see no reason why there should be any disagreement in the House.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State who will reply to the debate is a supplicant in this, because, of course, the Ministry of Defence is the relevant ordering Department. Indeed, I notice that no one from that Department is present. But why cannot the Ministry of Defence have an even naval ordering programme? Some years ago a White Paper—I cannot remember which—agreed with that theory. However, in practice there is no such even ordering. We always hear that great phrase "the lessons of the Falklands". Those lessons were to be written into every new naval order, but in practice they have led to few orders.

The Ministry of Defence is very complex, and perhaps those involved are unable to agree among themselves, but I cannot see why we cannot have a proper annual ordering programme. We should all tell the Ministry that we must have an annual ordering programme that is given at least three years ahead, and preferably five years ahead. I am sorry that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East is no longer in the Chamber, as he suggested that there were easy profits to be made by the warship yards out of the Ministry of Defence. If that is so, that is a problem for the Ministry. But the difficulty of the warship yards is that they have a near-monopoly buyer —the Ministry of Defence.

It is often said that the way out for warship yards is export orders, but most of us with any experience of defence ordering know that it is very difficult to sell defence equipment abroad—whether for navy, air force or army — unless our own forces are buying it. Therefore, unless a naval warship builder obtains an order, particularly a first-of-type order from the Ministry, it will find it very difficult to persuade any foreign buyer, however admirable the proposition may be on paper, to place an order in practice.

The Ministry of Defence may tell a yard, "I am sorry that we are taking so long to make up our minds, but I hope that you will understand our difficulties. You go off and find an export order." But that is not good enough, because the yard will not obtain an export order if it is known that the Ministry is not placing an order. That point must be generally accepted, and relates to clause 1 and the number of redundancies likely on the warship building side.

I have spoken in the House before about the Merchant Navy, and, as the House knows, I am not in entire agreement with the Government. I have some sympathy for what the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East said about a more general maritime policy. A maritime policy as such almost sounds too particular, and slightly pompous, to some of us. However, we must look across the board and consider the effect of one decision upon another in different Departments and sectors of the economy. To that extent, I am of course in favour of a maritime policy, but I would not put it quite as grandly as the right hon. and learned Gentleman did. But that is why I sit below rather than above the Gangway.

Dr. Godman: Given what the hon. Gentleman has just said about the need for the enactment of a maritime policy, has not the time come for setting up a Royal Commission to examine the shipbuilding, shipping and maritime service industries?

Sir David Price: I have great sympathy with the motive behind the hon. Gentleman's intervention, but I prefer the House to Royal Commissions. It is an old-fashioned prejudice of mine. I have been here for 30 years and still think that the House is a better instrument than a Royal Commission. But then, I am very old-fashioned in these matters and I do not think that we can duck problems by passing them to Royal Commissions. We should deal with them here in the House. We are perfectly capable of doing so. Incidentally, I am a great supporter of Select Committees. In the last Parliament, I won third place in the ballot for private Member's Bills and tried to implement a proposal of a Select Committee, of which I was not a member, on the flexibility of pensions.

I believe that we should make the House of Commons work. We run ourselves down, but I believe that we are capable of doing much more and of having much more influence on Government than at present. Thus, although I am sympathetic to the hon. Gentleman's question, he should talk about not Royal Commissions but the House.

I may disagree with the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East because I believe that the shipbuilding industry is one of our old industries and that it is on the way down. I do not think that it will be eliminated, but the question is at what point it bottoms out and begins to take off again. For those involved, there are three priorities. First, I should like to see earlier retirement. That was the object of a Bill that I tried to promote during the last Session. Unless the state old-age pension is made more flexible, it will be harder for industrial redundancy schemes to accommodate earlier retirement. The basis of the approach to pensions on the part of Governments of both parties has been that retirement income has two elements: the state old-age pension and the occupational pension. Men suffer particularly because they do not receive their old-age pensions until they are 65, whereas women do so at 60. The lack of equality between the sexes is offensive. There is a strong case for earlier retirement in the old heavy industries, but we must get the retirement terms right. Given the conditions in which people used to work and sometimes still do work in the shipbuilding industry, it is only right to draw attention to that point.

Secondly, there is a case for job sharing between older workers. We have not begun to put our minds to that whole new area. But one social reaction to the second industrial revolution must be a degree of job sharing. Thirdly, I always believe in generous redundancy terms. In the long run, that is not only socially right but cheap at the price.

I noticed that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East paid little attention to a point relating to clause 2. In 1967 there was a debate about putting public money into Upper Clyde Shipbuilders. I was then sitting where the right hon. and learned Gentleman now sits, on the Opposition Front Bench, and I remember that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who was then Minister of Technology, had shipbuilding within his brief. At the time, I criticised the choice of Upper Clyde Shipbuilders, but not the principle. It was not wrong at that time to put public money into British shipbuilding and, indeed, into Scottish shipbuilding, but the choice of the upper rather than the lower Clyde was wrong. We should have gone for the lower Clyde and for building a brand new closed yard, under cover, so that the workers were not exposed to the weather. It could have been built on the lines of the Swedish and Japanese yards, but that did not happen. The lesson to be drawn from the demise of Upper Clyde Shipbuilders is not that in principle it is always wrong to put public money into industry, but that the recipient of that investment should be chosen very carefully and in relation not to industrial history but to one's judgment about future trends in technology and markets.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East spoke about the desirability of cross-subsidisation between merchant and warship yards. That is a highly questionable proposition. Accountancy as between one yard and another in a large organisation or in any great industrial empire is not that precise. There is also a clear distinction between the two types of yard. It could well prejudice naval ordering and the future of the naval yards if they were to cross-subsidise the merchant yards.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke about the loss of jobs and was concerned not only that those who lost their jobs should be compensated but that the areas in which they lived should be compensated, too. In principle, we can all see the social consequences of the closure of a yard. As the House knows, at one time I was the Minister who had to deal with regional development. In principle, of course, one cared passionately about the strategy, although how far any of us got the tactics right is questionable.

I offer the House this thought. In the old Board of Trade, where I was dealing with these matters, we were running a tight control on industrial development and had incentives to attract industry to favoured areas. It is arguable whether we achieved much. What came out clearly was that investment in transportation and in the public infrastructure was a great deal more important than trying to put pressure on individual firms to go or not to go where we in Government wanted.

My answer to the right hon. and learned Gentleman is that I accept strategically the point he has made but I do not believe that it is most effectively achieved tactically by direct Government intervention in individual firms. To put our money and the public's money into the investment infrastructure is better than to put it into specific projects. I leave that thought with the House.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) always makes an interesting and thoughtful contribution to our shipbuilding debates and his speeches are always made out of genuine concern for the shipbuilding industry, a concern which is not, unfortunately, shared on the Government side of the House. I agree with some things that he said, particularly about the naval ordering programme, but on other matters I disagree with him. As I am a Member representing one of the shipyards on the upper Clyde, the hon. Gentleman would not expect me to agree with what he said about the upper Clyde. I do not wish to debate some of the points he made; rather I should like to deal with the Bill.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said, redundancy is not a cause for rejoicing even when there are generous redundancy payments. There is a tendency on the part of the Government to consider it a great victory when, as they would say, workers are queueing up for redundancy in a shipyard or a factory. I consider that a defeat not only for the shipyard or the factory and the locality but for the whole of manufacturing industry. Therefore, it is not a sufficient response to the problems of the shipbuilding industry to provide for adequate or even generous redundancy terms.

If there is to be redundancy—unfortunately, we have suffered a good deal of redundancy in the shipbuilding industry in the past year — it is important that the redundancy arrangements should be adequate and, indeed, generous. I do not believe that the statutory scheme for shipbuilding is generous compared with other schemes such as that for the steel industry and that now proposed for coal mining.

It is disturbing that even the statutory scheme for the shipbuilding industry is to be ended on 31 December 1986. There was absolutely no warning of this. The Bill was published only on 3 January during the Christmas recess. When we left for the recess we had no idea of what was in the Bill. The press notice put out with the Bill on 3 January gave us no information about the Bill and did not explain its implications which only became clear in some of the explanations that we had from the Minister of State this afternoon.

Like my hon. Friends, I am opposed to the ending of the scheme in December 1986. The Minister said that we should not worry because he was confident that before that date British Shipbuilders would be able to negotiate at least as favourable terms with the trade unions for the part of the industry that stays under British Shipbuilders; that is my understanding of the Minister's speech. If the terms for the remaining part of British Shipbuilders turn out to be at least as good as the present terms — the trade unions will accept nothing less—there is no purpose in stopping the scheme at the end of 1986 because the cost to British Shipbuilders and, therefore, ultimately to the Government, the owner of British Shipbuilders, will be the same.

If the scheme is to continue in a non-statutory form for the remaining part of British Shipbuilders, there is no purpose in ending the statutory scheme. It would be much more sensible and would not cause the anxiety that undoubtedly the Minister's statement today will cause among the workers in the industry at the decision to end the scheme in December 1986.

An interesting question arises as to what happens to the bits of the industry that will be privatised. What the Minister said about that this afternoon is not accurate, as was pointed out in an intervention about Tyne Shiprepair. At the time of the privatisation of Tyne Shiprepair compensation was offered to the workers for the loss of their redundancy arrangements.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Compensation was negotiated as part of the sole arrangement. Compensation could be negotiated when the warship yards are privatised. Company schemes could be negotiated. Obviously, a state statutory scheme by definition does not extend to the private sector. When Scott Lithgow and Tyne Shiprepair were privatised, the entitlement to the statutory benefit was lost. Compensation was paid, not as a right but as a result of negotiation. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that the position is analogous between the privatisation of warship yards in the future and the privatisations that have happened in the past. There is the possibility of negotiated compensation if there is no scheme.

Mr. Millan: I shall come in a moment to the further privatisation proposals about which I want information that we have not yet had from the Minister or any other source.

First, in regard to Scott Lithgow, my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) may want to say more about that as the constituency Member if he is fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In a written answer on 19 December, the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry informed me that when Scott Lithgow was sold to Trafalgar House part of the contingent liability taken on by British Shipbuilders and, therefore, taken on by the Government, because they are the paymaster, was

"benefits, equivalent to the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme, to a maximum of 1,600 workers who might be made redundant within a year of the sale."—[Official Report, 19 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 252.]

In other words, the workers in Scott Lithgow were protected. Incidentally, they did not negotiate that. There was no trade union negotiation with Trafalgar House or anyone else. It was part of the deal that there was protection for a maximum of 1,600 workers under the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme for at least a year after the sale of Scott Lithgow in March 1983. The cost of redundancies at Scott Lithgow will be borne not by the new owners but by British Shipbuilders and, ultimately, by the Government. Redundancies costing £400,000 have already taken place. The new owners have not taken on responsibility for redundancies. The Government, through British Shipbuilders, have maintained that liability.

Trafalgar House did not pay for the yard in full. It was sold for much less than the asset value. We should like to know the details of the financial deal. The cost did not fall on the new owners of the yard. The Government and Trafalgar House negotiated the sale through British Shipbuilders.

Documents which represent offers for sale have already gone out in respect of Yarrow, Hall Russell and other yards which are due for privatisation. The documents have not been made public. Public assets are being sold on the basis of offers for sale which have not been made public. Even hon. Members cannot obtain copies of the offers for sale.

Mr. Norman Lamont: They are available.

Mr. Millan: If so, I should like to obtain copies. I hope that the Minister will send me copies of all the offers for all the yards that are to be privatised. I understand that the documents have not been made available publicly. I understand that interested parties hold the documents on the understanding that they will not disclose their contents to any other party, however genuine, including workers in the yards. Assets are to be sold and the workers are not to be told the contents of the offer for sale documents.

What do the documents say about redundancy obligations under the new ownership? Redundancy obligations will make a difference to the price that a genuine buyer might offer for a yard. Purchasers of the naval yards—we are opposed to the sale of such yards—who want a quiet life must take on an obligation to provide a redundancy payments scheme by agreement with the trade unions. If they do not, they will have a heck of a lot of difficulty with the trade unions.

The Government have always said that, whatever else happens when an industry is privatised, pension arrangements and conditions will not be adversely affected. Unless the new owners continue a similar redundancy scheme workers' conditions will be adversely affected. The new owners, whoever they are, will be foolish not to take on similar obligations.

Such obligations will influence the amount of money that a purchaser is likely to offer for a yard. The Government and the taxpayer will, therefore, foot the bill. For the Government to say that negotiations have nothing to do with them is misleading because the money will come from the public purse.

If privatisation goes ahead, despite our opposition, it must be on terms that are not detrimental to the workers. If the new owners do not accept such obligations workers will want to accept redundancy before privatisation while the present terms are still available. That is not a sensible way to run an industry, whether publicly or privately owned. In too many cases, people have been willing to accept redundancy, leading to the permanent loss of jobs for the community. In areas of high unemployment that is disastrous.

It is better to avoid redundancy. To do that we need more orders, for the merchant yards in particular. Has there been any progress in the negotiations within the European Community on the intervention fund? I refer to the Minister of State's remarks on 27 November 1984 during our last debate on shipbuilding. In column 838 of Hansard the Minister was full of good intentions. I accept that the Government want the scheme to operate more flexibly. At present, the scheme operates on an ad hoc basis, which is unsatisfactory. I hope that the Minister can say that progress has been made with our Common Market colleagues.

The Minister knows Govan Shipbuilders in my constituency because he has visited it. He has acknowledged in the House and elsewhere that it is an excellent yard with a good industrial relations record. The yard has a good productivity level and excellent management/trade union relationships. Co-operation there is positive and the yard's delivery record is excellent.

Even that yard is runninhg out of work. It is working on the three colliers for the CEGB. The contract has proceeded smoothly and the vessels are being completed. By the middle of this year the yard will run out of steel-associated work. In 1986 work will run down completely. Redundancies are inevitable unless additional orders are obtained.

The yard has an active and energetic managing director in Mr. Mackie who has been busy trying to obtain orders for the yard. Among the orders in which he is interested is one for five bulk carriers for a Turkish shipping company. The negotiations have received some publicity, which is not always helpful. The negotiations are well ahead, although I am not sure exactly how far they have progressed. The negotiations are important for Govan's future. The orders would be useful for the engine-building facility in the constituency represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman).

I do not expect the Minister to go into detail this evening because negotiations are still in progress, but I hope that he will be able to say that he and his Department are fully aware of them and that they stand ready to give every possible assistance to Govan so that it obtains the order. Without it, even that yard with its record will have a troubled time in the next year or so. If that is true of Govan, it is also true of the merchant shipbuilding industry elsewhere in this country. Our general complaint is that the Government have not had the necessary commitment to that industry to enable it to survive in a difficult international situation.

On first reading, the Bill looked perfectly innocent and even desirable because it was extending the redundancy scheme for 18 months. Not untypically, it has turned out to have some disagreeable aspects, which is why, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East said, we shall want to explore several matters and obtain assurances and, I hope, amendments to the Bill before it reaches the statute book.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): The Minister of State introduced the Bill as a technical measure, but it raises several issues, some of which have been touched on and some of which have not.

In shipbuilding debates, the Minister consistently seems to show a negative attitude towards shipbuilding and shipping. He gives the impression that he regards shipping and shipbuilding as a Victorian hangover that is in decline, and that inevitably we must accept the decline, whether in shipping or shipbuilding. So far we have heard the view of just one Conservative Back Bencher, the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price), but across and outside the House there is a feeling that the Government should say what they regard as the strategic level of shipbuilding and shipping that we should retain in the United Kingdom. If they do not, they will preside over the demise of this major industry. Many people are afraid that that is what is happening. I say this seriously and not in a combative way. In due course the Minister must show a more positive attitude towards the industry than he has on every occasion on which he has addressed the House on this subject.

Presumably the prime reason why, in the short run, we are extending the provision for redundancies is that we are expecting a great many more redundancies. Therefore, it is understandable that there is concern about the Government saying that there is a final date. Is it when they expect the industry to reach the minimum level of employment that will be retained as the strategic core? If the Government tell us that by the end of 1986 they are sure that the industry will have reached its minimum and will be looking for expansion thereafter, and that is the reason why they are not extending the scheme, we might have a little more confidence than we have now.

After all, the United Kingdom is an island nation and a trading nation. Surely it is a requirement that we have British-owned shipping capacity and indigenous ship-building capability. It would be ironic if we moved into the 21st century without having a significant stake in these two vital lifelines for this country. Regrettably, under this Government our trade has diminished and our export of manufactured goods is now in net deficit, but presumably we expect to go on trading as an island nation. Even the fact that more of our trade is in ferries does not give us a great deal of encouragement, because most of them are built in foreign yards, and although most of the ferry companies are British, increasingly there is an encroachment of foreign owners in this strategic lifeline.

One area which is not only of constituency interest to me but of strategic importance to the United Kingdom as a whole is the development of North sea oil. It is an offshore industry by definition, and the marine and maritime component of the industry is substantial. Britain's maritime technology should play a much bigger part in the development of the North sea than it does. Let me be more specific. At present we have a record number of drilling rigs operating in the North sea. Virtually all of them are foreign-owned and foreign-built. The exploration rigs and production platforms are serviced by a variety of offshore support and supply vessels, nearly all foreign-built, and a high proportion foreign-owned.

I wonder whether any other maritime nation like ourselves, with such an important growth industry which offers development opportunities of new technology out of our traditional capabilities, would tolerate such a high level of foreign operation in its territorial waters. I am sure that the Japanese would not. We know that the Americans do not. The Norwegians certainly do not. It is time that the Government had a policy which required that more of the ships that we need for United Kingdom purposes were built in United Kingdom yards.

The Government propose to privatise warship yards. I do not wish to repeat what has already been said, but in the last financial year those yards made a profit of £33 million, and any profit that they make is made because they secure orders from the British taxpayer. However, once they have been privatised, any profit that they make will go to the private owners and will not benefit the taxpayer. Therefore, at least £33 million will not be available for the benefit of the remainder of British shipbuilding. I am not suggesting that there will be no benefit, but, by definition, it will be a reduced benefit.

[Mr. Malcolm Bruce]

Therefore, it is difficult to see how privatisation will help the merchant yards that are left at the core of British Shipbuilders.

When he replies to the debate, the Under-Secretary should tell us what the Government's thinking is on the future of the merchant yards. I hope that it is positive, because many hon. Members fear that there will be no publicly owned shipyards and that the remaining yards will not be transferred to the private sector because the losses will not enable that to happen and the orders will not come, for the reasons that I have given. Therefore, we shall see the loss of valuable and strategically important yards in the British economy.

There is also concern about the implications of the redundancy scheme. We need to extend the scheme now, because the industry is contracting, but there will be a particular need to do so when a finite date is put on the eligibility for redundancy. It does not matter whether that date is when the scheme is due to end because the Government have said so, or whether it ends because the yard is transferred to the private sector, which may or may not have a comparable scheme.

There is an inevitable consequence that the individual working in the yard will say, "I had better take the money and run while I can." Some hon. Members may have noticed an article in The Guardian on Monday, which was entitled:

"Willing victims baffle unions".

Those are the thousands of shipyard workers in Swan Hunter who have applied for redundancy.

Mr. Garrett: The actual figure is 2,000.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

The report states that the company's industrial relations and personnel director, Mr. Denis Shadbolt,

"concedes that workers may be leaving the company while Swan Hunter remains part of state-owned British Shipbuilders rather than wait for inferior redundancy terms when the yards are privatised later this year."

There will be a problem not only for the individual but for the management, which is faced with the problem of who should be made redundant and which workers management cannot afford to lose. The Government must consider, if the yard is being privatised, whether there is a danger that good workers will be lost before privatisation and will not be available to the private owner thereafter. That may weaken the skill and strength of the work force within the yard.

The yard of Hall Russell is of interest to me and to the neighbouring constituency. It is likely to be among the first to be privatised in the present round. As the Minister is aware, I was part of a delegation which saw him some weeks ago. I subsequently had sight of the offer document. I agree with the point made by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan). It would be helpful for Members to see what was involved in such a sale. The privatisation presents uncertainties. I am confident that Hall Russell has been a good yard. It has been profitable in public and private ownership, and there is no reason why it should not be successful as a private yard. One wonders, however, whether it benefits from being kicked in and out of the public sector as quickly as it has been.

The document states that the company had the advantage of British Shipbuilders' central services, for which it pays a management fee of £252,000. The prospectus confidently states that the cost of buying those services elsewhere is unlikely to exceed that amount. That may be a statement of faith. We must consider the cost of the management team pulling out of the services that it has developed during the past two years and having to find comparable services elsewhere. It is not just the economic cost; it is the cost in time and energy, which might be better directed towards winning orders and organising the yard's production.

Ultimately, the success of that yard and its ability to remain as a shipbuilding yard, which the Minister knows is the prime interest of the people of Aberdeen, who, in overwhelming numbers, have signed a petition asking that the yard be retained as a shipbuilding yard, will depend upon the Government ensuring that Ministry of Defence orders go to the yard, because they will be the core of its business. That will determine whether the yard is retained as a shipbuilding yard. The Minister has given assurances that he wishes to see that yard retained as a shipbuilding yard. I hope that he will speak to his colleagues in the Ministry of Defence and let them know that he has given those assurances and that they should back him in that objective.

The idea that the yard might be taken over sooner or later by an interested party who might, for example, use it for offshore purposes might seem superficially attractive. It might employ a few more people, and it might be more profitable, but it would reduce the diverisity of employment and industry within the community. The north-east of Scotland has prided itself on remaining relatively problem-free, by economic and industrial diversity. We are not a one-industry area. It would be a disadvantage to us if the oil industry were to expand at the expense of the traditional industries, but it has already happened.

That is not to suggest that we are not grateful for and are not responding enthusiastically to the challenge of the oil industry, but it is why people feel that Hall Russell should be retained as a shipyard. It is also important in the national interest that we retain that strategic capability. Shipbuilding is extremely important for the people of the United Kingdom, both now and in the future.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Gentleman started his speech by castigating the Government for not identifying a core level of capacity that we could guarantee. He has now been speaking for 10 minutes. When will he tell us what his core level of capacity is? Is it 200,000 or 300,000 compensated gross registered tonnes? How will he guaranteee it?

Mr. Bruce: One would have thought that the Minister could tell the House what the Government's objective is. The hon. Gentleman has the advantage of a Department which should be working on the problem and coming up with the answers. He should be able to deliver the answers. We are going below the strategic level now, and if the decline over which the Minister has presided continues for the next year or two, it will be below the critical level.

I have identified for the Minister's benefit where we should be achieving greater United Kingdom penetration —specialised offshore vessels and ferry services to and from the United Kingdom. I should like the Minister to tell us what he and his Department are proposing to do to ensure that British shipyards obtain a higher proportion of such orders. He cannot just talk in terms — as he is prone to do—of his ideological preference for the free market, because the Japanese, the South Koreans and the Americans operate a selective market. It is not to our advantage for Britain to operate a free market when the rest of the market is not free.

It is time that the Government told us what their bottom line is. At the moment, they are presiding over the dissolution of shipbuilding. It is a demoralised industry. The Government should return to the House with some positive ideas of how they will retain capacity and what that strategic capacity should be. I have identified matters to which the Government should address themselves. I and other Members would be more confident if the Government showed any inclination to do so.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): When we came to take part in the debate today, the picture was depressing. Those of us who were thinking about the points we wanted to make if we were lucky enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, wished that we did not have to talk about redundancy schemes but rather about orders and saving the industry.

I agree with my hon. Friends who have already spoken, who said that the revelation contained in the Minister's speech that there would be no Government scheme after the end of 1986 confirms what we were sure about already. I hope that it confirms for others in the north-east and in shipbuilding communities, who had any doubts, that the Government are planning systematically to close down the rest of the state shipbuilding industry.

The Government are not just privatising warship yards; they are closing or privatising merchant yards. For anyone left in the industry, in Sunderland Shipbuilders or Austin and Pickersgill in my constituency, the message clearly is, "If any of you had any illusions or hopes that the Government were eventually going to do something to produce orders and save those yards, give up and get out now, because there will be no redundancy scheme left worth talking about by the end of next year."

In the light of what the Minister said, it is relevant to talk, as some of my hon. Friends have done, about the general position of the industry. We had a debate not long before Christmas, when various points were made. We received inadequate answers and explanations from the Government. The position has not improved. As the weeks go by it becomes worse. Austin and Pickersgill still has no orders. The Government still have not decided what to do about the export credit for the Ethiopian order, despite pleas from the Opposition Front Bench and by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Bagier) and myself in the previous debate, and despite all the correspondence. Nothing has been done about that, and nothing has been done about the St. Helena order.

Mr. Parker is off around the world once again saying that he is looking for orders for SD14s. We are always being told that orders are about to materialise for them, but they never do. Redundancies have been announced for 21 January and more redundancies will follow in March. Realistically, unless an order turns up within a limited number of days, there will not just be further redundancies in March, but a closure in March or April. There is nothing left for the yard to do; it is out of work.

The Minister and the Government have for months been castigating hon. Members like myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) for being alarmist and putting around scare stories. It was hypocritical of the Government to point the finger at me and my hon. Friend when they were cynically preparing for the yard to close. They did not need to produce contingency plans relating to the closure of the yard. All they had to do was sit there and not provide any assistance. We know that there is a recession and that the industry faces problems, yet, as has been said time and time again on this side of the House, whenever there is the possibility of an order which British Shipbuilders is trying to obtain in competition with other shipbuilding nations it slips away.

During the last year there has been a list of possible orders for Austin and Pickersgill. Each one has slipped away. The Orlendorf order slipped away for a price gap of £2 million. The Government could have stepped in and done something about it. They could have provided a direct subsidy or an improved financial package. That order for two or three ships, which would have given the yard a breathing space, was allowed to slip away. The Ethiopian order is being allowed to slip away. Every other order is being allowed to slip away. The more that these orders appear, only for other countries to obtain them, the more I am convinced that the problem is not that there are no orders to be gained but that the Government do not have the will to assist British Shipbuilders and individual yards to gain those orders.

Could the Minister comment on the suggestion made to me that the Indonesian Government are planning over the next 10 years to renew their inter-island fleet and that, in the not-too-distant future, the Indonesian Government will begin to negotiate contracts for a total of 280 merchant ships? The Sanko order in Japan, which was referred to earlier by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), was a staggering example of how Governments can intervene to assist their own industries. I wonder whether it is true — I understand that it is — that the Indonesians intend to bring about this massive renewal. We are talking about hundreds of ships. Does the Minister intend to leave it to the Koreans, the Chinese and perhaps the Japanese to pick up those massive orders, or does he believe that the shipbuilding industry of this country should try to obtain part of that work?

Unless the Government say very soon that they are prepared to act quite differently to assist merchant yards to obtain the available orders, nobody should be in any doubt that the intention of the Government is to bring about the systematic rundown of British Shipbuilders. Its former chairman, Sir Robert Atkinson, has consistently accused the Government of this. It is also the view of nearly everybody who is associated with the shipbuilding industry, apart from those who sit on the Government Front Bench.

The Government need to take action to convince us that this is not their intention. Why does the Minister not come clean and be honest about it? Why does he not put an end to the agonising in the shipbuilding communities and announce that this is the Government's intention? Then we shall know what to do about it.

An even more desperately urgent matter which involves the many people who have already been made redundant and those who face redundancy is British Shipbuilders' engineering and technical services which are situated in my constituency. It is a classic example of the hopelessness, the pessimism and the wilful vandalism of Government policy. The general view of large parts of the international marine engineering industry was that it was a crazy decision to put an end to the development and manufacture of Doxford engines. This decision was categorically denied month in and month out by the Government, British Shipbuilders and everybody else until shortly before the manufacture of Doxford engines came to an end. But at least the facility was there for research and development, there was the capacity for spares and other engineering work and there was the hope that eventually it might be the basis for the rebirth of marine engineering on Wearside, where the Doxford engine at one time dominated the marine engineering industry.

The former chairman had faith in the industry and wanted to do something about it. There was investment in the industry but now British Shipbuilders, for the most absurd logic, it seems to me, has decided to close it. That announcement was made some time ago. During recent months anybody who has any interest in the industry has rallied round and tried to persuade the Government to change their mind. All kinds of people believe that there is a potential for this engineering industry. The "United Kingdom Marine Engineering Audit" — not a Labour party body publication but issued by the Institute of Marine Engineers—states:

"Although manufacture of engines ceased at Doxford Engines Limited in 1980, their design of opposed piston engines is a strong contender for the ships being ordered today and in the future; work on this has reached a relatively advanced stage at BS(ETS) Limited, a subsidiary of British Shipbuilders, which could be integrated into the project."

The project referred to is a major marine engineering project, a total propulsion machinery system.

"The engine design would be based on existing expertise and such a project could lead to an upgrading of the marine engineering capability in the UK. . . . The participants for such a project should include: shipowners, shipbuilders, classification societies, the Departments of Trade, Industry and Transport, engine and equipment manufacturers, professional institutes, polytechnics and universities. They would all be expected to contribute to the project financially or in kind. . .

A company, with directors drawn from the industry and universities, should control, plan and monitor the project which, ideally, should be located adjacent to a shipbuilding centre and a university."

There is no place that better fits that job description than the existing BS(ETS) facility in Sunderland. Any intelligent Government with a commitment to the industry would ask that those proposals ought to be developed and that money ought to be put into them. Indeed, the Government would be putting money into those proposals. Instead, the Government have stood aside and allowed the closure to take place. They have allowed the work force to be bludgeoned bit by bit by British Shipbuilders by threats, by cajoling, by bribes into volunteering for redundancy to the extent that now only 30 or so brave manual workers are determined to try to keep that engine works going, despite the determination of the Government and British Shipbuilders to close it. Lloyd's List, which is not a Socialist publication, carried an article on 3 January which referred to BS(ETS) and concluded:

"Even now, as Members of Parliament and local authorities concerned with reviving employment on the river Tyne and Wear are fighting to retain or revive Doxford engine prospects, it seems that the engine and its development team will be moved out of Sunderland. The logic of successive British Shipbuilders' heads continues to be difficult to comprehend. Even as the engine was being prematurely buried, Canada and other countries were desperately seeking elusive BS executives in the hopes of placing further engine orders. A number of those responsible for abandoning the engine have now left BS with sadly tarnished reputations".

I suspect that the Minister of State, the management and the chairman of British Shipbuilders, who are determined to kill the engineering works, will also end up with tarnished reputations.

Nothing can be done in a few days or a few weeks, but companies have said that they would be interested in taking over the works if BS were not willing to keep it open. Companies are talking about developing the engine, perhaps in conjunction with British Shipbuilders, local authorities are prepared to provide money for research and there is a strong will to keep the works open, partly to develop a new engine, but also to develop the last of the Doxford engines for new types of fuel, involving coal as well as oil. That has enormous export potential for power stations in the United States and one would think that a Government with any interest in maintaining an industrial nation would be interested in such a project.

However, because no company has yet made a concrete offer, the Government and British Shipbuilders are not prepared to allow a stay of execution and to keep the works open. The Minister of State seems to think that it is as easy to sell a works when it is closed as when it is open. He ought to remember that not only physical assets are involved. We must also consider the skills of the workers, the traditions of the works and the teamwork. All that needs to be kept going.

Unless the Government take action in the next few days they will be responsible for the death of a great national asset which could have been the basis of a rebirth of a British domestic engine. That would be shameful and, even at this late stage, I urge the Minister to reconsider the closure.

As has been said, when talking about redundancies we have to accept that no one has the right to sell his job. It is not his job to sell; it is the job of his son or daughter and the job of generations to come.

I beg the Minister of State to think about what will happen in my community if the huge merchant yards are closed. There is massive youth unemployment in Sunderland—it is almost as bad as the rate in areas such as west Belfast. In the east end of Sunderland, unemployment is over 55 per cent.

The Minister should ask himself where young people in Sunderland will get skilled or even unskilled work if the shipyards close. The town is being decimated; there is nothing left. We must be approaching the worst crisis faced by a town the size of Sunderland since the war.

Shipbuilding is the key. If thousands of redundancies take place on the river Wear and the jobs are lost, the unemployment rate will be devastating. Some pockets of Sunderland already have unemployment rates approaching 50 per cent. and there is no hope there for young people. Those pockets will spread widely and the town will become a disaster area.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one reason why Nissan went to Sunderland was that there was a reservoir of skilled and untrained labour available there? That was an attraction. There is decline, but new industries are going to the area and are attracted by the available labour market.

Mr. Clay: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for intervening, because I wished to conclude with a reference to Nissan. Whatever our views about Nissan — the disadvantages, the benefits, the effect on the rest of the British car industry and so on — even if we take an enthusiastic view, we must realise that, given that the first stage of the Nissan development will provide only 400 or 500 jobs, we shall need a Nissan every six days to match the redundancies already announced in the north-east.

Even if phase 2 of the Nissan project goes ahead, and we get 2,000 jobs—though without the sort of spin-off that comes from shipbuilding — we shall need three Nissans to make up for the loss of jobs that directly depend on shipbuilding on the Wear.

Virtually everyone who works in the shipyards on the Wear lives within a mile or two of the river. Many workers live very close to the yards. The workers at Nissan will be drawn from a wide catchment area and some will probably come from as far away as the constituency of the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt). The hon. Gentleman made a valuable point, because it showed how desperate we are in the north-east. Even phase 2 of Nissan will be only a marginal compensation for the industrial holocaust that Wearside faces. I urge the Minister to consider the consequences of allowing this madness to go ahead.

5.47 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I underline the point on which my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) ended. It is difficult for us to convey in the House the feeling in our constituencies about unemployment. Somehow, trying to explain the horror and destruction of unemployment numbs our debates.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North did a service to the House, to his constituents and to many others by bringing us back to the desperate situation that many people already face or may have to face unless the Government change their policy towards the shipbuilding industry.

As on previous occasions, I agreed with part of the speech of the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price). I was much attracted by his idea that stability would be given to our industry if the Ministry of Defence could be persuaded to establish a five-year rolling programme of defence orders. I know some of the difficulties involved. For example, the relative price of defence equipment is rising faster than the general level of prices, and that would have to be taken into account, but I sympathise with British Shipbuilders in the difficulties that it has faced over recent years in not knowing what defence orders would be placed in the near future.

I expressed that sympathy with the directors of British Shipbuilders despite the fact that I and other Wirral Membrs are less than happy with the lack of support that British Shipbuilders seems to be giving to Cammell Laird. The scheme proposed by the hon. Member for Eastleigh would be even better if it included a provision for some orders to be earmarked for Cammell Laird. But perhaps I ask too much.

Dr. Godman: In connection with Ministry of Defence orders for the warship yards, is not one of the difficulties the elongated lead time demanded, or argued for, by the Ministry between the building of the first vessel of a new type and the placing of subsequent orders? Would not a reduction in the lead time help the warship yards?

Mr. Field: It certainly would. One of the difficulties with defence ordering at present is that, understandably, the Ministry wants to get as good value for money as possible. That policy can penalise the lead yards in that they incur the initial cost of developing an order, while other yards can bid for subsequent orders at much lower cost. Getting value for money creates real difficulties in terms of stability for the lead yards. That is an important matter, but one that I cannot deal with in this short speech.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) asked the Minister whether he could be given information about the terms of sale for our various yards, and the Minister kindly agreed to send him that information. I would be grateful if I, too, could be given details not only of the Cammell Laird sale but of the sale of other yards too.

Although, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you have rightly allowed us, because of the urgency of the matter in our constituencies, to draw the terms of the debate somewhat widely, there is a specific measure under discussion. I was puzzled by a fault of logic in the Minister's presentation of clause 1. He painted a picture of the difficulties of continuing the scheme under the Government's privatisation measures. Not possessing the skill of writing shorthand, I did not write down the Minister's exact words, but his image was one of a growing problem of redundancy, a big scheme and a large bureaucracy. He suggested that those were not conditions that the Government would wish on the industry that they mean to privatise. It is difficult to square that image with the growth that the Government tell us will result from privatisation.

Mr. Norman Lamont rose——

Mr. Field: I will happily give way in a moment. If the Government are confident that their privatisation measures will be good for the industry and that our share of the world market will increase, there should be less need for a redundancy scheme than there is now and it should be easier to apply a national scheme.

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman seems to have misunderstood me. He seems to be referring to what I said about the scheme in relation to the state sector. I said that with a very small remaining state sector — 11,000 employees in British Shipbuilders — it would be inappropriate to retain a statutory scheme rather than settling one within the industry. My remarks did not apply to the private sector. The scheme has never applied to the private sector, and if it were to do so it would first have to be amended.

Mr. Field: I accept that as the scheme was designed at a time when the industry was wholly in the public sector, it obviously did not apply to the private sector. However, the Minister's logic is still at fault. There will be far less difficulty in fitting the private companies into a national scheme, by putting a levy on them, if they are successful, than there would be if they were not so successful.

I was troubled by another of the Minister's remarks. We all accept the sad need to extend the scheme. In his defence of doing so the Minister said that the Government were not at fault, because the industry was dependent on the world market. To some extent, we would agree with that. However, if, unlike some other industries, shipbuilding is dependent on the level of world trade, is it not more important to protect the workers in that industry with adequate redundancy schemes than workers in industries that are not open to international competition? If the Minister bases his defence of the extension of the scheme on the existence of a situation that is largely outside Government control, surely the Government have a bigger duty than they would otherwise have to make sure that the workers in that industry are adequately protected?

When referring to Cammell Laird, the Minister said that the moderates had voted with their feet and defied the militants. I consulted the men and women who work for Cammell Laird about what I should say in this debate. They wish me to address three questions to the Minister and to report his replies. First, there is a feeling that the Department of Industry "has it in"—in the words of the employees—for Cammell Laird. In the way that people pick up such information, they have heard that the Department of Trade and Industry takes the view that there is at least one yard too many and that one should close. They have also picked up the idea that the Government feel that it would be difficult to sell Cammell Laird in its present state and that it would be better to run it down, so that there is no work force there, before selling it. Are those the views of the Department? The reason why those ideas have currency in our town is that the work force believes that the Department is blocking the decisions on where the type 22s should go. I hope that the Minister can tell me how the Department views the future of Cammell Laird.

Secondly, if that is how the Department of Trade and Industry intends to fight its corner over the future shape of the industry, the employees would like the Minister to consider that that view is at odds with that taken by other Government Departments which have shown confidence in the area. It is not so long ago that the Lord Chancellor fought his corner in Cabinet and succeeded in persuading his Cabinet colleagues to place the Land Registry in Birkenhead. The effect of that welcome move, which was an attempt to stem the rising tide of unemployment in the Birkenhead area, would be more than wiped out if the Department closed Cammell Laird. Does the Minister understand how other Departments have backed the area? Why do people have those feelings about the attitude of the Department of Trade and Industry to their future?

The third question takes up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North about the level of unemployment in the area and what the Government have said about how to beat the apparently ever-rising tide of unemployment. The workers feel that by walking back to work, implementing the flexibility agreement, negotiating with the tug men to achieve the rig out of the dry dock and making sure that the type 42 will be finished before the scheduled date, they are doing all that the Government have asked them to do. They believe that, that being so, if the Government do not give them one of the type 22 orders, it will be the Government who are walking away from the area. The Government will have made the cruel choice that one of the yards that they wish to be closed prior to privatisation is Cammell Laird.

I should be grateful if the Minister could answer those three questions asked by the men and women of Cammell Laird, and allay their anxieties.

5.59 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): The key issue in this debate is where the Bill takes the industry. The inescapable conclusion is that it takes us towards contraction, closure and the ruination of shipbuilding communities. All that the Government have done in their consistent approach to the industry strikes another blow at the nation's industrial base. The blow will work its way through other industrial sectors and into the service sector and will further weaken the industrial, commercial and employment base of the British economy. We are today discussing an issue which is wider than the arrangements for reducing British Shipbuilders.

The Government's approach to Britain's industries is completely wrong. The future of service sector industries such as ancillary engineering industries is entwined with those of our great primary industries. Just because banks, insurance companies, lawyers and suppliers to shipyards can take their profit margins and thus call themselves profitable, that does not mean that they will still be able to take their percentage when there are no primary industries for them to take a percentage from. The Government persistently ignore that strategic fact, which overshadows the debate. I have never heard them answer that issue convincingly. They seem to think that, after the industrial sector has been trimmed, the service sector will remain and survive on foreign revenue. That is an absurd belief.

The Minister said that the industry was contracting. Everyone involved in the industry knows what is happening. The argument is not about what is happening but about what we do about it. Instead of protecting the industry in a world crisis, the Minister is introducing a Bill to facilitate its contraction. He has chosen today's debate to tell us, for the first time, that the Government envisage all the warship yards being privatised by March 1986. I am sure that the Minister will correct me if I misheard him. The current ordering requirements of the Ministry of Defence are less than the total capacity of the warship yards, or those yards which are now designated as warship yards. Swan Hunter has a history of warship construction, yet it has not been regarded as a purely warship building yard. It is now to be privatised, on the assumption that its future is overwhelmingly as a warship yard. In other words, there is no future for merchant shipbuilding at Swan Hunter—that is the logic of the Minister's plans. Equally serious is the Government's intention to leave to the private sector the choice about which warship yard stays open. Some yards will be purchased for use as warship yards and others will not.

The Minister must be candid with us about the future of yards which the private sector does not want. I shall willingly give way if the Minister wants to explain the Government's view. He is reluctant to do so. The key fact is that there is only one major customer—the Ministry of Defence—and at the moment there is not enough work to go round. The Government have complete control over that. They are deliberately holding up work, such as the two outstanding type 22 orders, to encourage redundancies and facilitate privatisation with small labour forces. The Minister said that no further redundancies are contemplated but that the scheme is being extended to December 1986 just in case. Just in case? If the two type 22 orders do not go to Swan Hunter soon, there will be a further round of redundancies of between 800 and 1,000 men. However, if the work goes to Swan Hunter, there will be redundancies at the two other yards which are bidding for the same order.

By saying that the redundancy scheme will end by December 1986, the Minister is encouraging people to leave the industry before privatisation. To that end, the industry is deliberately being starved of work. To that end also we are told that the British Shipbuilders redundancy scheme will not be continued into privatisation. There is no respect in that for people's accrued rights in employment and no sympathy for the special nature of shipbuilding communities. In the four shipbuilding local government wards in my constituency, 49 per cent. of the unemployed men are time-served skilled men. Do we hear from the Government about alternative employment initiatives? We do not. Quite the reverse—assistance to the region is to be reduced. The unemployed and the displaced must be offered a future, or the pressures on the social fabric of the community, as shipbuilding Members of Parliament have warned before, will become unbearable. Young people who looked to Swan Hunter for employment and apprenticeships have no future in alternative employment. They did not have such a future last year and the Bill says that they will have none next year.

The Minister gave us his view of circumstances in merchant shipbuilding but, significantly, he did not say what level of merchant shipbuilding capacity the Government are committed to retaining. It is not enough to ask the parliamentary Liberal party for its view—we want the Minister's view. If the era of combined yards such as Swan Hunter is at an end, the Minister should explain what size merchant shipbuilding industry the Government will retain through British Shipbuilders and whether that is being calculated in money terms, tonnage, or the numbers of people employed. They should also tell us whether the issue is to be left to the Government's mythical concept of a free market. In successive debates on this subject, I and other Labour Members have said that there is no free market in world shipbuilding, least of all in world merchant shipbuilding. The Government have a duty to respond to that fact by rescuing and protecting the industry, not by killing it off.

The redundancy scheme is no longer generous. It was originally designed to run by the side of national redundancy payment entitlements and to encourage older workers to leave the industry, almost by taking a form of early retirement. However, they were to leave an industry which it was planned would survive and have a future. The scheme's cash value has not kept pace with inflation and its original purpose has been lost sight of. It is now being used cynically to restructure the industry—the profitable parts being in the private sector and the labour force being dramatically reduced.

At Swan Hunter, British Shipbuilders managers are hoping to become private owners. At the moment, those managers have a duty to British Shipbuilders, which is their employer, and to their shareholders—to us, the British taxpayers. They cannot sneak away from that duty. They are in a difficult position when they say publicly that they want to be part of a private consortium which hopes to take over Swan Hunter's assets. My fear is that, if there is industrial trouble at Swan Hunter, whether about privatisation or any other issue, it will be provoked by the management before privatisation so that the state bears the cost. That would be deeply wrong.

I issue a clear warning to the management of Swan Hunter: if they challenge individual representatives of the work force, such as a convenor, in a dispute about disciplinary matters and try to provoke industrial confrontation, they will find that they are opposed by every trade unionist on Tyneside. They will not be forgiven for putting the local industry through that extra pain.

I am deeply saddened by what the Government are doing and by the fact that there is no recognition of the special problems of shipbuilding areas. Like others, I have warned that the social fabric of our shipbuilding communities cannot take much more of this. The Government must respond or we shall find that the social fabric has torn under the strain.

6.9 pm

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): It is not often, Mr. Speaker, that I participate in a debate when you are present. Therefore, rather belatedly on the ninth day of 1985, I wish you every health and happiness and a less troublesome year.

The key to this debate is difficult to discern. Since the general election, my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) and I have on at least nine occasions spoken on the Floor of the House about shipping and shipbuilding. As I said just before Christmas, it is difficult to come up with any new ideas.

I refer the Minister to an article in the Daily Telegraph by John Petty, the shipping correspondent, whose advice, knowledge and information are second to none. He says that British and European shipowners have agreed to link up in an attempt to survive against the collapse of markets, bankruptcies and increasing competition. The Minister and his civil servants are now aware of that simple proposition, but we have been aware of it for the last 15 or 20 years and have made such statements time and again.

That article names four companies which are going into bankruptcy or liquidation. A European company called Gazocean, the principal shareholder of which is Gaz de France, is likely to go bust, as is the Kotka Line, which operates a service from Finland to Immingham. Our friends across the Irish channel also have a company which has gone into liquidation.

With the exception of the first, these are not large companies, but they are examples of a continuing decline in shipping, both in the United Kingdom and in Europe. Therefore, I hope that I understand the scale of the problem facing the Government, just as I understood the scale of the problem facing the previous Labour Government. The method of approaching the problem is still open to question and debate, and while privatisation may be a short-term profitable answer, it is not the answer in the long term.

For the 2,000 people in question in my constituency and the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), the Government say that there is no answer. Consequently, the number asking for redundancy has exceeded the number expected to be made redundant. I and my Labour colleagues in the northern group of Labour Members were prepared to mount a massive "Save our Shipyards" campaign in conjunction with the local authorities, but the scale of defeatism is such that that campaign cannot be mounted unless the workers have a will to fight and to recognise that there is a future, not merely for themselves, but for the society in which they live. That is the scale of the tragedy. Morale has gone, and consequently the will to win has diminished to the point of no return.

Many of these men thought that they had a working life ahead of them. All of them possess various skills, such as designers and naval architects. Many others have university degrees. They have devoted much thought and time to the skills which even now make our ships the envy of the world—for example, the dual-purpose Atlantic Conveyor. Those men have lost their enthusiasm. They want to leave the industry and, if possible, to start a new career. They will probably join the drift from the north-east and other areas to the already over-populated south, and, given their skills and knowledge, these people should have a better chance of a job in the south than in the regions.

So far, no Labour Member has mentioned clause 2, which relates to money. The average redundancy payment will be just over £5,000. Is it fair, honest or equitable that such a sum should be offered from state funds when miners are being offered £1,000 per year of service? The offer to the miners is reasonable. Equally, is it fair that farmers going out of milk production should receive more generous payments relative to what will be offered to men of equal, and in many cases superior, skills, who have served their country in an equal capacity?

Mr. Dixon: And dockers.

Mr. Garrett: I agree with my hon. Friend. Somehow, we have got ourselves in a position in which we are not offering fair compensation terms to men in the shipbuilding industry.

The Redundancy Payments Act 1965 was introduced by Mr. Ray Gunter, then Minister of Labour. He understood labour problems, and to the memory of his name I should add that he was a first-class Minister of Labour. I well remember the speeches that he made, and he always emphasised that the Redundancy Payments Act was designed merely to tide people over until they got another job. However, it is no longer easy to get another job or to move from one occupation to another, so the financial terms under that Act and the terms that are now being offered are completely inadequate. When this Bill goes to Committee, I hope that Committee members will consider more reasonable terms.

I do not intend to say whether the £1,000 per year of service to miners is adequate or not, but had Lord Gormley still been president of the NUM he would not have been involved in a strike but would have argued from the start that the £1,000 per year of service for redundancy should be used as the basis for negotiation. Something different might have emerged. Regrettably, that has not happened. We cannot even accept as a basis for negotiation the present terms offered to those who must leave the shipbuilding industry. I hope that when my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow replies he will encourage the Committee, on an all-party basis, to consider more adequate terms of compensation. If I am lucky enough to be a member of the Committee, that will be a main theme in my contributions to it.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): First, I echo the sentiments expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) about the Turkish order for five vessels. If the order materialises for Govan Shipbuilders, as I am sure it will, it will be a marvellous shot in the arm for Clark-Kincaids, the engine builders in my constituency. Kincaids built the engine for the Atlantic Conveyor. The workmanship and delivery times were a delight to the directors of Cunard. Kincaids could, with the assistance of British Shipbuilders, easily take on the task of re-engining the QE2. There is much press speculation about that now, and Cunard should give the order to Kincaids.

As both the Minister and my right hon. Friend the Member for Govan mentioned Scott Lithgow and as it is wholly and exclusively in my constituency, I also have a right to mention it. I sincerely and fervently hope that the contingent liability of British Shipbuilders in respect of 1,500 employees of Scott Lithgow being made redundant within a year of the sale will not have to be honoured.

Business is going well at the yard and the Government could help further by placing Ministry of Defence orders with Scott Lithgow. I think principally of follow-up orders for the SKK 2400 conventional patrol submarine. I hasten to add for the benefit of my colleagues that that vessel will not carry nuclear missiles. I am confident that offshore orders will be placed with Scott Lithgow. The directors of Trafalgar House have assured me about local employment, especially selection and training issues, and I believe that they are men of their word. Under its new owners, Scott Lithgow deserves the warm support of all, not merely of those in Scotland.

The provisions in clause 1 should and must be extended beyond December 1986. The Minister's comments will dismay many employees of British Shipbuilders. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said, much more needs to be done for those communities which have suffered from the decline of this once-great industry. Although I warmly welcome the continuing developments in the information technology industry, especially the expansion of IBM and National Semiconductor, we must remember that male unemployment is at a dismally high level—about 23 per cent. Investment is necessary both for the infrastructure of a savaged, wounded region and for the industries there.

The debate takes place at a most gloomy time for the shipbuilding and shipping industries. Almost everywhere we see, if not a continuing and remorseless decline, the dismantling of a great industry.

Mr. Roy Farndon, editor of Lloyd's List, put two questions to a meeting of the Greenwich Forum in 1983. He asked:

> "Can London sell its shipping and ship management and shipping finance skills as the size of the British-owned fleet—let alone the British-registered fleet—continues to decline? . . . And with the stupefying contraction of British and European merchant shipbuilding and repair, it can be asked whether London's skills in shipbuilding finance, classification and design, can prosper independent of the economic host."

The Government are failing in their duty if they stand aside while the contraction continues. Mr. Farndon's questions emphasise the importance of shipbuilding and shipping to the maritime service industries. Sometimes we overlook the importance of shipbuilding and shipping to the marine equipment industries and to many finance houses and merchant banks in the City.

As some hon. Members know, shipbuilding, shipping and ancillary services are of crucial importance to my constituency. Clark-Kincaids is the only merchant engine builder on the Clyde today. It has an important interdependent relationship with the Govan shipyard and other British Shipbuilders yards. It is essential that that marine engine building capacity is maintained, not only for the people directly involved on the lower Clyde but for the entire British shipbuilding industry.

The yard of Ferguson-Ailsa is also in my constituency. It has a fine management-worker relationship and it builds first-class vessels, especially smaller vessels. The yard is fighting hard to gain a foothold in export markets for offshore support vessels. In line with what my right hon. Friend the Member for Govan said about the Turkish order for Govan, I hope that the Minister and his Department are giving every assistance to Ferguson-Ailsa of Port Glasgow and Troon in the important area of offshore supply vessels.

Scott Lithgow is not now owned by British Shipbuilders, but it is rapidly improving its market image in offshore construction and, I hope, soon will again become the best yard for the building of conventional patrol submarines. I should like to see Scott Lithgow and Vickers sharing the building of the SKK 2400 conventional submarine. As the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) said, there is potentially a marvellous export market for that vessel.

British Shipbuilders can compete with other western European yards. However, European yards cannot hope to compete with yards in Japan or South Korea. There are no easy answers on the international scene. Both those countries now have huge shipbuilding industries. An idea of the size of the Japanese industry can be gained when one discovers that the Sanko order of 111 bulk carriers represents just four months' work for the Japanese industry. Japan is becoming worried about the growth of the South Korean industry.

There is an unbridgeable gap between the prices offered by South Korean yards and those offered by western European yards. James Davis, a director of Kleinwort, Benson Ltd., spoke at a meeting of the Greenwich Forum about a visit that he and other western European industrialists made to South Korea, and about the attitudes of shipbuilding directors there. He said:

"The best way of describing their attitude is perhaps by describing the extreme answer we got from one of them, Mr. Hong of Daewoo. He said that of course we all came from half-time Europe. That was an opening remark and we asked him what he meant by it. He told us that his men expect to work six-and-a-half days a week, unless there was a big job on, in which case they could not take all that time off . . . They work intensively. He said, 'the trouble is now it is a time of comparative advantage. It is Korea's turn. You had your turn in Europe. Japan has had its turn. Now it is our turn."

The international circumstances are extremely difficult, but they will be worsened by the growth of the Republic of China as a shipbuilding nation and by the continuing growth of Brazilian shipbuilding.

In an age of protectionism, Government intervention and subsidy, it is rubbish to talk about free markets and the freedom of international trade. The Government must defend our maritime industries with the same zeal that they display for the privatisation of public corporations and services. Much more is required than the payment of redundancy cheques to those who are forced out of what the Minister called this contracting industry.

The continuing decline of the merchant shipbuilding industry must be halted. A depressed home market has a dreadful effect not only on the communities within which the shipyards are situated but on industries and communities far removed from our maritime communities.

Mr. T. W. Bewsey, director of the British Marine Equipment Council, said recently:

"At the present moment the situation on the home market is bad and shows no sign of improving in either the short or the long-term. This is because the depressed state of the world shipping market will continue for several years and as a result the level of orders for new tonnage will continue to be very low . . . If the UK is to retain a merchant shipbuilding industry in the overall national interest, with particular regard to defence considerations, then the Government must continue to consider seriously what means are necessary for survival; otherwise the industries concerned will disappear, never to be replaced."

Given the gloomy economic circumstances of shipbuilding, shipping and maritime services, the time has arrived for a Royal Commission on the British maritime industries. Such a commission could assess the present and future circumstances of our maritime industries perhaps more adequately than could a Select Committee. The idea of a Royal Commission was mooted last year by the editor of Lloyd's List, and I heartily commend the proposition to the House. I say that despite a reprimand that I received from the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price), who reminded me in a conversation outside the Chamber that a former Labour Prime Minister said that setting up a Royal Commission to examine an issue puts back the policy decisions on that issue by four years. I accept the hon. Gentleman's strictures, but although it is essential for the House and its Select Committees to examine the needs of our maritime industries, I believe that we also need a Royal Commission.

The Government must also encourage the development of a buoyant home market. That is especially true of the offshore oil and gas industries. Traditional maritime industries have an important role to play in oil and gas, not only on the United Kingdom continental shelf but elsewhere. There are no easy answers, but no Government should ignore the continuing contraction in shipping and shipbuilding.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): The Bill has a short title and when I first saw it—my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) had the same impression — it seemed to be innocuous and modest. However, as the Minister of State moved the Second Reading today, it became clear that the Bill has many implications. It was almost as though the Minister had opened a can of worms. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said that it could be inferred that the Government wished to stop redundancy payments as that would shift the burden of labour before privatisation and thus make the shipyards more attractive financially to their friends. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will explain that to the House when he replies to the debate.

It was staggering to hear the Minister talk about a contracting industry and then to explain, rightly, that he could not give the House an overall costing of the scheme because it depended upon the number of people who were made redundant. I understand the logic of that, but the Government must have some idea of the long-term size of the British shipbuilding capability, both merchant and naval. Can the Minister give us some idea of the manpower requirements that the Government envisage in the immediate and medium-term futures? The Minister must have those figures; or he certainly should have them.

When we talk about redundancies, we are talking about human beings. As so often in shipbuilding debates, we talk about orders and yards and tend to forget that in those yards there are individuals. I endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) said about massive payouts not applying to shipbuilding. My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said that an average payment of £5,000 was not much compensation for losing one's job.

The problems that we have heard about today from Labour Members — most of those who have spoken in the debate are Labour Members — are similar. The problems of Tyneside are echoed on Wearside, on the Clyde and on Merseyside. There is shameful unemployment in those areas, which are economic blackspots. Redundancies of 2,000 or more have a tremendous effect on communities. When a shiprepair yard in my constituency was privatised, there were massive lay-offs. I now share a travel-to-work area with my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon), and it gives me no pleasure to say that we experience the highest level of unemployment in England. When we hear of the further redundancies in shipbuilding on the Tyne — because many people from south Tyneside go across the river to Swan Hunter or they work in the Jarrow and Hebburn areas — we wonder how much longer our communities can survive.

I want to press the point made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East. Is it not about time that the Government realised that it is not just individuals who are affected, vitally important though they may be? Communities are also affected. Does the Minister appreciate the loss in rateable value to communities such as south Tyneside, north Tyneside, Glasgow and Sunderland resulting from shipbuilding closures? It runs into millions of pounds, and it makes the problems of the local authorities in those shipbuilding redundancy areas even more acute.

I know that there is the EEC scheme, but, just as the Government's shipbuilding redundancy scheme is far less generous than those operating in the mining and steel industries, so the EEC scheme is literally peanuts compared with what is offered to the coal and steel closure areas. When the Government are discussing shipbuilding redundancies, I urge them strongly to pay particular attention to the communities affected.

I realise that the men who work in the shipbuilding industry and who perhaps are contemplating accepting redundancy have made Herculean efforts to increase productivity. We have the Ark Royal being built on the Tyne, and it is months ahead of schedule. We had the Atlantic Conveyor launched recently only a few days after the rescheduled delivery date, and the managing director and the chairman of Cunard paid tribute to the quality of the work.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend touched on a pertinent point when he reminded us that we are discussing a shipbuilding Bill concerned with redundancy at the very time when morale in the shipyards is at its lowest ebb ever. One has only to listen to people talking in the pubs and clubs of Tyneside to understand the extent of the desperation and despondency among them. That is one reason why people are queuing up to take redundancy. It is out of sheer desperation, and it is a tragedy for the country, because those skilled men are vitally needed in our nation. If we lose their skills we shall live to regret it.

We saw only two years ago during the Falklands crisis how men worked night and day to meet the Government's deadlines and managed to help the victory that we sought. But it was a very close run thing, and I doubt whether we could mount the same operation today. Even then we got through only by chartering Scandinavian vessels. At one time the Government were trying to buy a Danish vessel because there were not enough British vessels. That is how desperate the situation is, and that is why as a nation we cannot afford to allow these redundancies to go ahead and the shipbuilding industry to run down.

Does the Minister not appreciate that his proposals for privatisation are the raison d'etre for the demoralisation among members of management teams as well as the work force? The proof of the pudding is in the eating, because we see it in the private yards already. Those who work in the industry see privatisation as casualisation. When they hear talk about the market place, they see it as appearing on a Monday morning and two men being selected out of 50. They see those bad days coming back again, and it is impossible to build a life and a community based on that amount of uncertainty. That is one reason why there is so much demoralisation.

How can we get across to the Minister this point about the market? It is not the market place where labour is hired and fired. How can we get it across to him that there is no such thing as a free market in shipbuilding? Shipbuilding is concerned with strategy and with strategic decisions taken by the Government about the size of the industry. That is why I laid so much stress at the beginning of my remarks on trying to press the Government to say what they saw as the size of our shipbuilding industry. There is no such thing as a free market, and it is about time that the Government recognised that, as an island nation and a maritime power, we need not only British-owned ships to carry goods, but the facilities to build those ships.

I make one final plea. The Government are always exhorting the entrepreneurial nature of British industry. Some of the private yards in the ship repair industry have worked very hard to get jobs. A lot of the work comes from the Soviet Union, especially in the north-east of England where there is easy access from the Baltic and the north Arctic. I understand that currently the Government are negotiating with the Soviet Union with a view to excluding Soviet vessels from the river Tyne. I have had a partial assurance from them that this will not be pursued, but I hope that the Minister will bear it in mind, look into it, and realise how important it is for our shipbuilding industry that we retain that trade with the Soviet Union.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): We have had a number of shipbuilding debates since 1979, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) reminded us. Unfortunately, they have been about either the curtailment of borrowing powers or the extension of redundancy scheme payments. It is bad when my hon. Friends have to welcome the extension of a redundancy payments scheme. However, those being thrown on the scrap heap have a right to be cushioned financially, albeit not as well cushioned as some others being thrown out of work by the Government.

When we discuss clause 1, we are talking about bribing people into idleness. In the Tyne and Wear area the 2,100 workers being made redundant by Swan Hunter will never work again. It is criminal that the skills of these shipyard workers, learnt over many years, should be thrown away, bearing in mind especially that we are a maritime country. In 1982-83, the number employed by British Shipbuilders fell by 22 per cent. to a low of 48,550.

Unfortunately, I had to leave the debate for a time because the Employment Select Committee was meeting to discuss the closure of 29 skillcentres in areas such as my own, where 2,100 shipyard workers are to be thrown on to the streets. That is why I missed the speeches of the hon. Members for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price), and that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), as well as the end of the remarks of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith).

At the beginning of his remarks my right hon. and learned Friend put his finger on this so-called innocuous Bill about the extension of redundancy payments, because he drew attention to one or two extremely important aspects of it. Those who are to be privatised will lose their redundancy payments under British Shipbuilders' redundancy scheme. The Minister tried to say that this was no different from the position of those who had been privatised before. However, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Govan reminded us, on 1 February last year I asked:

"If Scott Lithgow is taken over by a private company will the Minister ensure that all the workers receive their full entitlement from the British Shipbuilders redundancy scheme?"

The Minister replied:

"I think that that assurance can be given. They will be eligible for the redundancy scheme."—[Official Report, 1 February 1984; Vol. 53, c. 352.]

The Minister also said that no one previously received anything from the British Shipbuilders redundancy scheme after it had been privatised. In the same debate I made the point that Tyne Shiprepairers, which had been taken over by its directors, had received £4·2 million in a buy-out from the redundancy scheme. How does the Minister square that with his statement to the House tonight? He obviously misled the House tonight when he said that in future companies would not be dealt with any differently from those in the past. That is not true.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As I recall, some people who were made redundant at the time of Scott Lithgow may have qualified for payment under the scheme when the company was part of British Shipbuilders, but when a company enters the private sector the redundancy payments scheme does not apply to it. As the hon. Gentleman said, it is true that in some situations where companies such as Tyne Shiprepairers have been privatised compensation has been paid, but that compensation has been paid not as of right, because there was no statutory right, but as a result of negotiations.

When the warship yards are returned to the private sector, they are in the same position as other companies in the private sector. There may be an opportunity to negotiate compensation; there may be an opportunity for them to join schemes in those companies; there may be an opportunity for new schemes to be negotiated; but there is no statutory right, and there never has been, with this scheme. If it were to apply to the private sector there would have had to be a specific provision in the legislation. [Interruption.] It may or may not be the case that I should have included such a provision, but Labour Members cannot claim to be surprised, because it manifestly is not there, and the position on the scheme is as it has always been.

Mr. Dixon: The Minister says that the companies have no right. The Act implicitly says that when people leave the employment of British Shipbuilders they are entitled to the benefits of a redundancy scheme over and above the national scheme. If a firm is privatised, those people will no longer work for British Shipbuilders, and under that Act they are entitled to their redundancy scheme. That was the reason why Tyne Shiprepairers was bought out. That was the reason why that was negotiated. That was the reason why, when members of Tyne Shiprepairers accepted £2,100 as part of the buy-out from the shipbuilding redundancy scheme, they also had a guarantee of 12 months' employment with the new company. At the time the payment under the British Shipbuilders redundancy scheme worked out at about £10·7 million, compared with £4·2 million under the buy-out.

At that time I asked the Minister what was happening to the other £6·5 million. Had the shipyard not been privatised, the Government would have had to finance British Shipbuilders to pay that money. There are rumours at the moment about pits being privatised. I wonder whether the miners working in those pits will receive redundancy payments under the mineworkers' redundancy scheme which is on the table at the present time. However, as the Minister says, that aspect can be debated in Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) talked about the effects of unemployment in parts of Sunderland. He referred to the fact that East End ward has an unemployment rate of 65 per cent. That is possibly true of many areas in Tyne and Wear, and probably in Scotland and Birkenhead. My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) told the Minister about the level of unemployment in his area. He also asked some specific questions which were reiterated by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown).

My hon. Friend asked what had happened about the orders for the type 22 destroyers which had been promised. They were promised before the summer recess. They were promised again in September, November and December. When my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) and I went to the Ministry of Defence in December, we were told that they would possibly come at the end of January. One is suspicious when such orders are held back at a time when shipbuilders are to be privatised. One wonders whether such orders are deliberately held back because the privatisation scheme is on the board.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East also mentioned the possibility of victimisation. I can give the Minister some idea of what happens in the shipbuilding industry in that regard. I was sacked from my job as a shop steward in the shipbuilding industry, and I could not get a job in that industry for a considerable time. Tory Members and Ministers talk about secondary picketing. We have heard a lot about that during the miners' strike. However, the employers do not need to put anyone outside a gate to stop a worker going to work. They pick the phone up and tell the personnel officer not to employ a particular person under any circumstances. That is what happened to me.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) mentioned the problems and anxieties of Scott Lithgow and Clark-Kincaid. My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields mentioned redundancy pay, the level of manpower and how long we will have redundancies in the shipbuilding industries. He also mentioned another important point. Both he and I have had letters from constituents about the rumour that Russian vessels will be prohibited from using the river Tyne. Our ship repairers have always had several Russian vessels to work on. I hope that the Minister will throw some light on that rumour. We shall certainly take the matter up with the Ministry of Defence, which is possibly where the answer lies.

We have heard during the debate about redundancies and problems in the shipbuiiding industry. If they are international problems, the Government can help out. One can find little good to say about Mr. Graham Day, the chairman of British Shipbuilders, other than that he carries out to the letter his instructions from the Government. In Shipbuildng News in December he said:

> "A number of countries operate domestic preference schemes which secure the dual objectives of sustaining a national fleet and enabling a hard pressed shipbuilding industry to restructure on the back of a workload, albeit reduced."

He suggests there that some countries give preference to their shipbuilding industry which Britain does not. That is certainly worth quoting, coming as it does from Mr. Graham Day. It is a pity that he did not take a few more lessons from his predecessor, Sir Robert Atkinson, who used to fight the corner of British Shipbuilders. Unfortunately, Mr. Graham Day is doing what he was instructed to do—to cut the shipbuilding industry down to virtually nothing.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend said, since 1979 shipbuilding workers have been demoralised because they have had nothing but redundancies. There was the first corporate plan from Sir Robert Atkinson, who talked about a 400,000 tonne throughput. Incidentally, that is the nearest that British Shipbuilders ever came to breaking even. The year that it had a 400,000 tonne throughput was the year that it came within £19 million of breaking even. That is the best year that British Shipbuilders has had. Now Mr. Graham Day talks about a throughput of less than 200,000 tonnes. That is the reason for the present reduction in manpower in the shipbuilding industry.

Most of my hon. Friends who have spoken tonight belong to the Tyne and Wear area. Like me, my hon. Friends the Members for Wallsend, for South Shields and for Newcastle upon Tyne, East are concerned about that area. At the height of the shipbuilding boom 100,000 men were employed in the Tyne and Wear area, but today fewer than 12,000 work there, and that is without the present redundancies. There have been redundancies at Swan Hunter and BS(ETS). Indeed, this morning I was told that Palmers Hebburn of British Shipbuilders is to be put in moth balls. This morning the management told the shop stewards that the yard was going on to care and maintenance. A couple of years ago that yard was employing 2,000 men. That is the scale of the unemployment in that area. Hon. Members should bear in mind that for every man who works as an assembler in the yard, another three men work in supplying the industry.

Our area is being hit in particular because in the northern region male employment has been 25 per cent. dependent on industries such as heavy engineering, coal mining and shipbuilding. That compares with a figure of 8 per cent. for the rest of the country. Thus, with the decline in heavy engineering, the area has been badly hit. In the Jarrow and Hebburn area, male unemployment amounts to 31·3 per cent., without taking into account the present redundancies at Swan Hunter. In south Tyneside as a whole 15,529 people are unemployed, and of them 11,120 are men. That means that 29·5 per cent. of the male population of south Tyneside are out of work. Yet those people have contributed to the local budget.

There has been a reduction in rate income, because if a shipyard closes less money goes to the local authority. Indeed, that point was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields. The young and active who take the advice of the former Secretary of State for Employment, now Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and get on their bikes do not take the old people's homes, community centres or local authority facilities with them. Therefore, those facilities have to be provided by the remaining elderly population. That has a tremendous impact on areas such as ours.

The task force has been given various degrees of welcome, but I am told that it is only for partnership authorities. South Tyneside, which I represent, is a programmed authority. We have as many problems as—if not more than—some of the partnership authorities. Therefore, I hope that the Minister will at least consider an extension of the areas so that the task force can take over and include some of the programmed authorities. I also hope that he will get on to the Ministry of Defence and get those type 22 destroyer orders placed as soon as possible.

I have seen a press statement about £100 million of special aid for areas affected by the decline in the steel, shipbuilding and textile industries. Indeed, £10 million was for the shipbuilding industry. I hope that the Minister will make representations to get the amount increased. The amount of money for the Tyne and Wear area was £3·2 million, which is nothing compared to the devastation being wrought on it through the redundancies that we face.

I shall deal now with clause 1 and the redundancy extension. The Minister gave the game away when he said that 35,000 workers had benefited from shipbuilding redundancy payments. The Government seem to feel that a worker benefits from getting the sack and being thrown on the streets, perhaps for the rest of his life. That shows what they think about unemployment. To suggest that 35,000 people have benefited from being made redundant gives us some idea of the Government's thinking on unemployment.

The calculations for redundancy payments have not been mentioned. Both you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I sat on the same Committee and you will remember the free riders' charter and clause 1 of the Employment Bill 1982. The Government gave retrospective payments to all those who decided that they would not be members of trade unions in closed shops. The Government gave £2 million retrospectively in order to compensate them. That free riders' charter calculation has now been increased from £145 to £154 per week.

I have little to add to what my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East said on clause 2. The Geddes report set up the Shipbuilding Industry Board and, of course, Upper Clyde Shipbuilders received a loan. I have spoken before about the Geddes, Paton and Booz-Allen reports. They were all produced when the shipbuilding industry was in private hands. To judge from what is said by Tory Members and Ministers, one would think that the shipbuilding industry had problems only when it was nationalised. When it was in private hands, the Geddes report led to the setting up of the Shipbuilding Industry Board, and that is why Upper Clyde Shipbuilders had to have that loan. When the shipbuilding industry was in private hands it was in a terrible mess, and that is one reason why the Labour Government nationalised it in 1977.

We shall not vote against the Bill tonight. With some reservations, we welcome the fact that the shipbuilding scheme is to be extended. I hope that some of the problems and anxieties expressed by my right hon. and hon. Friends will be thrashed out in Committee. Indeed, I hope that the Minister will take them into consideration and that when we go through the nuts and bolts of the Bill some amendments will be made. But we are rewriting history when it comes to clause 2. The Government once lent money to Upper Clyde Shipbuilders because private industry had made a mess of it, yet now the Minister will hand the same shipbuilding industry over to the same people who made such a mess of it before.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): Many questions have been asked during this serious and reasoned debate, and it may be convenient if I try to answer as many as I can, particularly those from Opposition Members, who have quite legitimately pursued the interests of the industry and of their constituencies. In addition, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) would like some clarification on the position of the type 22 frigates.

The hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) has a constituency with a very noble history in affairs of industrial relations and in the way that it has reacted to the scourge of unemployment. He should be aware, as he no doubt is, that total aid for the northern region since 1972 stands at more than £1 billion. The aid package, in terms of regional assistance, that is going to those areas where shipbuilding is one of the predominant industries has amounted since 1979 to about £640 million.

I hope that we can deal once and for all with the accusation that the Government are not mindful of the interests of those parts of the country that have been affected by structural unemployment, particularly in the heavy engineering sector and in the shipbuilding industry.

Mr. Nicholas Brown rose——

Mr. Butcher: I shall deal with the hon. Member's points in detail but I wish first to finish this observation. The interesting suggestion about the application of the task force to the area represented by the hon. Member for Jarrow will be noted carefully. He will appreciate that this idea has been discussed in the press but has yet to have formulation in the full interdepartmental discussions which necessarily have to take place within Whitehall. I shall bring his observations to the attention of the appropriate Ministers in Departments other than the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Will the Minister tell the House where he obtained the figures?

Mr. Butcher: If the hon. Gentleman kept a close eye on Hansard he would have seen a question about how much regional aid had gone to the northern region since 1972. If he checks Hansard, I think that he will find the detailed data in a copy published three or four days before the Christmas recess. I shall send him the appropriate column.

Mr. Brown: What I am asking is where the figures that were quoted in Hansard came from originally — the source of the figures.

Mr. Butcher: The source was the records available to the DTI. It keeps records of section 7 assistance, regional selective assistance. We monitor the amount spent. If the hon. Gentleman wants to find the source of those figures within the Department of Trade and Industry I can only say that this Administration, like Labour Administrations, places explicit and implicit trust in its officials to keep the records accurately. We report faithfully the information to the House when it is requested in a parliamentary question. I cannot see the hon. Gentleman's point.

The hon. Gentleman made three major points which were interesting in that there was a practical philosophical element in each of them. He raised yet again an issue which I thought we had dealt with comprehensively in two previous debates on industrial policy, and not least in the last debate on shipbuilding — the importance of the manufacturing sector and manufacturing industry as opposed to service sector activity. I think it is worth repeating what I said, because I did not hear any disagreement on the last occasion. If we examine manufacturing activity we find that 80 per cent. of output is internationally tradeable. By contrast, some 18 per cent. of service sector activity is internationally tradeable. Although we have to recognise the magnificent contribution that the service sector has made to job creation, with some 280,000 extra jobs being created in the service sector in the last 18 months of the recession, we must recognise also that the wealth creation engine, the core and heart of wealth creation, will always remain within manufacturing. We have to make things which are exportable in international trading circumstances.

Mr. Brown: I agree with all that. Surely the logic of that argument supports my point and not the Minister's.

Mr. Butcher: In that case, I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman's point is. I hope to demonstrate in my response to the detailed debate that we have not been tardy or unhelpful in the assistance given to the manufacturing sector. Certainly we have not been unhelpful to the shipbuilding industry. The House will be all too familiar with the £1 billion support for shipbuilding by this Administration in the previous Parliament and in this one. I resent bitterly the accusation that we have been prejudiced against the manufacturing sector. The hard cash figures as reported to the House disprove that theory.

The hon. Gentleman posed legitimately a question which should exercise the House—is the shipbuilding industry operating in a free international market? On this occasion, as on previous occasions, we have conceded that over the years a market that is decidedly not free has developed in shipbuilding and that there has been an unhelpful and, some would argue, totally unnecessary subsidy race by various shipbuilding nations to get business. Some industries and some nations are more efficient than others; therefore, they may need less recourse to subsidies. But in the main the European Community, through the intervention fund and other proposals, has had to connive in the unfortunate corrosion of the free market in shipbuilding.

As a free market does not exist, we have tried to give our domestic industry the chance to compete in that distorted market. Therefore, the answer to the question whether the world shipbuilding industry is operating in a free market is no. The Government, recognising the reality of the situation, have to give sufficient support to domestic industry to put it back in the race.

The hon. Gentleman obviously queries the source of our information. We can do no more than quote the data compiled accurately by those who work for the Government. He seemed to imply that we were prejudiced or were not helping sufficiently to overcome the special problems of shipbuilding communities. I repeat that £1 billion has gone to one key region and £640 million to other areas in which shipbuilding is a major element in job preservation. I hope that that shows that our spending patterns do not indicate a lack of concern.

In regard to the observations delivered, as ever, in a serious and measured manner by the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett), I should have liked to offer him in this Second Reading debate the sort of assurances that he was seeking on the level of redundancy payments, but I hope that he will agree that these payments, which are not being changed either in character or in manner of compilation, are at least considerably more generous than the basic requirements in other industries. What fascinated me was that I had heard similar remarks eight or nine months ago in Durham in a working men's club in which I had the privilege to spend some time.

There was great concern in that Club and Institute Union club about the very generous payments available to members of the National Union of Mineworkers, should they wish to become redundant. It was claimed that we were creating a two-tier work force. Those payments were genuinely resented by members of the Transport and General Workers Union. They felt that miners were being treated hyper-generously. Shipbuilding employees do not get anything like those payments. Men driving lorries delivering coal to the power stations could not expect anything other than basic redundancy payments. There is strong feeling among workers about this. The Government are being generous enough to shipbuilding workers in regard to redundancy.

Mr. Garrett: The Minister tempts me very much to debate elitism. I shall reserve my remarks for the Committee stage, when I can prove that the elitism at the bottom end of the scale is not as important as the elitism at the top end, where civil servants and other people get excellent redundancy payments.

Mr. Butler: Within whatever elite the hon. Member wishes to call the vanguard of the proletariat—I suppose these days Arthur Scargill sees that as the National Union of Mineworkers — even within the various classes of working people or within what sociologists would call socio-economic groups, an elite has emerged — those who work in the mining industry. It causes resentment among other workers in industries which are more hard-pressed than mining on redundancies. We should hold on to the payments which we propose for shipbuilding employees.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) asked a number of interesting questions. The Department does not lack sympathy for Cammell Laird or for Merseyside. The area continues to receive the maximum regional assistance backed by the Department's best efforts. Birkenhead has received £174 million in regional aid since 1979. Ministers do not prefer any one shipyard to another.

Mr. Field: I was not asking for details of the aid going to Birkenhead. If I wanted that information, I would table a question. I was putting to the Minister the feeling in the yard about orders which are to be placed shortly. It appears that the Department is arguing against the interests of Cammell Laird. I wanted a yes or no answer.

Mr. Butcher: No. We want the contracts to be awarded on a fair and objective basis. We want them to go to those yards which are best equipped and which can deliver on time, within the budget. The House should be familiar with those requirements. We have no preference for any shipyard. The future of Cammell Laird, like that of any other yard, depends upon the ability of the work force to deliver the goods on time.

Mr. Field: I understand that to be part of the Government's policy, but the Government have also stressed that one of their aims is to change industrial attitudes. Some people, the Minister included, have said that attitudes have changed at Cammell Laird. Is the Minister now saying that that is of no concern to the Government when they place orders?

Mr. Butcher: Attitudes are changing in all major shipyards. There has been a great improvement. Of course those factors are taken into consideration when we consider placing orders. Is the hon. Member for Birkenhead saying that the change of attitudes in his constituency is greater than anywhere else and that therefore the order should be placed there? Some of his hon. Friends may also assert that admirable proposition. The orders will be placed objectively, on merit, in the yards which the Ministry of Defence believes can best satisfy its contracts.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead and the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) asked about distributing sale documents to hon. Members. They asked to see copies of the warship yard documents. Those documents cannot be widely distributed, because they are not full prospectuses. It would be illegal to distribute them to members of the public. However, there is no reason why they should not be seen by hon. Members with constituency interests in warship yard privatisation. We shall write to hon. Members accordingly. One could say that that is tonight's exercise in open government.

The hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) asked a raft of questions. Before I answer them, I shall deal with Swan Hunter and Vosper Thornycroft. British Shipbuilders' decision on redundancies is the unfortunate reflection of the declining workloads in those yards and the continuing failure to obtain export orders. It is in no way connected with privatisation. British Shipbuilders would have had to declare the redundancies even if the warship yards had not been privatised. The decision makes no assumption about where the orders for the next type 22 frigates will be placed.

The redundancies at both yards will follow a progressive rundown pattern. At Swan Hunter, employment levels will fall by 2,100, to 5,250, by the end of February 1985. At Vosper Thornycroft, employment will be down by 790 to 3,600 by the end of April 1985. British Shipbuilders will, of course, try to achieve as many as possible of the redundancies by voluntary means, including transfers and retraining for other jobs. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) asked about that.

Mr. Brown rose——

Mr. Butcher: I must press on, so I ask that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East be the last Opposition Member to intervene.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Can the Minister explain why the Government have delayed placing the orders for the type 22?

Mr. Butcher: If the hon. Gentleman will contain himself for a further three or four minutes, I shall deal with that in my own main remarks instead of in this question and answer session.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) raised the spectre of a plot to ease people out of the industry in order to fatten the balance sheets of the industry for denationalisation. It is legitimate for Opposition Members to probe and ask questions of the Government. That is their time-honoured role. However, the right hon. and learned Gentleman indulged in scaremongering. By putting a warped interpretation on the details of this innocuous Bill he hoped to raise a spectre. There is no reason at present to believe that British Shipbuilders will need to declare deck-clearing redundancies in the warship yards. Redundancies, including those recently announced at Swan Hunter and Vosper Thornycroft, are caused by the absence of orders.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman also raised fears about the position of those in the warship yards as privatisation approaches. He said that employees would have an option to take redundancy before privatisation and that they would rush to do that. That is nonsense. Employees can take redundancy only when volunteers are called for. Employees cannot take advantage of redundancy if it is not offered.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked whether British Shipbuilders' employees would be worse off after 1986. There is no reason to suppose that they will. Employees will negotiate terms with the management and I presume that they will aim to equal or better the present terms. We cannot say tonight what the outcome of negotiations will be. As elsewhere in industry, the outcome will be the result of negotiation. We shall be asking British Shipbuilders and Harland and Wolff to set the negotiations in hand in good time.

Mr. John Smith: Does the Minister accept that employees in British Shipbuilders must be worse off after 1986 because they will not have the guarantee of the scheme which will be stopped in 1986? The Minister has accused me of raising false fears about the future of the shipbuilding industry. Can he guarantee that no redundancies will be declared prior to privatisation in any of the yards which are to be privatised? In the absence of any solid guarantee from the Minister, I shall persist in making the allegation which I was entitled to make.

Mr. Butcher: Does not the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that, if he were at the Dispatch Box, he could not give that guarantee? He has been in the House and in high office long enough to know that it is impossible to give such a guarantee. No Labour Minister could have done it, and no Conservative Minister can do it. We cannot look into a crystal ball and know now what the order position will be. However, we can say that we shall encourage British Shipbuilders to come to its arrangements by negotiation with the work force for whatever scheme it wishes to see continued after the deadline for this scheme. That is a perfectly reasonable and legitimate proposition to place before the House. No doubt Opposition Members will wish to test it in Committee when we have more detailed debates on this small Bill.

With regard to extending the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme beyond 1986, I hope that Opposition Members will deploy their arguments later, but tonight I hope that I can assure hon. Members on both sides of the House that there is no plot to produce a flood of redundancies against any time scale and that, as ever, redundancies — those sad decisions — are made predominantly in the light of the position of order books, the health of the site and its objectives for the future.

What about the right hon. and learned Gentleman's point about fairness to the private sector? Frankly, I found it particularly galling. It is strange that he should take that line when it was his Administration who decided in the first place that there would not be provision for the private sector. It has not been a mark of Labour party concern in the past to see the full-blooded health of private sector competitors to publicly owned industries. However, when the scheme ends, there will be full equality between the public sector and the private sector. There is pressure from some of my hon. Friends to bring about that equality at a much earlier date. It will happen, and it will happen because we shall have a rationalised industry on which we can consolidate, hoping that the recession in shipbuilding orders will come to an end.

The right hon. Member for Govan referred to the intervention fund. As the House knows, on 2 November the Industry Council agreed to the extension for a further two years, until the end of 1986, of the fifth directive on aid to shipbuilding. That means that we have overcome a major obstacle to our efforts to secure the Commission's approval to an enhancement of the intervention fund regime. However, we could not reach a satisfactory agreement with the outgoing Commission on our application to increase the level of intervention fund support, so my hon. Friend the Minister of State will soon be knocking on the door of the new Commissioners to re-emphasise our reasonable and sensible proposals.

Two hon. Members referred to the type 22 frigates in a slightly different context. I say again to the House that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence is considering the tenders for those vessels and hopes to announce his decisions shortly. We fully recognise the importance of those orders to the three contending yards

[Mr. Butcher]

—Cammell Laird, Swan Hunter and Vosper Thornycroft. We equally recognise the concern in each at the time that it has taken to reach a decision, but it is essential that in reaching it we take fully into account all the factors, including the requirements of the Navy, the cost to the taxpayer, the performance of the yards and their need for work. No doubt the factor mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh will be uppermost in the minds of all three yards. Of course we welcome the dramatic improvement in the atmosphere and the sense of responsibility in Cammell Laird, but we cannot tell the House tonight the precise date on which that decision will be made, although it will be shortly.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: We must be clear about this matter. Is the Minister telling the House that the decision on where the orders for those two type 22s are placed will not be based solely on commercial considerations?

Mr. Butcher: The decision will be based on the judgment of the Secretary of State for Defence of the ability of the yards to complete those ships on spec, on time and within the contract price. In other words, it will be an objective decision on merit, and on commercial grounds, if the hon. Gentleman wishes to call it that.

At long last, I come to the raft of questions raised by the hon. Member for Sunderland, North. He had the courtesy to write to my hon. Friend the Minister of State requesting that the closure of the BS(ETS) manufacturing facility be postponed for three months while the current investigation into the alternatives to closure is completed. My hon. Friend replied that, while that was primarily a management matter for British Shipbuilders, he had looked into the position. He assured the hon. Gentleman that only those assets that British Shipbuilders needed to keep for its Wallsend site would be removed from BS(ETS), that British Shipbuilders intended to sell the unit as a whole if a buyer could be found, and that closure would not seriously prejudice the chances of a new operation starting up there. The House will agree that British Shipbuilders is going out of its way to be as helpful as possible on the issue and is acting with a judicious blend of commercial and social responsibility.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the development of the Doxford engine and said that there was a recent suggestion in Lloyd's List that British Shipbuilders is secretly continuing development work on the engine. I am assured by the corporation that that report is wrong. Work on the new engine stopped 18 months ago. It was clear that there was insufficient demand to justify the investment, and British Shipbuilders tried to interest private sector companies in sharing the risk or taking over the work. I regret to inform the House that no one was prepared to do so.

I refer to the general question of the future of BS(ETS). We all naturally regret the closure of the crankshaft and engine-building operation and the redundancies that that has meant, but those were strictly commercial decisions that were forced on British Shipbuilders. The investment in the crankshaft facility was, with hindsight, an error of commercial judgment on the part of management at the time. British Shipbuilders has never achieved, nor is it likely to achieve, the levels of engine throughput that would justify such a facility, and the only sensible thing to do was to close it and, in its view, stop throwing good money after bad. I know that that will seem a harsh observation to the hon. Member for Sunderland, North, but those are the realities as advised to us before the debate.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will draw some encouragement from the interest shown by Tyne and Wear county council. Since the decisions were made several parties, including the hon. Gentleman and the county council, have been active in seeking support and funds to enable all or part of BS(ETS) to continue. British Shipbuilders is extending what help it can to the advisers acting for the group in evaluating the possibilities. I hope that something will emerge from that approach, but I also hope that it will be a commercial solution with a long-term future and not an uncommercial rescue operation funded solely by the ratepayers of Tyne and Wear.

Mr. Clay: Does not the Minister accept that if those efforts, which he recognises, are to have any chance of coming to fruition, the work force must still be there? The workers are capable of developing the works in the way that various companies might want to develop them. It is not true that British Shipbuilders is assisting. It has taken a long time to get the Department of Trade and Industry and British Shipbuilders to take any interest in the approaches that have been made. There has been little co-operation, and it does not help potential buyers if the workers who are left are being either threatened or bribed out of the works and if British Shipbuilders' management seems to have an interest in nothng but closing the works. The picture that the Minister presents of the interest being shown by companies is true, but the picture of co-operation that he is presenting is not.

Mr. Butcher: I shall have to agree to differ on that point. It would appear from the level of activity that is reported to the Department that genuine attempts have been made to resolve the problem, but hard commercial facts have intervened. That particular site apparently cannot obtain the amount of business required for either existing or future management to survive.

Mr. Clay rose——

Mr. Butcher: I must press on.

I should like to deal with the hon. Gentleman's fifth question, about the Ethiopian order. I gave an undertaking to write to him personally, and I shall discharge it as soon as I can. I can say tonight that British Shipbuilders is proceeding as quickly as possible to put together a financial package acceptable to the customer for an order for two general-purpose cargo vessels from Ethiopia, and if successful it would go to Austin and Pickersgill.

British Shipbuilders is also pursuing a number of other prospects for the yard, but I am bound to say that, in view of Ethiopia's economic position, export credits in respect of that country present certain difficulties. With my Department's support, however, British Shipbuilders has identified arrangements which could offer means of resolving the problems. British Shipbuilders is pursuing that matter urgently.

There are three options for St. Helena—an SD14, a small ship or continued use of the existing ship. I regret to inform the House that, contrary to the views that were put forward in our recent debate on shipbuilding, it is not just a question of another SD14 being ordered or not, or of any particular time scale. There are as yet unresolved options. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development is considering these options.

I appreciate the urgent need for orders for Austin and Pickersgill, but of equal importance to St. Helena is a decision which will suit its requirements. Nevertheless, I shall continue to press the urgency of the matter upon my right hon. Friend.

The proposal to extend the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme embodied in the Bill——

Mr. Millan: I asked about the Turkish order for Govan Shipbuilders. I hope that the Minister can give an assurance that, if necessary, the Government stand ready to achieve that order for Govan Shipbuilders.

Mr. Butcher: The short answer is yes.

The Bill should have the support of both sides of the House. It is, to use my hon. Friend's words, an innocuous Bill. In effect, it continues a policy launched by Opposition Members. I hope, therefore, that the Bill will receive the support of the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

SHIPBUILDING BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Shipbuilding Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(a) any increase in sums payable out of money provided by Parliament under any other enactment attributable to extending the period in respect of which schemes under the Shipbuilding (Redundancy Payments) Act 1978 have effect from eight years to nine years and six months, and

(b) the extinguishment of all outstanding liabilities in respect of the loan made by the Shipbuilding Industry Board to Upper Clyde Shipbuilders Limited under section 4 of the Shipbuilding Industry Act 1967.—[Mr. Lang.]

New Towns and Urban Development Corporations Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

UNDERTAKINGS ON DISPOSAL

'Where the Commission disposes of land which is or is likely to be used for commercial or industrial purposes:

(1) It shall obtain from the transferee and its successors in title an undertaking that the transferee shall:

(a) act reasonably and fairly towards any person who is a tenant of such land; and

(b) That in particular the transferee will not:

(i) seek to enforce any covenant to repair where the repair involves the reparation of an inherent defect in the construction of the building erected by the Commission or its predecessor in title;

(ii) impose or enforce any rent review clause in such a way as to demand a greater amount of rent than would be awarded by a court on the renewal of lease under Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954.

(iii) enforce any liability against an original lessee who has assigned his interest with the consent of the reversioner;

(iv) unreasonably refuse consent for alterations or a change of user;

(v) seek any new direct covenant from an assignee as a condition of a licence to assign;

(vi) seek from any tenant an undertaking to be responsible for the lessor's costs whether a matter proceeds to completion or not.

(2) It shall first offer to dispose of the land to the tenant.'.—[Mr. John Fraser.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

7.42 pm

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

This Administration's aim is to achieve the naked state. When I say "naked state", I do not mean something that is like the Garden of Eden. I mean the naked state that is more appropriate to the Government's lack of any sense of shame. I mean it in the sense that it is stripped of any public assets. The Bill is part of a striptease process, because it facilitates the disposal by the Commission for the New Towns of its public assets.

The new clause addresses itself to the way in which the Commission for the New Towns disposes of its industrial and commercial land and to whom. One great difference between public and private ownership is accountability. If the Commission for the New Towns, or any other public landowner, abuses its position or power it can ultimately be called to account in the House of Commons, it can be examined by a Select Committee, and Ministers can be questioned and have to justify their decisions to the House of Commons. A local authority has to justify its decision to its electors. However, a private owner—the Bill talks about handing over commercial land to private owners —of commercial, industrial or residential land is under no obligation to consider any kind of public accountability. His obligations are towards his shareholders or investors and not to the tenant, the community or any wider industrial or commercial interests.

A good example of that point is St. George's hospital. When St. George's hospital at Hyde park corner was owned by the National Health Service, we could ask questions in the House about the use of that land and its value to the community. When the lease lapsed and it went into the hands of the Duke of Westminster and the Grosvenor estate, there was no longer any opportunity for Members to ask in the House about a valuable public asset in the centre of London which remains empty and unused. That is a good example of the difference between public accountability and private ownership. The lack of accountability of the private landlord and the institutional investor needs to be counterbalanced by legal obligations.

There are three dangers inherent in the Commission for the New Towns handing over its commercial land to private hands. First, there is the danger that properties will be sold over the heads of those tenants who wish to buy. The Government are in favour of the right to buy for residential tenants. We shall not go into that issue this evening. I am in favour, as are many other hon. Members, of the right of the commercial tenant, whether he is a small shopkeeper, a factory owner or large institution, to have the first offer to buy his reversion from the Commission for the New Towns before the land is sold to a property company or anyone else.

If it is the judgment of the commercial tenant that his business or the production of goods or services is better served by the industrial or service producer owning the freehold, I believe that his judgment should be paramount, provided that he can find the money and pay the market value, and that there is no loss to public funds. He should have first option of buying his reversion before it passes into any private landlord's hands. Part of the new clause deals with that issue.

The country's future does not lie in property companies owning land; it lies in the production of wealth by way of goods and services. If the private tenant, whether he is a small shopkeeper, industrialist, professional or provider of services, wants to buy and believes that that is in the interests of production, he should be allowed to exercise that right.

Mr. Warren Hawksley (The Wrekin): I do not see anything in the new clause to say that the sale should be at market value. Perhaps we can have clarification of how the valuation should be arrived at for a tenant to purchase.

Mr. Fraser: I thought for a moment that the hon. Gentleman was afraid that the Government might do another British Telecom with the commission's land. It is implicit in the new clause that the land will be sold at market value. There is no deviation from that general principle.

If the commercial tenant wishes to be free of the tedious supervision, restrictions and extraction of fees, charges and rent by his landlord, he should have the opportunity to buy his reversion. If a commercial tenant in a new town wants a private landlord off his back, and if he is prepared to pay good money for that purpose, he should be allowed to do so. I hope that when he replies to the debate the Minister will give an undertaking—this matter can be achieved by an undertaking—that he will require the commission, before it disposes of its commercial land assets, to give first offer at market value to the commercial tenants who occupy the land. That would deal with the danger of the land being sold over the heads of private tenants.

There is a second danger inherent in the sale of new towns land. There is a risk that new towns could become private company towns, with one or two private landlords only wielding monopolistic powers. Once again the Minister could deal with that problem by giving an undertaking that under no circumstances will a few private landlords be allowed to purchase the commercial assets of any new town.

We understand from a cutting from the Birmingham Evening Mail of 28 December 1984 that the Government have prevented or persuaded Redditch development corporation not to sell its commercial assets to one or two companies only. There is a fear that a great many commercial assets could be put into the hands of one or two small property companies. I hope that the Minister will give an undertaking that that danger will be avoided.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): The hon. Gentleman may not be aware that Redditch is in my constituency and that I have taken a close interest in the matter to which he has referred. The Government's position, as I understand it, is that there is no objection in principle to the disposal of assets at an acceptable price and valuation to one, two or however many bidders. It is up to the individual bidders to make acceptable, reasonable and fair bids for assets in new towns for them to be accepted. Therefore, I do not believe that the result of the transaction referred to by the hon. Gentleman is as he suggested.

Mr. Fraser: If that is not the case, I am giving too much credit to the Government. There ought to be other considerations, apart from price. It is wrong that the predominant amount of land in a new town should be in the hands of one or two private companies. I am not in favour, in principle, of selling off the land, but if it is to be sold it is wrong that there should be a single, private, unaccountable company controlling the commercial land in that area. It would be very much better, if the land is to be sold, for the Commission for the New Towns to wait for bids for different parcels of land, so that there is at least a variety of private landlords and some degree of choice as between one commercial letting and another. It should not be put into the hands of one single estate. One knows of the risk of abuse which has arisen in the past as a result of large land ownerships by, for example, the Church Commissioners or the Grosvenor estate.

Mr. Forth: May I also clarify this point. In Redditch, the example which has been taken, the shopping centre has already been disposed of at a fair and agreed price to a different set of landlords. The development corporation has had a disposals programme under way for many years. Large parts of the town are already owned by many different holders. I ask the hon. Member to clarify how he defines the parameters of what he is suggesting—one, or a few, or not too many, the whole town or part of the town. I do not believe that what the hon. Gentleman says has any meaning, because Redditch is a good example of the approach which he has suggested.

Mr. Fraser: In such a short space of time I cannot lay down a universal rule, but what I am arguing is that there should not be a sale by the Commission for the New Towns of the land in any new town to a small number of landlords. If the hon. Gentleman says that in Redditch there is a wide variety of landlords, one welcomes that, but what one is trying to do is to continue to have a choice and, if it exists, some degree of competition among the commercial landlords. That is the point that I am making. I believe that our future lies in having, not a nation of landlords, but a nation of people who are producing goods.

I deal next with the third danger that flows from the disposal of lands by the Commission for the New Towns. This is the way in which commercial tenants will be exposed to the abuse of power inherent in ownership by large property companies, including the insurance companies, investment trusts and other trust funds—what I call, in shorthand terms, the institutional landlord. The new clause would protect tenants from some abuses by institutional landlords. I believe that the balance between the commercial landlord and the commercial tenant is unfairly weighted in favour of the landlord and that landlords are sometimes—though not universally so—arrogant and insensitive and abuse the imbalance of power which exists between an institutional landlord and a commercial tenant. Incidentally, I am not dealing with the transfer of residential land which would normally be passed to local authorities.

The whole purpose of an intitutional, commercial landlord is to squeeze every possible penny which he can get out of his tenant. The process of production has nothing very much to do with the commercial landlord. Indeed, people could go to shareholders' meetings or to meetings of a pension fund and complain that the institutional landlord had not extracted the last possible advantage out of his tenants. That is the whole purpose of his existence. A landlord could be accused of dereliction of duty by not extracting the greatest amount that he could get from his tenants.

I believe it is wrong that institutions in Britain prefer to invest only in the safest and most secure factor of production, instead of putting their money into all factors of production. We see more and more money going into the ownership of land and buildings, instead of the institutions taking the whole spread of risks involved in the production of goods and services.

The new clause tries to deal with some of the abuses, which, in my view, are on the increase. For instance, it will impose upon an institutional landlord or upon anybody who acquires land from the Commission for the New Towns the duty to act fairly and reasonably towards any tenant of that land. I believe that that ought to be the overriding obligation of a landlord. He needs a return on his capital, but he ought to have regard to general standards of fairness and equity as between the landlord and the tenant. Therefore, there should not be a fastidious enforcement of repairing covenants, which often amount to little more than a surveyor's bonanza to obtain money out of the tenant of commercial premises.

Secondly, when the Commission for the New Towns sells its commercial land it should obtain an undertaking from the purchaser not to seek to enforce any covenant to repair where the repair involves reparation of an inherent defect. Let me give the House an idea of the abuses that take place. There have been a number of cases where a commercial landlord has built office buildings or other industrial buildings with external cladding, so the reponsibility for the erection of the building is solely that of the institutional landlord. The premises are then let on a full repairing lease to a commercial tenant. After a while the cladding begins to fall off. Sometimes the cost of reparation will amount to millions of pounds, yet the courts have decided that because of the way in which our property law works the obligation to repair belongs not to the landlord who built an inherently unstable structure but to the tenant.

There have been other cases where institutional landlords have erected buildings with unsafe heating systems. They have contained asbestos fibres. Despite the fact that the landlord has not delivered the goods, the consequences of that failure are then visited upon the tenant. I feel strongly about this, because I assisted the passage through the House of what is now the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977. Under that Act, if one is dealing with goods rather than with land and buildings, one has to deliver one's promise. It is not possible, with some limitations, to contract out of one's basic liability that the goods supplied should be of merchantable quality and reasonably fit for the purpose for which they are required.

With landlords, it is a different matter. Institutional landlords—indeed, landlords generally—have escaped almost entirely from their obligations, without tenants having any recourse to law. As between those who are trying to produce goods or services in this country and who are having a pretty hard time of it during a world recession, and those who have a vast amount of money to invest in reversions to industrial properties, the balance of advantage ought to lie with the tenant who takes the risk rather than with the landlord who takes very little risk. The most extreme case is the one where the landlord is responsible for an inherent defect in a building and yet visits the consequences of his own neglect upon the tenant. Part of the new clause would prevent that from happening—at any rate in those cases where property had been acquired from the commission.

Another abuse is when a landlord introduces a rent review clause into a commercial lease. Even though the lease may have only three or four years to run at the time of the rent review, the landlord insists upon having the rent fixed by an arbitrator on the assumption that the period of the lease will be 21 years, whereas in reality the unexpired period of the lease is only three or four years. When the lease comes to its complete end, the tenant is able, by way of arbitration, to go to the county court to have the rent fixed at a fair market value under the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954. I see no reason why rent review clauses as they are now being developed should circumvent the will of the House as laid down in the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954. That is the reason for a further limb of the new clause.

Another unfair abuse, is the visiting of a liability upon an original lessee. For example, there may be a small business man who, perhaps 20 years ago, took a workshop on an industrial estate on a 21-year lease and set up in business as a small business man, and was successful. As a result of that success, perhaps after three or four years, he assigned his lease to another industrialist and went into bigger premises because his business had grown. Yet 21 years later, if the final occupant of the premises defaults on his obligations, either by non-payment of rent or by failure to repair, the liability that accrues 21 years after the lease was granted and 17 years after the original lessee has left the building can nevertheless be visited on the original lessee. That is an unfair balance between the landlord and the tenant.

The rule that an original lessee is liable throughout the whole lease for payment of rent and observance of performance of the covenants should be swept away. We have an opportunity to do that at least in respect of land that is disposed of by the commission.

8 pm

In a society where industrial processes are changing and public taste changes more rapidly than ever, there is no reason why a landlord should unreasonably refuse a change of use or an alteration to premises. There might be justifiable reasons, but if a man who has been manufacturing, say, manual calculating machines finds that the market for them has declined and he wants to develop another product, there is no reason why the institutional landlord should be able to hold him to ransom and demand a premium as a condition of agreeing to a change of use of the premises or the making of an alteration.

There is also no reason why there should be a bonanza in professional fees following licences to assign becoming unduly lengthy and fees being demanded from tenants who are allowed to assign leases.

Those are all general abuses and I should like to see all of them removed. We should right the balance between the commercial tenant and the commercial landlord.

At least we can deal with some of the abuses in the sale of public land covered by the Bill, where the Government have the power to set a higher standard. If the Government reject the new clause, they will show that their sympathies lie not with commercial tenants or those who are trying to innovate and produce to increase the wealth of the country, but with the commercial landlords who play a much smaller part in the process of production than do those who have the hard job of paying the rent and trying to run a business.

The Minister for Housing and Construction (Mr. Ian Gow): It may be convenient if I comment first on what the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) said about Redditch. He was correct in saying that the Government have decided that the sale that had been suggested should not be proceeded with in the way proposed.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment wrote to the chairman of the Redditch development corporation on 13 December:

"The Government attaches great importance to ensuring that tenants have the opportunity to buy the property which they rent . . . in spite of what the prospective purchasers said, a risk must remain that this opportunity would be less than would be offered by an agency under direct Government control."

I also remind the House of what my hon. Friend said on Second Reading. I repeat the assurance that he gave:

"there are several safeguards for which Ministers would look before they gave their consent. For example, existing tenants of industrial and commercial property would want to continue to have good opportunities to buy their premises. We would insist on that."

The hon. Member for Norwood expressed anxiety about the possibility of a single purchaser being able to acquire substantial blocks of property from the commission. That has not happened. Since 1979, about £500 million of commercial and industrial assets have been sold. About £300 million of the sales were made by the commission and the other £200 million were made by the development corporations. Those sales have involved many individual transactions. The £50 million realised by the commission in 1983-84 was the product of about 180 separate sales, two thirds of which were to sitting tenants or other local interests. Five of the sales were to consortia of tenants, involving about 50 tenants.

The hon. Member for Norwood will have read the report of the commission for 1983-84 which said that if properties are to be offered to the investment market, the commissioners, as a matter of policy, ensure that their tenants are informed three months in advance, with an indication of the approximate sum expected by the commission's agents, so that they have a reasonable opportunity to negotiate finance or consortium arrangements and to seek to reach agreement with the commission.

We are bringing into the property market the forces of a true market place. On Second Reading, Opposition Members criticised my phrase but it is that magic, within the framework of the general law, which will provide the best protection for present tenants of the commission. I repeat that the Government have required the commission to give tenants the first opportunity to buy the freehold of their properties. Alternatively, they can remain as tenants under existing leases, and if they remain as tenants and the freehold is sold, the landlord will have a clear incentive to continue to let on reasonable and fair terms. The investor will want to ensure that his investment keeps its value. Much of the value depends on having a thriving tenant who is able and willing to pay the rent. No purchaser wants to buy a series of law suits with unwilling tenants. Therefore, it is in the purchaser's interests to make sure that the tenant receives fair treatment.

The intention of the new clause is misconceived. Rather than attempt to fetter the discretion of the commission in realising the assets, we should recognise that the general law on landlords and commercial tenants, and the forces of the market, apply in new towns as much as they do elsewhere. There is no reason to single out former tenants of the Commission for the New Towns for special treatment.

The new clause ignores the truth that every tenancy is the result of a separate commercial negotiation. The lease records the bargain struck by the two parties in the light of all the circumstances. Neither party can alter that agreement unilaterally. If the commission sells a property subject to a lease, the tenant remains entitled to the protection of the lease into which he has entered or to which he is the assignee. In particular, he will be able to take advantage of independent arbitration to settle the level of any rent review that cannot be agreed, since that is the normal basis of the commission's leases. It is not sensible to attempt to rewrite those leases with a few words of statute, because the leases reflect a vast variety of circumstances.

Even if there were no other objection to the new clause, it would not achieve the objective of its supporters. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) mentioned subsection (2):

"It shall first offer to dispose of the land to the tenant."

There is nothing there about open market value. The clause also says:

"the transferee shall . . . act reasonably and fairly towards any person who is a tenant of such land".

That is an invitation — which the hon. Member for Norwood and I should not be the first to complain about —for more work to be put the way of the lawyers.

The new clause would require the commission to obtain undertakings from any purchasers of property. No doubt the commission would be able to enforce such undertakings, at least against the original purchaser, but tenants would not be parties to the agreement. Consequently, their locus to enforce such undertakings would be extremely doubtful. We should not change the normal law simply in the case of purchasers from the commission.

For those reasons, I cannot advise the House to accept the new clause.

Question put and negatived.

Clause 12

FINANCIAL LIMIT FOR URBAN DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 13, line 16, leave out '"£600 million"' and insert '"£550 million"'.

I tabled amendment No. 1 for two reasons. First, it gives us an opportuniy to focus our attention upon a somewhat anomalous part of the Bill—the single clause that deals with the urban development corporations, of which there are only two. I am myself concerned mainly with the London Docklands development corporation. Within the wider framework of a Bill dealing with the new towns commission, the urban development corporations might well be overlooked. That would be a great mistake. It is right for us to seize any opportunities to consider how the urban development corporations are carrying out their redevelopment functions in the London and Liverpool docklands.

Secondly, by changing the figure from £600 million to £550 million we would bring forward the time when it would be necessary for the Secretary of State to seek an affirmative resolution in order to gain for the UDCs the additional sums of money that they will require.

In connection with accountability and the affairs of the UDCs, we should remember that the LDDC, at least, is quite distinct from all the previous new town, expanded town and other corporations set up in the past, especially in that the proposal was from the beginning strongly opposed by the local councils. No agreement was worked out with them, as it was in the case of Peterborough, Northampton or other established towns on to which new town corporations were grafted. Nor can the corporations be compared in any sense with the new town corporations set up in earlier post-war years on green field sites. There is still a strong feeling of resentment within the communities, and people are anxious that Parliament should exercise its powers of scrutiny, whenever possible, over the affairs of the LDDC. This is such an opportunity.

8.15 pm

I shall not consider the whole range of the LDDC's work. Its annual report was published last June or July and gave some account—though it was a glossy document designed with public relations in mind—of what the corporation had been up to during the preceding year.

There are some developments that I welcome. I welcome the advance, in agreement with the GLC, towards a light transit system which would greatly improve communications in an area that suffers badly from lack of communications. I am thinking not just of my own borough of Tower Hamlets, but of the adjacent boroughs of Newham and of Southwark and Lewisham to the south.

We would all welcome that development, but other areas are more controversial. For instance, there is the proposed development of the STOLport. We await the result of the inquiry. The findings were set before the Secretary of State some months ago, but I understand that he has subsequently asked certain questions of the parties concerned. Whether by doing so he has made it necessary to reopen the inquiry is a matter on which I look forward to hearing the views of the Minister.

The area of LDDC policy that is of the greatest concern to my constituents in Tower Hamlets and above all to people living in the dock area and Wapping is housing in which there has been a truly remarkable development. New town or development corporations have been set up in many areas, and it is generally been not only the stated claim but the generally accepted view that in promoting house building the corporations were serving the needs of local people. In the case of Wapping, such a claim would have to be seriously scrutinised. It may well be—the situation is almost unique—that of the many attractive and desirable houses that will be built virtually none will be available for the people who live in Wapping or in the rest of Tower Hamlets. The reason is not that people do not wish to buy the houses — which are, of course, overwhelmingly, built for sale. It is that they cannot afford to buy them at the prices that will be demanded.

I have engaged in lengthy arguments with the LDDC's chairman and chief executive about their policy of building houses for sale in Wapping. As a result of pressure brought to bear upon the LDDC by myself and others, it conducted a survey, and a report entitled "Living in Wapping" was published in July 1984. In response to my request that the LDDC should attempt to find out whether people in Wapping would be able to buy the houses which it proposed to build—especially in the Western dock area, the first large tranche of new house building—it carried out a substantial survey. It discovered that 70 per cent. of the people in Wapping would like to buy if they could. Of those, some 47 per cent. would be able to buy if they did not have to pay more than £150 a month. If they had to pay as much as £250 a month in mortgage and rate payments—in that area of Wapping, rent and rates are aggregated together—only 6 per cent. would be able to buy.

One has only to consider the cost of house building in dockland and the price of houses there to see that the people are faced with a major problem.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Will the right hon. Gentleman elucidate one point? How can he say that, in private accommodation, rent and rates are aggregated? If the development is to be a private one, why are those amounts aggregated? If sky-high rates are imposed by an inefficient local authority, of course costs will be high.

Mr. Shore: I merely aggregated the amount in the terms of a survey of affordability that takes account of rate payments as well as payments for servicing the mortgage. As today there is a tendency to pay the rent and rates together, the sums were taken together. That is simply a point of explanation.

[Mr. Shore]

That is the background against which one must consider the prices of the houses being built in Western dock. Although the corporation has done its best to maintain that people are queuing up to buy houses in Beckton and Surrey docks — my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) may wish to comment on that— the corporation admits that in Wapping the situation will be a damn sight more difficult. According to the annual report,

"because of its location immediately to the east and within walking distance of the City, the corporation has always known that prices in Wapping would be higher and, without action, probably out of the range of the sort of local people who have been buying elsewhere".

It can say that again about the houses being out of range.

It is unlikely that a house will be built in the Western dock area for less than £40,000. The corporation uses that figure in its annual report. I am informed that someone who wanted to get a mortgage for £40,000 would probably have to pay 11·75 per cent. interest. Allowing for a tax rebate, that would mean monthly payments of about £330 over a 25-year term. I remind the House that only 6 per cent. of those people who wanted to buy a house in the area are able to afford £250 a month. That should be compared with the £330 a month required to service a mortgage of £40,000. I fear therefore that very few people from Wapping or Tower Hamlets will be able to buy the houses.

That is a scandal and a tragedy. When the docks moved down the river towards Tilbury and beyond and the old enclosed dock systems became available for other uses, the borough of Tower Hamlets and other dockland boroughs were presented with a historic opportunity to deal with some of the worst housing problems in Britain. At last land was becoming available. We had every hope and expectation that such problems would be solved by using a substantial part of the land that had become free. However, we are still saddled with a serious, and increasing, housing problem while the free housing land has been transferred by vesting orders to the LDDC, which is knowingly building houses at prices which are beyond the reach of the people of the borough.

The extra sums of money which are being made available to the development corporations in London and Liverpool contrast most unfavourably with the continued reduction in the residual housing investment programme money for building houses for rent, for repairs and for modernisation which is available to borough councils. At constant prices, the housing investment programme has fallen in the past five years from £20 million a year to £11·6 million a year in Tower Hamlets. That reduction is occurring when there are large numbers of homeless families, often Bengali, who must live in bed and breakfast accommodation and seedy hotels in west London or Islington. We also have vast new problems of disrepair in our housing stock such as have been revealed by the discovery of deterioration in Ronan Point type buildings in Tower Hamlets. Moreover, we have the growing problems of asbestos being found in many buildings while ordinary repairs are being carried out.

Mr. Forth: The right hon. Gentleman is drawing a fascinating distinction between the resources that are available to development corporations and those which are available to local authorities in housing. Would he care to relate his comments to the argument that the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) deployed about accountability and discuss accountability for funds that are available to development corporations and their use?

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) made the point succinctly. He said that the purpose of public ownership of land and resources is to ensure that its use is accountable and that the matter can be brought before the House. New towns have always enjoyed special status but they are accountable, as are urban development corporations. Some are less accountable than others. Because urban development corporations have no master plan and had no public inquiry before they were set up, they are perhaps less accountable and have gone through less scrutiny than new towns such as Redditch which the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) represents. Nevertheless, we have had opportunities. This is such a one and we must seize it to insist on public accountability of urban development corporations' actions.

There is a need for radical change in housing policy in the LDDC area. There is also a great need for a change in the balance between building for rent and building for sale. The balance is much too heavily tipped towards building houses for sale. Pursuing such a policy in the pretty secure knowledge that negligible assistance will be given to easing the housing problem of people who live in the area is utterly irresponsible and worthy of censure.

I hope that there will be a rethink. We now have a survey and will therefore be able to check the take-up of houses in the Western dock development by people who live in the borough. If, as I suspect, the numbers are negligible, I hope that Ministers, in spite of their almost obsessive interest in private development, will reconsider and give new instructions to the LDDC.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I endorse everything that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) said about the effect of the London Docklands development corporation. My constituency is not quite as close to the City, but we have had similar experiences. I shall show how the LDDC works to even greater disadvantage in my area.

In this first major debate on the progress of the LDDC since it was set up under the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980, it is appropriate to read from section 136 of the Act:

"(1) The object of an urban development corporation shall be to secure the regeneration of its area.

(2) The object is to be achieved in particular by the following means (or by such of them as seem to the corporation to be appropriate in the case of its area), namely, by bringing land and buildings into effective use, encouraging the development of existing and new industry and commerce, creating an attractive environment and ensuring that housing and social facilities are available to encourage people to live and work in the area."

As my right hon. Friend said, there was much argument about an urban development corporation. There was a three-month hearing by a Select Committee of another place before the necessary statutory instrument was laid before this House. Despite the fact that Newham covers half of the LDDC's area and although I represent half the area, the legislation is so draconian that I was not able to participate in the debate which established the LDDC. The Minister will therefore understand if my remarks take longer tonight.

8.30 pm

The Select Committee of another place made a number of recommendations and observations, and its findings were published in paper 198 in 1980. I particularly draw attention to paragraph 8.7 because it exercises an acid test which I shall use later:

"This leads the Committee to a final point. It is obvious—and the Chairman designate fully recognised—that if a UDC is to be a success it is essential that it establishes and maintains good relations with the local authorities and their officers, and avails itself of their advice and expertise. The Code of consultation, provided for under section 140 of the Act, should ensure that this is so. The UDC must also win the confidence of local organisations. It must always let the Docklands Forum know what it is thinking of doing, so that they can express their views on any proposal and it must make it clear that such views, even if not accepted, are always seriously considered."

The Docklands Forum has said that it does not believe that it knows what the LDDC is doing. Indeed, as I shall demonstrate, in many instances I do not know what the LDDC is up to in my own constituency. As the Secretary of State is accountable to hon. Members, he will appreciate that it is difficult for outside organisations to know what is going on.

The Chairman of that Committee, Lord Cross, made some additional remarks—I think in a judicial capacity—when the constitution order was debated in another place. On 1 July, at column 214, of Hansard, he said that the preponderant need in dockland was for publicly owned housing. However, we all know that that is not what the LDDC has in the end emphasised in that area of housing for which it is responsible. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney has already illustrated that in the context of Stepney.

Vast areas of Newham were available for development. That land, instead of being made available for up to 20,000 people in mixed tenancies—about two thirds public to about one third private and housing association—was drastically changed to more or less all private. The terms of the land value transaction were not entirely clear, despite Sir Laurie Barratt's remarks in the Evening Standard, nor have they been since. But I am obliged to the Minister for some clarification of this matter in a letter that he sent me in relation to his reply of 25 October 1984 when I asked what adjustments were made by the LDDC to the market price of land sold to house builders. This is a fundamental point.

The LDDC can purchase land compulsorily and sell to private developers who then sell to freeholders. In his reply by letter, the Minister said:

"The value of the land was determined by setting prices for the dwellings and deducting development and overhead costs. The residual value was attributed to the land".

The Minister may be unable fully to amplify that when he replies, but I hope that he will be able to do so at some stage. Not only was most of that land taken for private development, but the price of the land to the developer was not made clear, at least not to the people of the area at the time, and it has remained something of a question since.

The idea was that many of the people who came into these private developments would contribute to the life of the area, and many have. Many hon. Members and many members of the Labour party own their own houses. We do not disagree with that. But the people of Newham object to the change in the proportion of land to be used for certain development, because the need for publicly owned and housing association dwellings is very great. That need was subsequently increased—the Minister knows this only too well—as a result of the difficulties with Ronan Point and Taylor Woodrow-Anglian blocks.

The LDDC almost reversed the priorities. Had this been changed by 30 per cent. one way or the other, the same concern would not have been expressed. I am glad to say that the LDDC has apparently now offered five acres of land to the Newham borough council. The former chairman, Sir Nigel Broackes, made it clear that he would be willing to give more, provided the council had the cash to undertake the building. That, of course, depended on HIP allocations and so on, as a result of which the council on many occasions was unable to build.

Planning applications, although not overall strategic planning, were in the hands of the LDDC. It was the prime planning authority, and it is here that the borough made its main objection. It said, "The dockland area will be organised by the LDDC but we in Newham want it to integrate that planning with the rest of the borough. We want to balance our shopping and recreational facilities to serve the whole community, and Newham, being bounded by river valleys, commons and the River Thames itself, is very much a community. But if we have two planning authorities operating on different criteria, there will be difficulty." That was one of the main objections which the able chief executive made in his evidence to the Select Committee.

Lo and behold, there have been planning difficulties. The London borough of Newham gave planning authority to supermarkets in the dockland area, and the LDDC has now gone further and given more planning authority in a formerly industrial area for retail markets. That may affect the balance of planning and shopping opportunity in the rest of the borough. I could go on from there, because the criteria on which the LDDC operates will not be that of the borough, particularly in respect of industry.

On 7 June last year, I asked a number of questions about the policy of the LDDC in relation to small firms and industrial relocation. Given the Government's proper emphasis on small private enterprise, one might have thought that the LDDC would have gone out of its way to ensure that any necessary displacement was dealt with sympathetically and that it would lean over backwards to do what it could. It may have done so in certain respects, but it is wrong that a Member for Parliament should—as I was on a number of occasions—be brought in to deal with relocation for small firms in his constituency when the mighty operation of the LDDC was available. Unfortunately, such was the case.

The Minister has given some figures on employment, but he will know that a great deal of employment in the dockland area is brought in from outside—for example, in the constituencies of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney and my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo). I am told that, in the enterprise zone, rents have evened up to take account of the fact that there are no rates.

Therefore, the landlord gains. In the debates on the enterprise zone legislation, some hon. Members predicted that if the magic of the market operated, that would happen. Sure enough, it did. Therefore, the employment figures are not as good as they seem. When the Minister replies, I hope that he will give his estimate of the number of genuine new jobs that have been created which otherwise would not have existed. It may be a small figure; I have yet to hear any estimate from the LDDC or the Government.

If one wishes to make one's views known as a resident of Newham and not as a privileged Member of this House, to whom does one go? The Secretary of State appoints the LDDC board. Whatever its members' experience, occupation or office, they sit on the board as his nominees. Some continue and some do not. They are hired and fired by the Secretary of State. Sometimes we are not given a great deal of notice about who those gentlemen are.

Both the leaders of the London boroughs of Newham and Tower Hamlets participate, albeit differently. A press release on 12 November named a gentleman, whom I shall not name but who is no doubt an admirable person, who was being appointed by the Secretary of State to the LDDC. It is precisely five lines and tells us little about him except that he is involved in electronics and computers. I am not saying that there should not be someone with those qualifications on the board, but I complain that that is all we know about him.

It is not adequate for an organisation with planning powers of considerable strength, powers of compulsory purchase and powers of vesting of land—during the past six months there have been propositions which have been difficult for the communities to sustain — to meet in private and to publish an annual report which is partial. The annual report did not even quote the basic statute to which I referred earlier. Therefore, it is difficult for people to have confidence and trust—that word was used in the Select Committee's report—in such an organisation.

Sometimes it is difficult for hon. Members to have confidence and trust even regarding routine matters. In the past I have had the privilege to coach London youngsters on the river Thames. For seven years I coached rowing and water sports. When I went to Newham I thought that we could use the docks. The Port of London Authority provided difficulties, but when the docklands joint committee took them over I thought we were on our way. We had an Amateur Rowing Association regatta in 1983. The London borough of Newham and the LDDC got together and decided to have a young people's boating centre on the west part of the Royal Victoria dock. Negotiations went ahead for leasing a shed there. Everything went well, until I happened to visit the Library and while idly looking through Motor Boat and Yachting saw a familiar scene in an advertisement that stated:

"The London Floating Boat Show . . . comes to the Royal Victoria Dock, London, May 3-6, 1985."

The illustration showed the shed where I thought my young people were to have a boating centre. I checked the matter and indeed the plans had been changed. As I understand it, the London borough of Newham was to hear of that through my happening to see that advertisement in the Library.

That is not the right way to proceed. I know that another centre, perhaps an even better one, on another part of the dock has been offered. I hope that it will be both good and permanent. The water is there and is fine. But that is not the way to proceed.

8.45 pm

What is worse is the position of the voluntary associations in Newham, which are the responsibility of the LDDC. When the dockland joint committee operated, there was assistance to organisations in and adjacent to the area, such as the Mayfair youth club. When the LDDC came into being, that was restricted. Some of the grants made by the LDDC were reduced and the London borough of Newham picked up the tab.

Despite the injunctions of the Select Committee report, there were reports that an outside organisation was being interviewed and requested by the LDDC to organise voluntary activities in the area. It was said that about £200,000 would be available, which was the amount being provided by the LDDC to existing voluntary agencies in Newham. I wrote to the chief executive of the LDDC to find out what was happening because some of the voluntary agencies, under a well-arranged voluntary agencies council in Newham which has a docklands committee and has been in contact with the LDDC for many years, were distressed. I have not yet received substantive information from the LDDC.

I also wrote to the Minister. In his letter of 2 January he stated:

"There have been some recent meetings between LDDC, the London borough of Newham and Newham Voluntary Agencies Council. I gather that the results of these are that Newham are to write to the Corporation setting out their views for consideration by the Corporation's Executive Board when the project application is discussed. If the project is approved, LDDC intend to seek the views of the Newham Voluntary Agencies Council on each scheme that Inter-Action put forward as part of their consultancy."

Consultancies have a place in life, whether in civil engineering, housing or publicity. There is certainly plenty of consultancy in publicity. In a written answer on 3 July 1984, the Minister told me that the LDDC provision for publicity provision was £1,857,000.

Consultants for local voluntary organisations are a different issue. Some may argue that the matter has not yet been agreed and that, if it is agreed, individual projects will be submitted. Today I received a folder entitled:

"The Inter-Action Community Calendar 1985. London Docklands Young People Look At A Computer Future."

Attached to it was a paper called:

"Inter-Action Trust, Royal Victoria Dock, London."

It is complete with telephone number, and is divided into headings including, "Resources", "Training and Consultancy: General"., "Computers: Training and Consultancy".

Many other things are going on, with which local organisations already deal. It appears that projects are already in train. They are apparently unknown to the Minister because he said that, if consultancy was agreed and if projects went forward, they might be put in train. If that is so, why has that folder been printed and distributed in my constituency? The matter is out of control.

The leader of Newham council is criticised for being involved in the LDDC. The concept is not without controversy, but what does he do? It puts him and the Minister in a difficult position. The voluntary agencies council has not been consulted on the way in which money for voluntary activities should be distributed in the area.

Are the exhortations of the Select Committee being followed? I suggest not. The objectives that it set may be followed in some respects, but bearing in mind the enormous resources available, the LDDC has not behaved in a way deserving of the trust and co-operation of the local people.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) drew attention to the anomaly that spatchcocked into a Bill nearly all of which is about new town corporations there is a clause dealing with urban development corporations. That anomaly shows clearly the muddled thinking about urban development corporations that has been characteristic of the Government's attitude towards them since they were proposed. The Government have never been able to draw a distinction between setting up a new organisation with wide powers in a green field, where there is no population whose wishes must be taken into account, or enlarging small villages such as Milton Keynes and bringing in a new population, and setting up a development corporation with enormous powers in an area that is already densely populated. Many people live there cheek by jowl, some of them in rundown housing. They have many problems and strong views on what should be done about their problems, but they have discovered that they are being ruled by a body that is not in the least accountable to them.

The great change in the lives of the people who live in the area covered by the LDDC is that, in the past, if they did not like what the people who ran their area were doing, every few years they had a chance to chuck them out and to bring in some new people. They have now been deprived of that right. The body that governs them can ignore their wishes, and does, can evade all responsibility to consult them, and does, can treat them almost with contempt, and does, and they have no sanction. They can do nothing about it.

More than 50,000 people live in the area covered by the LDDC. When the development corporation was set up, 25,000 people were living on the narrow strip of land from Tower bridge to the Blackwall tunnel, including the Isle of Dogs. They had many problems, because it is a rundown, poor area. Unemployment there is as high as it is in the worst areas of Scotland, the north of England and Wales, and is almost as high as it is in Northern Ireland. Many of the inhabitants live in council flats which were built more than half a century ago, and which are, therefore, rundown. Many others live in private properties which were built a century ago and which are also rundown.

The development corporation is supposed to enrich the lives of those people, but it does nothing of the sort. The two things that are vital, not merely to enrich their lives but to provide a decent standard of living, are the provision of homes and the provision of jobs. I need add little to what my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney said about the provision of homes. Such homes as are being provided are being sold to people who come from outside the borough—people who are not included in the 25,000.

My right hon. Friend mentioned the cost of the houses and flats being built in the area. He quoted from the corporation's report of about six months ago. I shall update his facts. I have a cutting from the local newspaper, the East London Advertiser, of 5 January 1985, from which I shall read a short passage:

"In . . . Tower Hamlets, docklands, property prices are comfortably into six figures, with top-of-the-range riverside penthouses commanding a heady £350,000."

That sounds good to my constituents who live in rundown Shadwell gardens, either unemployed or working for relatively low wages.

The article continues:

"Four-bedroom houses in St. Katharine's Dock costing up to £125,000 look modest compared with properties along Wapping High Street. Three-bedroom flats on St. John and King Henry's Wharves cost £295,000 and penthouses on Gun Wharf a sky-high £350,000."

I draw attention to the next paragraph, which includes a fresh point which I shall develop because I believe that the Minister should take it into account. It states:

"Gun Wharf is the first property in a wall of private homes built in Wapping, a wall cutting off the local community from the river."

We have here a riparian community which, for as long as I can remember—I have known the area for more than 60 years—has been denied access to the river. That stretch of the north bank has always been used commercially much more than the south bank. They were cut off by docks and, where there were no docks, they were cut off by wharves. There was little access to the river, and the little that was provided was very much welcomed and very much used.

When the docks went downstream and those wharves shut down, there were to be fresh developments, and a corporation was set up to make life rich for the people of the area. One expected that the first piece of enrichment would be that they had access to the river, but they are denied access to the river by what this newspaper rightly calls a "wall" of private housing giving access to the river only to the privileged people who have £200,000 to spend on a riverside property, and cutting off all those 25,000 inhabitants from their access to the river.

In our last debate I was able to refer only briefly to the Shadwell basin development. I was in the time-limited part of the debate, unfortunately. Perhaps I might be forgiven for mentioning it again, because another wall that is being built, in addition to the wall round Gun wharf, is the wall round Shadwell basin.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) spoke with feeling, because he was personally involved in the project, of the desirability of river sports and access to the river for young people. The Shadwell basin project is tremendously exciting, and 2,000 people are taking part in it. To give due credit, Shadwell basin was developed with the help of the docklands development corporation and others, including the borough council, as a water sports area, and 2,000 people use it. It is by far the biggest water recreational exercise and training area in London. People sail there, they canoe, they windsurf and so on.

Now the corporation has proposed a project, which has been fiercely rejected locally, to build high-rise flats—some four storeys high and some five storeys high—round the edge of this project, not only to cut off access to the basin, but to cut off the wind. It stops more than 50 per cent. of the wind getting into the basin, so there will be little sailing and no windsurfing. This terrific project, which is of so much value, giving so much exercise, pleasure and training to 2,000 people, will be destroyed if this vandalistic corporation gets its way.

So much for homes, but what about jobs? The corporation makes great claims about the employment that it has created. I have my criticisms of the corporation, but it is terribly good at one activity. I have never found any institution in my long life so good at pinning medals on its own chest. If the members of the corporation were half as good as they think they are, they would not need to spend nearly £2 million a year on public relations and consultancies. Good wine needs no bush. A man who pins medals on his own chest generally does it because his valuation of himself is a good deal greater than other people's valuation of him.

The claims that the corporation makes of providing employment put in everything but the kitchen sink, and then put in the kitchen sink. The corporation counts in all the jobs in enterprises whose introduction into the area was created by its predecessors, the London Joint Docklands Committee and the council of the London borough of Tower Hamlets. It adds in the employment in the Daily Telegraph in Billingsgate and in News International, but the docklands development corporation did not bring those into docklands. They would be there now regardless of whether the docklands development corporation was set up, but the corporation still counts them and claims credit for them. It claims credit for all other relocations. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South said, many of the jobs that it says it has created are relocated and not created at all.

A few weeks ago the Poplar jobcentre had a youth week. I pay tribute to the staff of that jobcentre. They did a splendid job in getting the local community, employers, schools and everybody else interested in the problems of employment for young people in the area. I talked to careers officers there. They said that the corporation was a dead loss and that nearly all the youth jobs were relocated.

I have received today a reply from the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir George Young), about how many jobs were created and how many were relocated. He probably does not remember his answer at this moment. It is partial and out of date, but despite those two defects it still shows that relocation accounts for a great part of what the corporation claims as creation.

I said just now that if the corporation were half as good as it says it is it would not need to spend so much money saying so. If it were half as good as it says it is at job creation there would not be today, as there is, 30 per cent. unemployment on the Isle of Dogs, its main industrial area. The proof of the pudding is in the starvation in relation to jobs on the Isle of Dogs. That is the real test of the London Docklands development corporation.

The corporation's relations with the local people are appalling. It has the same idea of consultation as a Pittsburg iron master. It decides what it wants to do, then tells people that it is going to do it, and if they kick it is too bad because it can claim to have consulted them simply by virtue of having said something to them. The only consultation it ever does is ex post facto. It only ever discusses the shape of a die after it has been cast, and never before the casting process.

I beg the House to believe that it is no exaggeration to say, as I did a little while ago, that the corporation treats the 50,000 people in the area — including those in Newham and Bermondsey—with something approaching contempt. It gives a certain amount of largesse to social projects in the area, and that is welcome. I, for one, am glad of it, and so are many others, but it would be better if it consulted the people about what objects of largesse they would like to have, instead of deciding that in its cosy little offices. In any event, the giving of a bit of social largesse to the local population does not compensate for the corporation's failure to consult them and to take their wishes into account. It is like a father who spends no time with his children for 364 days of the year and gives them a present on Christmas day. That is not good fatherhood, and it is not good social behaviour for a public corporation whose decisions affect the lives and welfare of 50,000 people.

We have all too little power to call the corporation to account. We have little opportunity even of talking about it in this place. But, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney said, if the amendment is carried the corporation will have to come along a bit sooner than it otherwise would to ask for some money, or the Minister will have to come along to ask for some money on its behalf. Then we can start asking questions about what is being done with the money, in a way that the local people cannot. We could even begin to fulfil our duties as Members of Parliament. Our rights and duties are severely limited by the great autonomy given to the corporation and by its unwillingness to impart information.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South described how he was treated in his search for information, not for his benefit—as he will not get anything out of it — but for the benefit of his constituents, and that showed just how the democratic rights of people, as expressed by their right to make and unmake this House, have been eroded by the corporation, its powers and the way in which it exercises them. I for one do not want glibly to give money whenever it is asked for. If the local authorities had been provided with the money given to the corporation, they would have done all that the corporation has done, and much more, without spending £2 million a year saying what good fellows they are. The corporation should give an account of itself and I am glad of this opportunity to demand some account from it.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): When the Under-Secretary of State replied to the Second Reading debate, he confirmed that one purpose of the clause that allowed the urban development corporations to have more money was to be able to hold this debate. He said:

"The fact that the limits are being increased is not a criticism but is to give the House a regular opportunity to debate the matter."—[Official Report, 20 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 231.]

I welcome and support all the comments that have already been made and now complete the quartet of Opposition Members who are all elected Members of Parliament and who represent between them all the area of the development corporation in London. I sincerely hope that our comments will at least elicit from the Minister tonight an acceptance of the fact that most of those who live in the areas that we represent and that are covered by the corporation are desperately concerned. The corporation set up by the 1980 Act does not have the confidence and trust of the people, and is not properly accountable either through Ministers to the House, or to the people for whose benefit it was set up.

The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) rightly quoted the words by which the corporations were given their mandate. They were given the most simple of mandates. In section 136, they were given as their object the securing of the regeneration of their areas. As the hon. Gentleman said, that was amplified with examples. One of the duties imposed on them was to ensure that housing and social facilities were available to encourage people to live and work in the area. Surely the first obligation must be that those facilities encourage the people already there to live and work in the area.

It is no good encouraging people from outside if the communities already there are driven out. But the whole effect of the corporation's activities has been to bring in people and to ignore the people, communities, traditions, and employment and social characteristics of the areas covered. I am not saying that they have not learnt or that the individuals concerned are malicious or malevolent. I am not saying that the community officers are not trying to listen to, and to communicate the concerns and aspirations of, local people, but they are not achieving that communication.

I shall give some examples that worry our communities. I shall ask Ministers to think again about some of the matters that the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 allows them to think about or to pass on our concerns to those running the docklands corporation. Some of the points have been touched on. We have all been speaking specifically about the London Docklands development corporation because that is the one we are concerned about and about which we know most. The value of land on both sides of the Thames has escalated enormously. The LDDC has vested land which belonged to other public authorities; in every case it has been vested without the consent of those authorities. We accept that the value of such lands is established by the district valuer.

9.15 pm

I shall give the example of the Cherry Garden site by Cherry Garden pier, which is the subject of present discussion. In December, the LDDC chairman told me and other local community representatives that the corporation will insist that that land be sold at a price that will take into account the cost of sharing the river wall, adding in approximately £1·5 million to make the resale value over £2 million, although it was bought for less than £1 million. If the docklands are to be regenerated, expenditure on river banks and walls should not necessarily be passed on as part of the cost to anyone who wishes to develop housing, if it is in the public sector, by a housing association or by a voluntary agency. Yet that is what the corporation is insisting on as an on-sale cost.

Nothing in the Act requires that. Nothing in the Act defines what should be added to the land valuation. Nothing in the legislation passed by the House defines that. The Government should, informally — or, under their powers in the Act, formally—give directions to the LDDC that, if it is to meet the housing needs of the docklands communities, it should do so in a way that does not impose unjustified costs on them.

The problem is that the Government's attitude has always been that development should take place in the private sector because of statistics from the census. In my constituency, for example, council occupation was over 80 per cent. and owner-occupation was only 2·5 per cent. I do not know the statistics in the constituencies of my neighbours. The Government's attitude is illogical. It depends on what people need, want and can afford. The Under-Secretary quoted figures. A few hundred people who were council tenants in Southwark bought the first houses. The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) quoted prices of £300,000. In my constituency, flats which command wonderful riverside views are going for over £225,000. That is the going price of the river view that used to be and should be, as it were, the heritage of those who worked on the river to make the city great. It means that, if the people want to buy under a shared ownership scheme, a form of co-operative occupancy, or housing association development, they cannot have it. There was one one-off scheme. The World of Property Housing Trust, as a special deal, built houses to transfer tenants from downtown estates, but as yet there is no commitment to more.

There is no way we can control the operation of this wretched corporation, because it is out of anybody's control. There are no criteria to define how it should work apart from the generalised provisions in the legislation. We urge the Government to ensure that it must first meet the housing needs of the communities. If the people want to stay and buy, that is fine, but it should be at prices they can afford. The corporation is examining ways of doing that more sensitively under its new chairman than under his precedessor. It is considering giving loans to local people. I hope that these will not have to be paid back, because they would act as a charge on the sale price of the house in the same way as happens on the break-up of a marriage. In reality, a person always has the house for as long as he wants it. If the price is £50,000, £60,000 or £70,000, a small loan will make no material difference. The 1980 Act allows the Government to intervene if they wish. The docklands corporation is also allowed to intervene. We urge that intervention.

There was a boom in the cheap, build-for-sale properties. Houses in the Surrey docks and on the north side of the river went like hot cakes, primarily to local people. However, the second phase of the development involved much more expensive property. The cheaper property was the taster, and now, in places such as Elephant lane in Bermondsey and in Rotherhithe, houses are much more expensive. The figures do not present the case accurately.

I urged my predecessor, the vice-chairman of the corporation and chairman of its housing committee, to do what he could to bring prices down, but I have to come here for action. People of all political parties in my constituency and elected Liberal representatives and those not of my political persuasion believe that the only way that we can make the docklands corporation meet the needs of the people — until we can amend its constitution so that it is more accountable — is to ask that, under section 136(5), the Secretary of State should "contribute such sums as he with the Treasury's concurrence may determine towards expenditure incurred . . . by any local authority or statutory undertakers".

The housing authorities — Southwark council in my area and Newham and Tower Hamlets—have a statutory duty to house local people. The docklands corporation has the power, with the Secretary of State's consent, to use the £600 million which it can borrow to house local people. I refer in particular to young local people and to one of the two riverside estates. Over 1,000 young people have applied for single bedroom accommodation and are on the waiting list of one of the districts concerned.

I urge the Government to think seriously about whether, since they have always smiled benignly on development corporations, money can be set aside to provide local housing at a cost that people can afford.

[Mr. Simon Hughes]

I ask the Minister to invoke two other provisions in the 1980 Act. The Secretary of State can require the development corporation to exercise powers to ensure that its primary duty is to retain employment and to facilitate the housing of existing communities. I also ask the Secretary of State to take another step which has not yet been taken. We have asked the LDDC to provide housing for local people. It argues that it is not a housing authority. It says that it can spend money on environmental improvements but not on an estate such as the Swan road estate.

Hon. Members may have visited the Mayflower pub, near the site from which the pilgrim fathers' ship went to America. That site cannot be refurbished with money from the LDDC because the LDDC is not a housing authority. The most that it can do is renovate the outside. That is no consolation to people with flats which need to be repaired inside. A building which looks beautiful across the river is no consolation to the resident of a substandard property. I ask the Minister at least to undertake that he will consider, with his colleagues, invoking the powers in that Act to allow the LDDC to become a housing authority.

One other aspect has been mentioned by colleagues from the dockland boroughs. The lack of accountability has some appalling implications. An architectural competition was held for the development of Cherry Garden pier site. The contract was awarded to the developers who came third in the competition, in which there was a joint second prize and no first prize. There is an enormous protest. The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar said that a wall is to be erected on his side of the river. Under the Cherry Garden development, we were to have seven seven-storey blocks of flats where there is now space and a view of and access to the river.

So far only one significant concession has been made, as a result of a request for recommendation by Lovell Farrow, the developers. Of course, the LDDC is its own development control authority. It asks itself for permission. If it is not happy, it can advise itself on how to ask for planning permission. Then permission is granted and the development goes ahead. The only concession is that there will be one fewer block of flats. There will be less crowding on the site. However, the nature of the development will be substantially the same. Not only is it dishonest to hold an architectural competition and give the contract to the winners of the third prize, but only the third prize winners have had a chance of submitting another planning application.

Assurances were given to elected members of the local community that no further steps would be taken until there was further consultation, but we have discovered that an application for another site has been submitted and planning permission has meanwhile been given. That has happened despite a request by me and others that we be given notice of planning applications. I made that specific request and received a letter saying that I would get notice of planning applications, but I have heard no more. The hon. Member for Newham, South and the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and, I have no doubt, the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar have the same problems. We are not being told what is going on. If elected representatives, whether borough councillors, Greater London councillors or hon. Members, are not being told, what accountability is there?

The situation is highly unsatisfactory. The intention to regenerate those communities is not being fulfilled. Jobs are not being created — the new jobs are mainly relocated jobs. The net result so far, some three years into the development corporation's life, is that it has not stemmed in any way the drift away from central London of families and communities. In my constituency, 20 per cent. of those people moved out of inner London in the 10 years before the LDDC was set up. That trend has not changed. People still are not able to stay; their needs are not being met and communities are being broken up. If what the Financial Times called the greatest piece of real estate left in Europe cannot have a better destiny with more imagination and humanity than that, it is a sad lot and a sad day.

It is not yet too late, but it will soon be too late. The speculator and the investor will have moved in and the jobs and the people will have gone. The old communities will not be regenerated. In part, there may be a different community, but the form of change is not something that any accountable and democratic group of people can permit without severe protest. Whatever good intentions the Government may have had, the expectations have not been fulfilled. They must sit down with the LDDC and all hon. Members who have spoken in the debate and think about the strategy. I say, I believe on behalf of all of us, that we would be happy to enter into a regular and more accountable dialogue to make sure that the people whom we represent in the part of London whose heritage we fight for get a good deal and not the poor and ever-worsening deal that they have got over the past few years.

9.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): The amendment, moved rather unusually from the Back Benches by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), has provided a useful opportunity for a wide-ranging debate about the LDDC, although the clause also relates to the Merseyside development corporation. I cannot help noting a paradox in that the bulk of the Bill is about new towns, and there the thrust of the Opposition's criticism is that we are winding up too quickly those publicly created bodies accountable to Ministers. They say that we should have more new towns and allow the existing ones to continue for even longer.

When we come to the UDCs, which are, in effect, new town corporations in the inner cities, the criticism is the reverse—we should not have set up those bodies and we should not continue their operations. Opposition Members have an inconsistent approach to those two matters.

The second paradox is that we are always being asked by Opposition Members to spend more public money; to invest in the infrastructure, and to do something about the inner cities. Clause 12 does that. We are increasing the financial limit available to the urban development corporations. To have listened for the past one and a half hours to the debate, which has been unmitigated criticism of the Government, one would not think that that is what the LDDC is doing. It is investing in the infrastructure of a decaying part of the city; it is reversing decades of decline; it is creating jobs and homes; and it is succeeding where the local authorities' conventional structure has completely failed.

Despite what Opposition Members have said, we do not intend to arrest or reverse the excellent progress that has been made by the LDDC. They say that they speak on behalf of their electors, and I am sure that they do, but the former Member for Bermondsey, Mr. Bob Mellish, takes a view that is diametrically opposed to that of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) when it comes to the way that we should tackle the problem in docklands. It is not for me to adjudicate upon which of them speaks the truth. It shows that there is an element of doubt as to whether the view put forward by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey is the only view.

I have spent a great deal of time in docklands and have talked to the people who live and work there. The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney said that there was a strong feeling of resentment there. That view is changing. If one talks to the people in the boroughs involved, one finds that their initial view of complete hostility is now being tempered as they see what is happening. They are shopping at the Asda store that has been built at the Isle of Dogs. Some of them have jobs in the firms that have been set up. I detect a shift in public opinion in the boroughs involved as a result of the excellent progress that has been made by the LDDC.

I shall pick up some of the points that have been made. I take seriously some of the criticisms. First, there was one about housing made by the right hon. Gentleman, which was picked up by his hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo), that the new housing was not available to those who live in the area. At Nelson's reach five phases of new housing have been released for sale since July 1983. Each time people have queued overnight. More than 90 per cent. of the 118 homes have been sold to or reserved by local people, and at Mayflower court, a competition-winning scheme by the riverside, the pressure was so great that the developers decided to release the whole scheme within days. Of the 76 homes, I understand that 18 have been reserved by council tenants. The picture is not as dramatically one-sided as was put forward by the two speakers.

If one studies the structure of housing in Southwark, Tower Hamlets and Newham, one sees that there is a dramatic imbalance. It is far too heavily weighted against owner-occupation. There is a preponderance of publicly owned stock there. In 1981, only 5·3 per cent. of the houses in docklands were in owner-occupation. The figure is now 12 per cent., and the target is 30 per cent. That represents a shift in the right direction. It would be wrong for there to be further investment in public sector stock in that area. We are moving towards a much fairer balance which will encourage people to live and work in the area.

On unemployment there was a debate as to whether the jobs created in the area—some 4,129—were new jobs or relocated jobs. The economy in London is very mobile. Docklands has not been getting any jobs—either new or relocated ones. As a result of the enterprise zone firms are setting up in the Isle of Dogs, where they were not setting up before. I should have thought that that ought to be welcomed by those who represent the area.

As for Inter-Action, I shall write to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). The LDDC has contacted my Department for a decision, but a decision has not yet been made. I shall write to the hon. Member about the advertisement that he mentioned.

As for voluntary organisations, again one would not have thought, from listening to the debate, that the LDDC actually spends £750,000 each year on these organisations and that the Government have recently increased the maximum that it can spend. I have a long list of organisations in Newham which receive funding from the LDDC. For example, the Beckton park residents' association receives £1,500 and the docklands canal boat trust receives £5,000. So it is not the case that the LDDC is not doing what it can to help voluntary movements in the area.

Mr. Spearing: I think the Minister will agree that I did not say that it is not doing so. I said that the LDDC is not taking account of certain matters. In order to put the record straight, I do not believe that I quoted an advertisement in respect of Inter-Action. It was in relation to the boat show. The quotation related to a programme sheet which purported to show that Inter-Action is already committed to programmes in the docklands area. No permission has yet been given and no moneys have yet been voted.

Sir George Young: I believe that that is the correct understanding. The corporation has submitted a project application to my Department, but we have not yet taken a decision on it.

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney asked me about the STOLport. As I believe he knows, the reopening of the inquiry is a matter for litigation, but the Government will take whatever steps are necessary in the light of court proceedings.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to houses in Wapping about which he has spoken in the House on previous occasions. The corporation is pledged to ensuring that a substantial proportion of the housing schemes on its land is within the means of people earning average London incomes. On the other hand, the corporation has to ensure that it does not set house prices so artificially low that those who buy them can make a windfall profit by selling them on at their true market price. The corporation has introduced shared ownership schemes in order to bring housing within the reach of people on average incomes, but at the same time has tried to ensure that they do not sell them at artificially low prices.

Mr. John Fraser: What will be the final proportion of houses to let in shared ownership schemes on the one hand and houses for sale — figures amounting to up to £330,000—on the other?

Sir George Young: As I said a few moments ago, the objective of the LDDC is to ensure that roughly 30 per cent. of the homes in docklands are owner-occupied, as against about 5 per cent. when it started. Even 30 per cent. would be under half what it is for the country as a whole. Therefore, I cannot accept the criticism that it will move to a position where owner-occupation is at too high level. The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney welcomed the light transit railway system. I wonder whether we should have had that system had it not been for the LDDC. I wonder whether Tower Hamlets, for example, and the other boroughs through which it runs would have found the money to go ahead with the railway. The GLC had the resources, had it so wished, to go ahead with the light transit railway system but it did not do so. The LDDC is putting up half the money for that system. London Regional Transport is finding the other half. I wonder whether that scheme would have gone ahead had it not been for the establishment of a single-minded development corporation such as the LDDC with a commitment to the area, which has taken the decision to go ahead.

Mr. Mikardo: May I make two points to show that what the Minister is saying is nonsense. First, the main initiative came not from the London Docklands development corporation but from London Transport. Secondly, the proposal was put forward by the docklands joint committee before the LDDC was formed. If it had had the money that the LDDC has received it would have done the job.

Sir George Young: The argument for a body such as the GLC is that it can take strategic decisions on projects that would take a relatively small proportion of its budget. The GLC did not do that; half the money came from London Transport and half from the LDDC. My view is that we would not have got the project without a body such as the LDDC.

Mr. Mikardo: That is not my view.

Sir George Young: We shall have to agree to disagree.

Much of the argument has been about accountability and answerability. The criticisms of Labour Members have been the same as those that I hear from my hon. Friends about the new towns—that they are appointed by Ministers, that they do not have to answer questions, and so on. If one sets up organisations such as the LDDC or the new towns, it is inevitable that there will not be the same accountability as there is with a local authority. Against that, the local authorities could not have coped with the new towns development and did not and could not have coped with the problems in docklands. One has to accept the downside — less accountability and answerability—for the upside, which is the progress that has been made in docklands and the revitalisation of the area.

Hon. Members did not speak to the amendment, which would reduce to £550 million the financial limit at which a further debate in the House would be necessary. The arrangements in the Bill are in line with previous arrangements for the new towns and the LDDC. It is reasonable to calculate the limits so that such debates occur, on average, every two or three years.

The limits were originally set in 1980 and we have had one debate on the order to increase the limit. We are now debating the primary legislation, which will increase the limit and renew the power to increase the limit. That will give rise, on present plans, to another debate in about three years. That is reasonable and I see no reason to advise the House to accept the amendment.

If I have not answered matters raised in the debate, I shall write to the hon. Members concerned.

Amendment negatived.

9.42 pm

Mr. Gow: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill provides for the completion of the winding up of the new towns programme in England and Wales. It changes the purposes for which the Commission for the New Towns exists. While retaining its task of making the best use of the property transferred to it, the commission is given the new primary function of disposing of that property as soon as it considers it expedient to do so. The Bill also provides for the winding up of the commission when its purposes have been substantially achieved.

Some features of the Bill contain nothing novel. The Labour Government wound up new town development corporations when their tasks were done. They set target dates for the winding up of others, and some of the dates set by the Labour Government when they were in power were earlier than those to which we are working.

Since 1979, we have continued the task of bringing the new towns to completion. Four development corporations —for Harlow, Stevenage, Corby and Bracknell—have been wound up and, as the House knows, five more—for Northampton, Redditch, Skelmersdale, Basildon and Central Lancashire—are planned to be wound up this year. I will announce shortly a final decision about the north-east new towns, two of whose distinguished representatives are present on the Opposition Benches.

The Bill enables us to build on what has been achieved and to take the process through to completion. The Commission for the New Towns has done, and is doing, an outstanding job, both in its general task of disengagement and, as we have seen at Corby, in its role of promoting a town that faced special difficulties. I wish to pay special tribute to the work of the chairman of the commission, Sir Neil Shields.

The Bill gives the commission a remit for completing all its tasks, both in the towns that it currently manages and in those where it has yet to assume responsibility. It also puts the remaining development corporations on a sound financial footing. There will be no forced sales of assets, nor any sales contrary to the best professional advice. The decision made by the Under-Secretary in the case of Redditch is proof positive of that. Our aim is an orderly and responsible disengagement at a pace consistent with the market, to the magic of which I again pay tribute.

Once the commission has completed its tasks, there is no reason why it should remain in existence, so the Bill provides for it to be wound up when that stage is reached. For the reasons that I have just given it would be wrong to put any fixed time limit on that event, but I can assure the House that we will progress as quickly as we can, with responsibility, towards that goal.

The Bill also allows the two UDCs to press on with their task of revitalising their areas after years of delay and neglect. The neglect that there had been in the areas where the two development corporations are now in operation is a massive condemnation of years of Socialism in those areas. The Government are building on the well-tried approach of a development corporation. Our approach is sensible, practical and consistent—precisely what one might expect from Her Majesty's present Ministers. The two UDCs have already made substantial progress in tackling the problems, in co-operation with the private sector. The Bill enables further progress to be made.

The Bill provides a sound basis for the completion of the new town programme and the further important work of the development corporation, and—at the earliest sensible moment—the dissolution of the commission. I commend this enlightened Bill to the House.

9.48 pm

Mr. Harry Cowans (Tyne Bridge): I do not think that I have heard a more modest speech in all my years in the House. In reality, the Minister is in danger of becoming black and blue all over from throwing bouquets at himself. I seem to have heard the phrase about a hundred times. It is indeed a magic market place that cannot find work for 4 million people. The word "magic" can just mean a trick. Sometimes the trick requires help. A volunteer joins the magician on stage and the magician makes one of his possessions—not one of the magician's—disappear. That picture sums up the meaning of the phrase

"the magic of the market"

"the magic of the market".

I am a super-optimist. I had hoped that in Committee we would make some progress and bring about some alterations to the Bill, but it was apparent from the beginning that there were substantial differences between the two sides, and that is even more apparent now. I have heard nothing tonight to change my opinion. I agree with the Minister that when the new towns were set up the intention was that they would be wound up when they had completed their tasks. However, one of the fundamental distinctions between the Government and the Opposition is over the stage at which the new towns can be considered to have completed their task.

I want to tell the Minister about a situation of which I have just been informed. Had I known about it when the Bill was in Committee, I should have told him about it then.

I apologise to whoever is the hon. Member responsible for Hemel Hempstead. I understand that the hon. Member is a Conservative. Hemel Hempstead used to be a constituency in its own right. I have tried to find out where it is now and whose constituency it is in, and I have singularly failed. I apologise to the hon. Member concerned. Had I been able to establish who represents Hemel Hempstead, I should have informed the hon. Member that I intended to refer to it.

I return to the business of having completed a task. I quote:

"When the Hemel Hempstead new town was planned, a brand new hospital was promised and 24 acres of land purchased by the Development Corporation to pass to the Health Authorities when they were ready to build."

Hemel Hempstead new town was taken into the commission in 1962. Presumably it was thought that the new organisation would continue what the new town had started. Part of the hospital was completed, but now money to complete the hospital and to buy the land on which to build it is not available because the Department of the Environment insists on the full current commercial price. I suggest that the new town had not completed its task, because the hospital had not been completed. If the new town had not been wound up, the problem would not have arisen. That is just one example.

Labour Members of the Committee can congratulate themselves on their religiously latching on to the argument about new towns' close co-operation with local authorities. We argued the case of the company town. I am grateful to Councillor Walter Stranz of Redditch, who has written about the proposed sale of assets by Redditch development corporation. He said that was the news that it would not become a company town.

"the best start to the New Year we could have had"

I pay credit to the Minister. My problem is that he is administering just what Labour members of the Committee advocated. The only difference between us is that we want such action to be written into the Bill. The Minister would not allow that. With regard to Redditch, he has, for the time being, stopped it from falling into the trap of becoming a company town. However, I have one or two quarrels with the Minister. It is not too late to put these matters right.

An article of 28 December said:

"The Minister, who is responsible for new towns, said the bids had been carefully examined but it was felt that they were not acceptable."

That is our point. Nobody tells us why they are not acceptable. We cannot challenge the Minister on the Floor of the House. We wanted such provision written into the Bill but did not get it, and yet the Minister is doing exactly what we want. I applaud that, but the sting is in the tail. Mr. Norman More, the director of Redditch development corporation, has said that he is not happy with the Minister's views and will be back in the new year, presumably to try to change his views. That, too, will not come before the House.

There would have been no problem if what we had asked had been written into the Bill. If the Minister is doing what we ask, there can be no harm in writing such actions into the Bill. It is not too late. The Minister obviously believes that this is the right approach, so why will he not write such action into the Bill? He might not be here next time. Someone quite different might adopt a completely different attitude.

It is not too late to do this in order to safeguard the situation—[Interruption.] If at this stage the Minister wants to say that he will do it in another place, I shall be delighted to give way to him. There seems to be some frivolity about this, but if that leads to an amendment in another place, I shall laugh with everyone else. However, there is no forward movement to the Dispatch Box to suggest that it was anything other than frivolity. It is not frivolous for those outside this House.

Another fundamental difference in Committee related to the powers in the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) referred to this in the context of urban development and said that it was muddled thinking. I have news for him—it is all muddled thinking. There are many double standards.

The Minister has rightly written into the Bill provisions to prevent the Commission for the New Towns from doing certain things, but he has inserted another clause which allows him to do so under special powers. That is a nonsense in any terms.

We warned about the number of occasions when the powers of the House and of Members of Parliament are taken away and left purely in the hands of the Secretary of State. I again warn that such powers are available to any Secretary of State, not just to the present holder of that position. Again, it is not too late to alter this provision. It means that the Secretary of State will become the sole arbitrator of practically everything in the Bill. Whether or not the new towns have completed their task, he will become the sole judge, jury and executioner.

The Minister mentioned in passing the position of Washington, Newton Aycliffe and Peterlee. He did it so quickly that one of my hon. Friends dashed to the Opposition Front Bench to check whether he had mentioned it. I assured him that the Minister said "north-east", after which his remarks became clouded. We are, however, grateful for the fact that these new towns still exist. They are vital, and even this Government are beginning to realise that, but it must be apparent to the Minister that without some decision on their future, all those who live and work in those areas must do so from day to day.

On a number of occasions my hon. Friends the Members for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes), for Easington (Mr. Dormand) and for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) have received promises that some kind of decision would be forthcoming, but the Government have not said in which year that promise would be kept. If the Secretary of State were now to say that these new towns will continue for the next 10 years we would be grateful, but some decision is necessary, and he should realise that the continuation of these new towns is vital to the areas affected. So far we have had promises, and it would be nice if we had a final—we hope, positive—decision.

Both in Committee and on Second Reading great concern was registered about the job creation functions of the new towns. They are vital. Although the Minister may think that a new town has fulfilled its function, for example, towards housing and building, there are classical cases where he could not take that view about its present job creation function. That is particularly relevant to Washington, Newton Aycliffe and Peterlee. Obviously other new towns will be in the same position.

In Committee the Minister kindly provided me with a letter which he had promised me. He honoured that promise.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the New Towns and Urban Development Corporations Bill and the Mineral Workings Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Neubert.]

New Towns and Urban Development Corporations Bill

Question again proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Mr. Cowans: That gave me quite a shock. I forgot that it was 10 o'clock. In his letter, the Minister said of job creation functions:

"There is no reason why a completed new town should be treated differently to other towns."

With the greatest respect, that was the very reason for setting up the development corporations in the first place. The fact that they were given job creation functions flies in the face of what the Minister said. A town may be completed in a physical sense, but the work of the development corporation on economic matters may be far from finished, especially in the areas that I have mentioned.

It is easy to consider such matters in isolation, but we cannot do that for this legislation. The job creation function is vital because unemployment is a black spot. We must remember that when considering the large amount of finance that has been taken from those areas under the Government's regional aid policy. The budget of one of the development corporations for job creation in my area is about £7 million this year. If one assumes that the other two budgets are approximately the same, we are considering a figure of about £20 million, which is coming from areas such as Washington, Newton Aycliffe and Peterlee. That could have disastrous effects. I hope that the Minister will bear those facts and figures in mind when he comes to make a decision.

The Bill is ill-conceived, it places far too many decisions solely in the hands of the Secretary of State, and it moves undemocratic bodies, such as development corporations, even further from the people, because, when they are wound up, people must go to the commission, which is miles from them. I plead with the Government, even at this late stage, to take the legislation back to the drawing board, make a serious and considered re-examination of it and return with more realistic legislation which takes less power from Members of Parliament and takes account of the existence of areas of high unemployment, although other parts of new towns are completed.

Even now I hope that if the legislation goes to another place it will be altered to be more reasonable and more constructive. I could not support it on Second Reading, and nothing that I have heard or seen since has changed my mind.

10.4 pm

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): In May 1984, the Department of the Environment issued a discussion document entitled, "Review of the Target Wind-Up Dates for New Towns Development Corporations in the North-East of England." As part of the consultation process, the Government asked local authorities to consider whether the English Industrial Estates Corporation should take over the job promotion element of the new town development corporations.

I shall use as my example Washington new town. My hon. Friend the Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand) will deal with Peterlee. Washington development corporation has been established for more than 20 years. During that time, the industrial promotion element has been vital to the people of the north-east, but no more vital than it is at present, when we are suffering high unemployment and a rapid loss of jobs, especially in our basic industries. Washington new town is part of the borough of Sunderland, where about one in three males is unemployed. The most tragic illustration of the problem is that 2,675 school leavers are unemployed while only 29 jobs are on offer at the careers office. If we add the number of youngsters on youth training schemes who will soon be looking for permanent jobs, we can see the magnitude of the economic problems of the north-east.

We need a job-creating agency that is not only experienced but part of the area in which the economic crisis is occurring.

It is interesting to note that the Department of the Environment agreed to meet a delegation from each of the three north-eastern new towns. The delegation included representatives of the local authorities and the development corporations, and Members of Parliament. It represented three different locations, different political parties, and different interest groups. Yet the Ministers who were present, including the Secretary of State, must have been impressed by the logic of the case presented and by the fact that there was no dissension from the main argument that the job-promoting aspect of the new towns must stay with the development corporations for at least another five years before the Government carry out another review.

To obtain such unity, all the representatives of the delegation must have been, and were, convinced that the retention of the development corporations would benefit not only the new towns but the entire region. Even the Department of the Environment paid tribute in its discussion document to the work of the corporations. Paragraph 11 states:

"The development corporations have achieved a considerable success at promoting industrial growth in their areas, even in adverse economic circumstances."

A powerful case was made in a leader in The Times on Christmas eve for the retention of the job-creating function of the new town corporations——

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is this relevant on Third Reading?

Mr. Speaker: It is a fairly wide debate on Third Reading, and I believe that it is relevent.

Mr. Boyes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Times stated:

"The corporations of the New Towns of the North East form a component of regional aid, seeking employment for and promoting Aycliffe, Washington and Peterlee."

We agree that the corporations are vital components in the life of the area.

May I briefly illustrate why I believe that the job-creating function of Washington corporation should continue? When it was established in 1964, there were about 6,000 jobs in the area covered by the new town. Nearly all those jobs have now disappeared, especially with the tragic closure of Cape Insulation just before Christmas. By September 1984, 20,000 new jobs had been generated in the town. These did not only come from the immediate area. Much has been said about the capture of Nissan for Washington, but I remind hon. Members that in Washington——

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is this really in order at this stage of the Bill?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Lady must not challenge my earlier ruling.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: This is a different point.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady knows that in a Third Reading debate it is perfectly legitimate to debate what is in the Bill. I think that that is what the hon. Gentleman is doing.

Mr. Boyes: I am grateful, Mr. Speaker.

A number of factories have already come from other countries to Washington because their companies recognise the expertise of the workers, and much more perhaps than some other people in Britain they recognise that the north-east is a super place in which to live and work and provides a good environment in which to establish new factories. Philips has arrived from Einhoven, Danavox has come from Denmark, Littelfuse has come from Austin, Texas, Cooper Tools has come from Houston, Canadian General Electric has come from Quebec, NEK has come from Norway, Nike has come from Oregon, and Rayovac has come from Wisconsin in the United States.

Of the many new companies that have established factories in Washington, 325 have been attracted by the job-creating agency, the Washington development corporation. I am informed by the corporation that there are 166 current live inquiries. Given such an achievement amid the difficulties in the north-east, and with 166 live inquiries on the table at the moment, is this an appropriate time for the corporation to be wound up? Would not it be a tragedy if some of those 166 companies were lost because the delicate negotiations taking place broke down following an announcement that the corporation was to be wound up in a few months and another, totally different organisation — I do not criticise English Industrial Estates, but it is a different organisation—would have to start many of the delicate negotiations again?

I have appealed to the Minister a number of times to consider what the decision is doing to the staff. The staff working for the development corporations are loyal, hard-working people who cannot possibly know what is to happen to them. We have been continually told that the decision would be made in the near future. When we met in July it was expected that the decision would be made at least by October, and we always had a closing date of 31 December because that was when notices had to be given to the staff, with a closure date of 31 December 1985.

We have not yet had an announcement, and I can tell the Minister that morale amongst the staff of the new town development corporations is decreasing all the time. The absence of an announcement is having a catastrophic and depressing effect. The people there are working and existing on rumours. As might be expected at such a time, a number of rumours about the future are flying round the corporations, but no one will give an exact date on which an announcement will be made.

At present, a Standing Committee is considering a Bill proposing the abolition, among others, of the Tyne and Wear county council. I can assure the Minister that that council's employees are taking careful note of the way that the staff of the new town corporations are being treated.

I have two simple questions to put to the Minister. I should like to know what is causing the hold-up. I hope that it is not just a matter of saving a few pounds because one organisation is a bit cheaper than another. People's lives and jobs cannot be measured in those terms. It may be a few pounds cheaper to run English Industrial Estates compared with the development corporation, but the long-term effects must be considered.

The Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher), who is described in a Scottish Office press release as Scotland's industry Minister, said:

"It remains the Government's view that the new towns should continue to maintain their important contribution to industrial growth and increased employment opportunities and that none of the development corporations should be wound up before the end of the 1980s."

I am pleased that he said that about the development corporations in Scotland, but I wish that the Minister would make the same announcement about the development corporations in the north-east of England.

10.15 pm

Mr. Jack Dormand (Easington): I shall be brief indeed in dealing with three points which arise from the Bill. The Under-Secretary of State is probably aware that I have spoken in every debate on the new towns since I came into the House. Therefore, he knows my views well and I shall not repeat them.

[Mr. Jack Dormand]

My first point arises from a genuine desire for knowledge. What is to be done about possible direct payment to owner-occupiers in new towns—this is dealt with in the Bill — where faults have been found in properties after purchase and after what can be called a reasonable survey of the property? I mentioned that on Second Reading and the Minister has written to me with his usual thoroughness. He sent me a two-page letter but, in all fairness, I must tell him that I have been studying it for most of the day and I cannot understand it. That is untypical of the Minister.

I thought that I had better raise the matter again today. Perhaps the Minister will write me another two-page letter, or possibly even a three-page letter. I say that in all seriousness, because there are people in the new town in my constituency who feel sufficiently strongly to form an organisation. I am trying to help and advise those people. Frankly, I have not had a satisfactory answer. My hon. Friends raised the matter in Committee and the Minister for Housing and Construction did give a reply, but I must say, in all fairness and seriousness, that I was not satisfied with that. I was not a member of the Committee, as the Minister is aware.

There is a lot of feeling about that matter in the new towns, because many people are affected. Will the Government consider issuing a circular to local authorities spelling out clearly the position. If that is done, perhaps he will send me a copy.

Another important matter was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans). He referred to the possibility of land being retained or sold where it is intended to have a hospital. I have exactly that position in my constituency. I have been endeavouring for well over a decade to have a community hospital provided for Peterlee. Last week the Durham health authority issued its strategic plan for the decade 1985 to 1995, and I find that there is a possibility of that happening towards the end of the decade. My goodness, that is another 10 years. Therefore, we are talking about 20 or 25 years. However, that is not my main point.

I should like an assurance from Ministers tonight that there will be no pressure from the Government on Peterlee development corporation to dispose of the land which it has held, much to its credit, because it knows the overwhelming need for a hospital for the area, not just for the new town. I may be doing the Government an injustice, but I should like an assurance that there will be no pressure from them on Peterlee development corporation, or any other corporation, as a matter of principle, to dispose of land. That is a matter for local people and local authorities.

Finally, I underline everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) has just said. I have said it many times, but I shall say it again, because there is a new factor. There is an absolute need to retain the development corporations in the north-east —that includes the one in Peterlee—because of their work as job-finding agencies. The record speaks for itself. It is known, and I need not repeat it.

I have said that there is a new factor, and that is that there are 12,000 miners working in my constituency, and the Government are proposing to close pits. That will lead to the utter devastation of the mining communities about which Opposition Members and the NUM have been talking. In my constituency, the only other job-finding agency is the Peterlee development corporation.

It is foolish in the extreme—I have used stronger words before in the House — for the Government to consider, particularly now, abolishing the corporation on the last day of this year. The record has been proved over and over again and is a repetition of what is happening in Washington and Aycliffe. I know the staff of the development corporation well. They are dedicated people. Men and women in their 30s and 40s, and at a critical time in their careers, are wondering what on earth will happen to them.

We are talking about perhaps another five years. The unemployment problem in the north-east will not be solved in another five years, so we are making a very restrained and moderate appeal. About two months ago the Under-Secretary of State first promised me a decision. It is also on the record in Hansard that a second promise was made that a decision would be reached before the Christmas recess. As has been said, the Minister then rather rushed it, and I think that I have his assurance on that point. But the decision has been put back again. That puts us in something of a dilemma. As Ministers have taken so long, they are becoming wiser all the time. I put it to them that it is such an important matter that they should take another five years to consider it, and then perhaps we can have a decision.

In present circumstances—I have to put it bluntly, although I have been trying to be neutral—abolition would be pure doctrinaire Toryism. I know that the two Ministers involved are far too intelligent and sensible to do that.

Sir George Young: The hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans) urged the Government at this late stage to think again. But, with respect, he produced no compelling new arguments to persuade the Government to alter their view. I should point out that the House gave the Bill a Second Reading with a majority of 135, and at that stage we made our views quite plain and said why we felt that it was the right Bill for the new towns. Nothing has happened to alter that perception.

However, I shall deal briefly with the point that has been raised about the new towns in the north-east. The hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand) said that I promised to do something. Ministers give promises very reluctantly, and I see from Hansard that I said:

> "I hope to announce a decision before the House rises for the Christmas recess." — [Official Report, 20 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 234.]

I regret that it was not possible to fulfil that hope.

It has been alleged that our consultations last year were a formality to rubber stamp our views. On Second Reading, the hon. Member for Easington said that we had a doctrinaire approach. But I think that Opposition Members will agree that we have not been doctrinaire. Clearly, the decision is difficult, but we want to take it as soon as possible. However, it is worth waiting a little in order to get the right decision.

It is worth pointing out that the Labour Government proposed to wind up Washington development corporation on 31 December 1982. That puts into perspective some of the criticisms about our action in not renewing it from 1985. Nevertheless, I realise the impact on morale as well as the good work that has been done. We are quite clear that a firm decision is required. We must either confirm the target date as 31 December 1985 or replace it with a later date which is not subject to review. The corporation and its staff have been hanging in the balance for long enough. We must not prolong that period. But proper consideration of the issues and the alternatives available has taken longer than any Ministers in the Department would wish. We shall issue a decision on the future of these towns as soon as we have reached the right conclusion. I give the House that assurance. In the meantime I can only ask hon. Members who have spoken to be patient and we shall come back to the House the moment we have some news.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time and passed.

Mineral Workings Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 5

FINANCE FOR FORESTRY

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 3, line 32, leave out from 'purposes)' to end of line 34 and insert—

'where the rate of the payments is one determined by the Commissioners after consultation with the British Steel Corporation and the Ironstone Royalty Owners' Association.'.

I have introduced this amendment, in acknowledgment of the representations made to me in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), that the Ironstone Royalty Owners' Association, as well as the British Steel Corporation, should have a statutory right to be consulted about the rate of the special afforestation grant, because the association represents the landowners to whom the grant will be paid. The association, as I made clear on Second Reading and in Committee, has already been given an informal undertaking that it will be involved in the consultation, and I am happy to seek to formalise its position by means of this amendment.

My hon. Friend also sought to have enshrined in the legislation a requirement that the rate of the special grant should be subject to an annual review. I warned him that this might present technical difficulties, and I am afraid they have proved insuperable. I hope my hon. Friend will be content to accept the assurance which I now give that, notwithstanding the absence of a statutory provision in the Bill, the rate at which the special afforestation grant is paid between 1 April 1985 and 31 March 1990 will be subject to an annual review.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 2

THE IRONSTONE DISTRICT

Mr. Macfarlane: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 10, line 33, at end insert—

'1974 c.7	Local Government Act 1974.	In Schedule 6, paragraph 9.'.

Mr. Speaker: With this amendment it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 3 and 4.

Mr. Macfarlane: These are technical amendments to tidy up the list of repeals in schedule 2.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 3, in page 10, leave out lines 34 and 35.

No. 4, in page 10, line 38, at end insert—

'1981 c.65.	Trustee Savings Banks Act 1981	In Schedule 7, in paragraph 12 the reference to paragraph 1 of Schedule 5 to the Trustee Savings Banks Act 1976.'. — [Mr. Macfarlane]

Motion made and Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 56 (Third Reading), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Thursday 10th January, Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the Motion in the name of the Prime Minister relating to European Community Fisheries Arrangements for 1985 with the substitution of One o'clock or three hours after it has been entered upon, whichever is the later, for the provisions in paragraph (1)(b) of the Standing order.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

Maternity Units

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

10.27 pm

Sir John Farr (Harborough): The purpose of my debate is to raise the subject of the small peripheral maternity units in some of the smaller hospitals in Britain. Very often in our major debates on the Health Service in England and Wales the smaller unit, which often gives better value to the public than the larger, more impersonal unit, is overlooked. I am compelled to raise this matter with my hon. Friend because I am concerned about what is proposed for Market Harborough general hospital maternity unit, which has 11 beds.

The value of this unit is recognised not only by the more than 5,000 people who have signed a petition to save it but by Leicester area health authority, which in February 1984 produced an admirable document entitled "Strategic Intentions 1984 to 1994".

In this the authority saw the need to keep until 1994 the 11 maternity beds in Market Harborough. The document was entitled, "For consultation". Naturally, this met with total local support. Therefore, it was with considerable dismay and surprise that I learnt that a further document had been produced by Leicester health authority in October 1984, this time called and described as a "draft for consultation". The proposal is to reduce by almost half the maternity provision for Market Harborough—from 11 beds to six. Eleven beds provide a professional unit; six provide emergency treatment only.

The House might ask what happened between February and October to change the area health authority's proposals. Was it a sudden surge of public opinion expressing itself instinctively, to which the health authority reacted? As the representative of Market Harborough and the surrounding villages, I assure the House that that was not what happened. Between February and October last year one of the most remarkable expressions of public opinion that I have known took place. Out of about 15,000 persons in the general hospital's catchment area, over 5,000 signed the SOBBs petition — that is the petition to "Save Our Babies Beds". I was overwhelmed by letters protesting about the rundown of beds. Between March and October I received only one letter in favour of the rundown. It was from the community health council.

The Leicestershire community health council does an excellent job, but in this case it is out of touch. For example, it has recently conducted a mass canvas of local people about organ donors. The Minister is a pioneer in this respect. He may recall my modest endeavour when I introduced a Bill designed to secure the anonimity of organ donors.

As my hon. Friend knows, the supply of organs is insufficient. The community health council has an excellent public consultation scheme. Nearly 3,000 people have been approached to find out what they think of the organ donor scheme and how it can be improved. The results, which have been sent to the Minister's office, show that the majority do not want a change in the scheme.

I have told the secretary of the Leicestershire community health council, Brian Marshall, that I support what he is doing to promote the availability of organs but that the council should conduct the same public relations exercise for the Market Harborough maternity unit.

The community health council is the only supporter of the area health authority's sudden change of view. Public opinion did not cause the sudden change by the health authority. What did change it? In 1982 I was concerned about possible threats to the future of that highly successful unit. I wrote to the excellent lady chairman of Leicestershire health authority in May 1982, and Mrs. Margaret Galsworthy replied on 24 May 1982 to the effect that the authority had no plans for any closure of maternity beds in Market Harborough hospital, so far as could be foreseen.

The House will be interested to know that in the Leicester area alone it is the intention to slash the peripheral general practitioner maternity bed provision from 94 beds at the moment to 37 in 1994, a reduction of over 60 per cent. The figures include a reduction from 11 to six in Market Harborough.

I am convinced that behind the change of heart by the Leicester health authority is pressure from Trent region to centralise births. It has declined to provide new replacement GP units in the Trent region and is apparently determined to extinguish the peripheral GP maternity units altogether. In a recent leaflet it gives that as the policy of what it called its regional medical committee and backs that up by saying that it means a lower mortality rate for babies. The House accepts that priority must be given to securing the lowest possible mortality rate of babies. It is a most important factor; in fact, it is the most important factor that can be taken into consideration.

Trent region goes on to say that in the region in 1970, for instance, there were 23 baby deaths per 1,000, and that that figure had been improved to 13 per 1,000 by 1980. However, the single staggering fact, to which I call the attention of the House tonight, is that in the Market Harborough maternity unit, where it is proposed to halve the number of beds, compared with the 13 mortalities per 1,000 nationally, and 6·1 mortalities per 1,000 in comparable units, the figure is 0·67 per 1,000 deliveries. That is a remarkable statistic. It shows that the mortality level in that excellent unit is 20 times lower than the national average, yet Trent says that the unit is too small, does not work and should be closed because it is not wanted.

In the past 10 years, the unit in Market Harborough, in co-operation with consultants, has provided facilities for no fewer than 2,972 patients, of which 1,650 were delivered. During that time only two infants have died in the ward. One of them, delivered in a consultant unit, died unexpectedly of severe cardiac abnormalities, and the other was stillborn — no foetal heart was audible on admission in labour. The perinatal mortality rate of 0·67 per 1,000 deliveries compares with an average of 6·1 per 1,000 in comparable units and 13·3 per 1,000 in all maternity units. Any major change in the facilities available will lead to a deterioration in that record.

My hon. Friend is a busy, well-respected and much-admired Minister, but he should make time to rush to Market Harborough to see what is there. He should come and admire the unit. He would find a part of the National Health Service that is universally loved, admired and respected. He, like me, believes in the NHS. We want to make it successful. In Market Harborough we have a small maternity unit which is an example of how we would all like the NHS to be.

We must remember that it is the mothers' opinions that count. It may be of interest to my hon. Friend to know that there is a practice at Bowden house, Market Harborough, conducted by eight doctors who work at the Market Harborough general hospital. In a recent letter they said to me that over 90 per cent. of their patients request delivery in Market Harborough hospital and that that is a conservative estimate. They said that:

"we would be unable to guarantee a bed should these cuts be made. We believe that a significant number of women would not accept delivery in Leicester, and this would result in an increase in the number of home confinements and of deliveries on the way to hospital, thereby increasing the demands on the Flying Squad and already over-stretched Ambulance Services."

My hon. Friend is aware that I have been writing to him regularly on this subject since August, and I have been approaching you, Mr. Speaker, regularly for an Adjournment debate. I have come out top of the ballot this year, for which I am grateful. That I did not introduce the debate earlier was not due to lack of interest or urgency. The matter is important to local people.

My hon. Friend wrote a courteous letter to me on 25 October. He said that "should any closure proposals emerging from these current discussions be opposed by the CHC, these will come to the Secretary of State for final decision."

These proposals are flying in the face of public opinion, the wishes of the mothers and of expert medical opinion. The CHC is completely alone in supporting the proposals and I invite my hon. Friend to investigate the CHC's attitude, which makes it unique.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I have listened with great care to my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr), who has been pursuing his constituents' interests in this matter with considerable assiduity over recent months. We have had a correspondence. I am well aware of my hon. Friend's views and no one could have represented the interests of his constituents more powerfully in advance of any plans for closure or partial closure.

I hope that my hon. Friend will accept an apology at the beginning of my speech. I cannot tonight answer a number of the interesting and detailed local points that he has raised, because my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health and I have to play a quasi-judicial role from time to time in cases referred to us where closure has been suggested by a district health authority. I have to reserve my position and that of my right hon. and learned Friend in case that should happen with regard to the hospital that my hon. Friend has talked about. I hope that my hon. Friend appreciates that. I am grateful for the assent that he has just indicated.

That will not stop me from expressing my opinions on the important national points that my hon. Friend has mentioned, and trying to be as helpful as I can when referring to as many of his local points as I reasonably can, subject to the proviso that I have just given.

Should any proposal such as my hon. Friend and some 5,000 of his constituents fear come forward and be accepted by the district health authority, and should that decision be endorsed by the regional health authority, my door and that of my right hon. and learned Friend will be open for my hon. Friend to bring representatives of his constituents to see me or my right hon. and learned Friend at the earliest opportunity. I am happy to give my hon. Friend that pledge.

In the time available to me I should like to pick up at substantial length a number of the national points that arise from the remarks of my hon. Friend and then to deal, in slightly less time, with some of the Leicestershire points. Perinatal and neonatal mortality is a subject that has concerned the House over a substantial period. The Social Services Committee has reported on a number of occasions on the problems of perinatal and neonatal mortality, the safety of mothers and the consumer interest of mothers. The Committee first looked at length in the last Parliament at the factors which may be linked with comparatively high perinatal mortality rates and considered in particular the importance of the place of birth and the facilities available at the place of birth. The all-party view to which the Committee came after taking extensive evidence, not just from professional interests but from consumer groups, was that of mothers should

"be delivered in large units; that selection of patients" should

"be improved for smaller consultant units and isolated general practitioner units; and that home delivery" should be

" phased out further".

Those were the conclusions of the Social Services Committee in its second report of 1979-80.

In its reply to that report the Government welcomed the importance that the Committee gave to an increase in the number of deliveries in large units. Clearly my hon. Friend feels that the Government are unfriendly towards small units and are in favour only of large units. That is not the case and I shall seek to illustrate why. By and large, it is the Government's view, and it remains their view, that women should be encouraged to have their babies in the larger and properly staffed consultant units of district general hospitals, which can offer the whole range of obstetric, paediatric and supporting services necessary to cope with any emergencies at the time when the life of the infant is most frail and when the life of the mother may be threatened.

This view was also shared by the maternity services advisory committee, whose second report—a fascinating report — on care during childbirth was published in January 1984. However, the committee recognised that in some localities geographic factors will require the availability of what it termed "isolated" maternity units and recommended that such units, where geographic factors were a powerful influence on the provision of health care, should be equipped to a standard to cope with any of the complications that might have to be dealt with on site.

In July 1984 the Social Services Committee published its follow-up report and again recommended that the "DHSS should do more to encourage regions, in the light of evidence available to them, to rationalise their maternity services in order to promote better standards of care as well as economy".

Again the Government concurred with that view. However, while it is our overall view that the larger unit, with the acute medical care that is available there, is likely to be a factor promoting the health and welfare of mother and child, or of mother and children in the case of multiple births, it is not for the Government to make an absolute prescription for all places at all times in England.

In recent years there has been a considerable increase in the proportion of maternity beds provided in units on hospital sites — either in consultant or general practitioner units — but we must have an element of flexibility and planning. Therefore, I agree with some of the remarks made by my hon. Friend. Health authorities must strike a balance between the interests of rationalisation and centralisation in order to try to provide the most cost efficient forms of care while at the same time —which is the most important point—helping mothers and their children and, on the other hand, providing the services that are necessary for more isolated communities. They must pursue the objectives of further reducing perinatal mortality and handicap and improving the safety of their services. They must also keep under review—I am sure that the Trent region is enjoining health authorities to do this—how far policies of concentrating staff and resources in large general hospitals match the needs and wishes of mothers who use the services.

In some communities, social and geographic factors —distances, difficulties of travel, particularly in winter, and so on — strongly favour the retention of smaller maternity units for low-risk cases. It is not true that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health and I have always approved health authorities' proposals to close smaller maternity units. I can think of at least two cases in the past six months in which units were kept open after careful consideration by my right hon. and learned Friend.

If the best use is to be made of the facilities of both smaller and larger units, we need an agreed booking policy that takes into account the needs of mothers, the nature of local GP obstetric care and the availability of essential medical staff. We need an integrated booking system between the smaller and larger hospitals, so that mothers who need more acute care, as well as those who prefer to go to larger units, can go to those larger units, while mothers perhaps on their second, third or subsequent births can go into smaller units closer to home. The best decisions must be made about where mothers are to go to get the best care at the time of birth.

It is because of the care that most district hospitals and doctors devote to the system that it may appear that smaller hospitals are "safer" than larger hospitals. Perinatal mortality rates appear to be higher in large acute general hospitals. As the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) would say, it is something of a conundrum. The reason is that generally only the mothers least at risk are put into the smaller hospitals. Reports do not usually take into account instances where the mother or baby has had to be transferred to a larger hospital because complications have arisen.

Generally, only mothers whose medical history and the progress of whose pregnancies have suggested that complications are unlikely are booked into smaller units. That is a matter of clinical practice which goes some way to explaining the apparently surprising figures quoted by my hon. Friend.

Sir John Farr: I accept what my hon. Friend says, but it does not hide the fact that the Market Harborough unit is still 12 times better than the national average for comparable establishments.

Mr. Patten: I assure my hon. Friend that such matters will be considered carefully if a decision on the hospital comes to Ministers.

Although the emphasis in recent years has been on improving the safety of maternity services by centralising — and there has been a dramatic fall in perinatal mortality rates—we must always remember the welfare and interests of the mothers. I welcome the growing awareness among health professionals that the new technology and clinical procedures that have been introduced to make labour and delivery safer for mother and baby, primarily in the larger units, should not displace the traditional concept of a healthy natural birth and the fundamental human values implicit in childbirth.

It is now widely recognised that the onus is on those practising the most up-to-date techniques of ante-natal and obstetric care to ensure that such techniques are just as acceptable to mothers as the traditional practices that they replace. However, it is critically important to realise that large units can very often provide just as homely and caring an atmosphere as the smaller hospitals. Many mothers who have been cared for in large maternity units in large hospitals speak highly of the homely and intimate quality of the care that they received there. Certainly, by and large, bigger should mean safer, but bigger should certainly not, in terms of the care offered to mothers, mean more impersonal.

I was most interested to hear of the consultations in which my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough has engaged in Leicestershire. I was also grateful for the information that he gave me, in the margins, about the organ donor scheme. I agree that the health authority has published a document setting out its proposals for health care services until 1994. As my hon. Friend will be aware, any plans for closures or significant changes in use which are opposed by the local community health council must be referred to my Department for ministerial decision. However, Ministers may also call in decisions for scrutiny on their own account, even if they are not opposed by the local community health council. That has frequently happened in the past.

If at the end of the consultation process the matter is referred to the Department, we shall certainly approach with an open mind the complicated issue that my hon. Friend has raised and give full weight to the views expressed by all interested parties. I repeat my pledge that after—not before—decisions have been taken locally, my right hon. and learned Friend and I would welcome the opportunity to discuss the issues further with my hon. Friend and with constituents, doctors, mothers and representatives of interest groups in his constituency.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes to Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

LONDON TRANSPORT (TOWER HILL) BILL [Lords]
As amended, considered; to be read the Third time.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Political Situation

1. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his current policy towards the situation in Northern Ireland.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Douglas Hurd): We aim to create a stable, peaceful and prosperous society which accommodates fairly and generously the identities of both parts of the community.

Mr. Ross: Does the Secretary of State agree that the maintenance of good relations between Dublin and Westminster is paramount? Does he accept that parts of the Forum report are worth building on and should not be completely dismissed? Does he believe that a parliamentary tier to the Anglo-Irish Council would be helpful at this time?

Mr. Hurd: I agree that a good working relationship between the Republic of Ireland and the United Kingdom is very much in the interests of Northern Ireland as well as of Great Britain and the Republic of Ireland. The point about a parliamentary tier is essentially a matter for the Parliaments concerned and not one on which the Government should take an initiative.

Mr. Proctor: Will my right hon. Friend shy away from taking any new political or constitutional initiatives in Northern Ireland in the near future?

Mr. Hurd: I have tried to be steady and reasonable in what I have said about these matters, but I believe that there is an opportunity now, primarily for the elected leaders of the Province, to move away from arguing across the divide and finding ways in which they can hold practical discussions. If I can help that process forward with suggestions, I am ready to do so.

Security

2. Mr. Molyneaux asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security situation in Northern Ireland.

7. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current security situation in Northern Ireland.

13. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current security situation.

Mr. Hurd: Since I last answered questions in the House on 29 November one soldier and five civilians have died in incidents arising from the security situation in the Province. The security forces continue energetically to combat terrorism. During 1984, a total of 528 people were charged with serious offences, including 41 with murder and 68 with attempted murder, and 197 weapons, 27,211 rounds of ammunition and 8,535 lb of explosives were recovered. I know that the House will join with me in paying tribute to the efforts of the security forces.

Mr. Molyneaux: What value can be attached to the Dublin Government's promises of co-operation when their Foreign Minister, Mr. Barry, consistently seeks to undermine and render ineffective measures taken by Her Majesty's Government to prevent terrorism? Does it not look as though Mr. Barry has assumed the role of protector of all people of Irish descent now living and working in England?

Mr. Hurd: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has read the same reports of Mr. Barry's remarks as I have. I have the impression that, under questioning, he measured his words with a good deal of care, and has been quite strongly criticised at home as a result.

Mr. Proctor: Is it not intolerable that the Irish Foreign Secretary should have interfered in measures taken in Liverpool and elsewhere to safeguard the lives of our citizens, and does this not put at risk, and is it not a contradiction of, the professed claims of Dublin to want to improve Anglo-Irish relations?

Mr. Hurd: Again I am in a difficulty. My information is that although Mr. Barry was pressed hard to comment in the sense that my hon. Friend describes, he refrained from doing so.

Sir John Farr: As the new Maghaberry prison, with more than 500 individual cells, will be opening later this year, and as the prison service in Northern Ireland is staffed at a rate of over three warders to one prisoner, will my right hon. Friend, in the ensuing months, consider the opportunity that is offered of abolishing the special category status there?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the importance of the opening of the new prison. A number of related decisions have to be taken, and in considering what they should be I shall cover the point made by my hon. Friend. I have not yet taken any decisions, and some press accounts of this are therefore speculative at this stage.

Mr. Maginnis: Will the right hon. Gentleman agree to look at the extent to which funds are made available for the protection of off-duty members of the Ulster Defence Regiment in their homes, and will he ensure that the same amount of money is available for them as is available for members of the RUC and the RUC reserve?

Mr. Hurd: I am willing to look at this matter. The problem of protecting UDR part-time members when they are at home is an important one which I have discussed with the hon. Gentleman more than once. We are doing everything that we can.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Does the Secretary of State agree that security in Northern Ireland is not helped if those who are charged with conspiracy after being arrested under the Prevention of Terrorism Act are not brought to trial quickly but are remanded indefinitely, or when the Act is used to arrest people for no other reason than that they are Irish and drunk? If one cannot be drunk on Christmas Eve in Liverpool, where can one be drunk?

Mr. Hurd: The administration of the Prevention of Terrorism Act on this side of the water is not my responsibility. I have been surprised at the speed with which people on both sides of the water have rushed in to comment on recent events before they know what has happened or what charges are being made. A little prudence from the hon. Gentleman would be advisable.

Rev Ian Paisley: Has there been any change in the Government's policy of granting personal protection weapons to those members of the UDR, the RUC and the police reserves who have finished their term of service, as there has been difficulty in individual cases, to which I have referred in letters? Will the right hon. Gentleman make a statement today on the bombing in Newry?

Mr. Hurd: On the hon. Gentleman's second point, I have just had reports about the bombing in Newry, which has caused a great deal of damage in commercial premises, although no one has been seriously injured. However, I do not have the full details. On the hon. Gentleman's first point, there has been no change of policy, and he will understand that these are difficult decisions. I am sure that he will continue to draw specific examples to our attention.

Mr. Bell: On the question of security in Northern Ireland, and the consequential emergency provisions, does the Secretary of State recall the interesting and objective debate in the House on the Baker report? A number of recommendations were made during that debate and the Government showed their firm intention of acting on some of them. Does the Secretary of State intend to publish his proposals in a White Paper, and if so, will he append to the White Paper the various written submissions such as those made by the standing advisory commission on human rights in Belfast, he has received since the Baker report was published?

Mr. Hurd: We had a good debate just before Christmas on the Baker report. I am still digesting that debate and moving towards decisions on what changes in legislation we would recommend to the House. Let me include in that digestive process the hon. Gentleman's suggestion about a White Paper and its impact.

Gas Industry

3. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent representations he has received about the future of the gas industry in Northern Ireland.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr Rhodes Boyson): Following the Government's announcement on 6 September 1984 that the Kinsale project would not be proceeded with, representations have been made by hon. Members of this House and also by some Northern Ireland politicians, local councils, employer and trade union groups in the gas industry, industrial and commercial concerns and members of the public.

Mr. Nellist: Does the Minister agree that his refusal to consider proceeding with the Kinsale gas project signs the death warrant not only for the Belfast gas industry but for 13 other areas, that over 1,200 jobs in Belfast alone, and others in many ancillary industries, will be lost, and that many thousands of homes will be affected? Has he considered the Coopers and Lybrand report of 21 December, which demonstrated the viability of a project to bring natural gas to the Greater Belfast area? Will not a course opposite to that suggested by Coopers and Lybrand cost at least £90 million in the Belfast area alone, with the closure of the gas industry?

Dr. Boyson: I remind the hon. Gentleman that the gas industry provides only between 2 and 3 per cent. of energy in the Province, and that the subsidy to it costs about £12 million. It costs £10,000 per man employed in that industry. What one spends on one part of the Northern Ireland block, one cannot spend on another. If, at any time, a viable scheme came before us, we would look at it. We have said simply, not that we will close the industry down, but that we shall not continue to give a subsidy. The Government have made their position clear on that point.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Is my hon. Friend aware that many Conservative Members have felt that Northern Ireland has a right to be on the United Kingdom grid? What progress has been made with the exploitation of lignite near Lough Neagh and elsewhere?

Dr. Boyson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for asking those questions. About 15 per cent. of households in Great Britain are not receiving natural gas, because the gas industry is committed only to providing gas within 25 yd of a gas main and in reasonable quantities.

Mr. Skinner: Burn coal.

Dr. Boyson: The hon. Gentleman may be a greater expert on coal than on gas. There are people in Great Britain who are not actually plugged in.

We hope that before the end of this month about 200 tonnes of lignite will be burnt at the west Belfast power station. A decision on lignite's future will be influenced by that action. There is no doubt that there are massive reserves of lignite in the Province. There are about 400 million tonnes of lignite in Crumlin alone. Lignite is similarly to be exploited in five other areas in the Province. If we find that we can provide electricity economically by using lignite, the whole energy position of the Province will be transformed.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Will the Minister encourage the liquid gas industry by including liquid gas in the fuels eligible for conversion grants and thereby fill the gap, which is growing?

Dr. Boyson: I know that the hon. Gentleman is concerned about this aspect. We shall certainly consider seriously the points involved. We shall by no means dismiss that idea and, if posible, we shall ensure that that is done.

Mr. Bell: As the Minister has read the report of the joint working group of the Northern Ireland gas employers board and gas trade union group, does he agree with its conclusions that action will be required to save jobs in the gas industry and to remove threats to many more who may be indirectly affected, that a viable gas industry will benefit consumers, and that it will cost less to secure a future for gas in Northern Ireland than to close the present industry?

Dr. Boyson: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman about the future of a viable gas industry. The Government do not believe that there is a viable gas industry in the Province without heavy subsidisation. It is far better to grasp the nettle and to say immediately that we must find some other fuel which is more economic in the Province than to go on continually subsidising an industry that is slowly dying.

Planning Law

4. Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what changes he intends to make in planning law.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): In response to a recommendation of the Northern Ireland Assembly my right hon. Friend proposes to introduce legislation which would require applicants for planning permission to notify neighbours of their development proposals and would, in addition, make a number of miscellaneous amendments.

Mr. Forsythe: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the defects in the legislation which recently allowed an applicant from Doagh road, Ballyclare, effectively to bypass both the local council and the planning department and have his application approved by a planning appeals commissioner? What action does the hon. Gentleman intend to take to ensure that that does not happen again?

Mr. Scott: I know that my hon. Friend is giving careful consideration to the points raised by the hon. Member for Antrim, South (Mr. Forsythe). I, too, am aware of the circumstances that have given rise to this concern. I am advised that, in the absence of a reason for a particular use, further enforcement action could be taken against a developer.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I acknowledge the improvement in enforcement procedure that was brought about by the previous Minister in the Department of the Environment, but will the Government bear in mind the undesirability of that procedure resulting in planning decisions being taken, in the first instance, by the planning commission?

Mr. Scott: I take note of the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman and will confer with my hon. Friend.

Postal Votes

5. Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proportion of the votes cast by post in June 1983 in each of the constituencies of Northern Ireland were on grounds of (a) removal, (b) physical disability and (c) all other grounds.

Mr. Scott: As the answer is in the form of a tabular statement I shall, with permission Mr. Speaker, arrange for it to be published in the Official Report.

Mr. Powell: Assuming that postal votes in respect of removal are only a very small proportion of the total, does the hon. Gentleman agree that in this context the scope for abuse is exceedingly limited?

Mr. Scott: Yes. I will clarify that figure. The average throughout Northern Ireland of postal votes for that purpose is about 3·6 per cent. I remind the right hon. Gentleman of the undertaking given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department on the Second Reading of the Representation of the People Bill. This is a matter that we shall wish to consider carefully in Committee.

The information in respect of postal votes cast in the June 1983 general election in Northern Ireland constituencies is as follows:

Political Situation

6. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he next plans to have discussions with the Government of the Republic of Ireland about the future of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: I look forward to continuing discussions with Ministers of the Government of the Irish Republic within the framework of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council. I would not normally expect to announce in advance the dates for such meetings.

Mr. Dubs: When the Secretary of State next meets his opposite number from the Republic of Ireland, will he be putting forward specific proposals about the future of Northern Ireland, or simply responding to suggestions from the Republic or from the political parties in the North?

Mr. Hurd: When the occasion arises I shall be guided by the phrase in the Chequers communiqué of November, which referred to the need for close and continuing dialogue between the two Governments on subjects related to Northern Ireland within the framework of the intergovernmental council. It is certainly not just a matter of sitting back and listening to the ideas of others. We may well have some ideas of our own.

Mr. Ashby: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to assure the House that the Government remain committed to a close and developing relationship with the Irish Government? Does he believe that the misunderstandings which arose after the recent summit have now been dispelled?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, I think that they have very largely been dispelled.

Mr. Flannery: Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that, contrary to the views of the hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor), when part of a country has been wrested from it by force of arms it is inevitable and natural that the rest of the country—the 26 counties as opposed to the six—should be interested in the future of that part? Moreover, does he realise that there will be no future except killing, bombing and so on unless discussions take place between the Republic and this country about the future of Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hurd: When the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) says that something is inevitable, our doubts are automatically aroused. When he goes on to make a fundamentalist statement which is deeply unhelpful, our doubts become certainties.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that there will be no departure from the policy stated time and again by the Prime Minister that the future constitutional position of Northern Ireland is a matter for Her Majesty's Government, this House and the people of Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hurd: The constitutional guarantee has been stated by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and by successive Secretaries of State, and it stands.

Mr. McCusker: Despite what the Secretary of State said, does he accept that although there may be matters of mutual interest which should be discussed with the Government of the Irish Republic, the future of Northern Ireland should not be so discussed?

Mr. Hurd: I think that the position was made perfectly clear in the Chequers communiqué and in what was said after it by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and myself. I believe that the Irish Government are well aware of the constraints and limits thus set by ourselves, but within those constraints I believe that there is a good deal of useful and important work to be done.

Mr. Stanbrook: Following the question of the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), who does my right hon. Friend regard as his "opposite number" in the Republic? Are not relations with sovereign states a matter for our right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary?

Mr. Hurd: I did not take that point up at the time as it seemed somewhat captious to do so, but my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) is quite right. I believe that I am unique.

Milk Quotas

8. Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made by the appeal panels and tribunals in processing milk quota appeals.

Dr. Boyson: The four local panels have considered virtually all the special case claims from some 3,900 producers. In addition, over 400 appeals have been considered from producers who requested a review of the initial rejection by the Department.

The tribunal received about 3,450 exceptional hardship claims and has dealt with about 80 per cent. of these, together with over 800 appeals against local panel decisions.

Mr. Nicholson: I welcome the fact that the tribunals and panels are finally coming to their conclusion, but is the Minister aware that many small producers in Northern Ireland received nothing when they went to the appeal tribunals and panels, and that they have been seriously disadvantaged by the fact that it was the large producers who appear to be receiving whatever milk quota is available?

Dr. Boyson: There are two problems here. The first is when somebody applies for extra quota and is rejected; secondly, there is the even greater problem of people who have been granted extra quota. We do not know until we have finished examining all the special claims how much of the allocation will be given to them. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is well aware of the problem, as are all the territorial Ministers involved in agriculture, and it is currently being examined.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, with regard to the appeals, the percentage of allocation given will be very small in terms of the amount of quota available? To follow what the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson) said, is the Minister also aware that it is not the large dairy farmer about whom we need to worry, but the small dairy farmer, who is making his living from a small number of cows?

Dr. Boyson: I am well aware of the problems which have been raised by the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley), who is obviously very knowledgeable about agriculture in Northern Ireland. I am also aware that the small dairy farmer, on certain issues, faces greater problems than the large dairy farmer. The whole question of how much can be allocated to those who have succeeded in their appeals is being examined. Indeed, meetings are being held between the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and other territorial Ministers to see whether anything can be done to correct the Northern Ireland situation.

Flags and Emblems (Northern Ireland) Act

9. Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his policy towards the repeal of the Flags and Emblems (Northern Ireland) Act.

Mr. Scott: The Government recognise that there are strong feelings in Northern Ireland both for and against repeal of the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act (Northern Ireland) 1954. We have no plans for repeal, but the use of, and need for, the Act is kept under review.

Mr. McNamara: Why not repeal it? There have been no prosecutions under the Act, and the standing advisory commission on human rights almost 10 years ago recommended its repeal. This would eliminate a cause of annoyance to an important section of the community and would be one of the sympathetic gestures which we were led to understand we might get from the Prime Minister ever since she threw out the Forum report.

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman has put forward one side of the argument. He will be as aware as I am that there is another side of the argument, and the Government will want to consider both sides before coming to a conclusion.

Mr. McCusker: Does the Minister agree that, irrespective of whether the Act is repealed, the police would still have to intervene when the flaunting of a flag or emblem was likely to lead to a breach of the peace?

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman is right. The Act has not been used since at least 1969 and the Royal Ulster Constabulary is confident that it has sufficient powers under public order legislation to deal with any provocative use of flags or emblems.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: May we not dispense with this legislation when there is effective immunity for those who may wish to fly the Union Flag in the South?

Mr. Scott: I think that we want to look at legislation in Northern Ireland and how useful it is within the context of the situation there. We shall of course bear in mind my hon. Friend's views, together with all the others that are expressed on this matter.

Mr. Bell: Given the exchanges with the Minister, is it not a fact that the only time the Act was enforced in the mid-1960s it sparked off the Divis street riot, and as it appears that the same powers exist under the common law in order to prevent a breach of the peace, is not the Act superfluous and irrelevant, and should it not therefore be repealed?

Mr. Scott: The powers exist under the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1981, and it is those powers that the RUC uses. That is a factor that we shall bear in mind in coming to a decision.

Loss of Employment (Compensation)

10. Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider making changes in the scheme for compensation for workers who have been forced to leave their employment, or who have been dismissed, for reasons directly attributable to the civil disturbances.

Dr. Boyson: I have no plans at present to do so, but I shall take note of any representations that the hon. Gentleman wishes to make.

Mr. Ross: Given that jobs are so scarce in Northern Ireland, is not the loss of a job, whether after six months or 20 years, for whatever reason, a very serious matter? Will the Minister look at the legislation for compensation that is tied to the redundancy payments scheme? After a short time at work some people have been forced out of their jobs by direct terrorist threats, and that is a very serious problem for them.

Dr. Boyson: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern. The compensation scheme has been tied to the redundancy scheme. Anyone who has worked for a minimum of two years before being forced out of his job is already in the scheme. But if it is obvious that many people are being forced out within one or two years, we shall have to look again at the scheme.

Northern Ireland Assembly

11. Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the development of the role of the Northern Ireland Assembly and its functions.

Mr. Hurd: The detailed knowledge of local affairs brought by Members to the scrutinising functions of the Assembly's first phase has undoubtedly been helpful. What is required now is agreement on proposals for devolved government that would enable the Assembly to assume the powers envisaged in the Northern Ireland Act 1982: that remains the chief reason for its existence.

Mr. Taylor: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there are many who believe in the Assembly and that it is doing a good job? Will he urge SDLP Members to accept that their constituents' best interests are not being served by their continued abstention, and will he prompt the Unionists into giving a lead in showing how useful powers might be acceptably given to the Assembly?

Mr. Hurd: In general I agree with my hon. Friend. I am looking forward to the future work of the Report Committee of the Assembly, because that work is central to the body's usefulness.

Mr. Stephen Ross: Can the Secretary of State enlighten us as to just how far he has progressed in his talks with the SDLP about its members taking their seats in the Assembly? Has he any statement to make to the House on that point?

Mr. Hurd: I make no secret of the fact that I should like to see the SDLP in the Assembly, but it sees great difficulties about that. It is essential that the elected leaders of the main constitutional parties in Northern Ireland should find some means—whether inside the Assembly or without—of——

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Tebbit) entered the Chamber——

Mr. Hurd: May I take this opportunity to welcome back very warmly to the House my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and to congratulate him on the courage that he has shown throughout these past weeks? May I also ask him to convey our very best wishes to his wife?

Mr. Bell: As the duty officer of Her Majesty's Opposition, may I also take this opportunity of welcoming the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) back to his place in the House? To paraphrase the words of a song, we have grown accustomed to his style, and we wish, hope and pray that he is now restored to his full strength and vigour. May I add that that is the easiest supplementary question that the Secretary of State will have to answer all day?

Norah McCabe

12. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received calling for an inquiry into the death of Norah McCabe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: Since 4 December 1984, one early-day motion, one parliamentary question, six letters from Members of Parliament, one letter on behalf of a political party and nine letters from members of the public have made representations for an inquiry into the death of Mrs. Norah McCabe.

Mr. Parry: The Secretary of State will be aware that early-day motion 195 is supported by 79 hon. Members and calls for an inquiry into the tragic and unnecessary death of a young mother of three children. Will he reconsider his decision not to hold a public inquiry, which he announced in a written reply to me of 20 December? Has any compensation been paid to the dependants of that unfortunate young woman?

Mr. Hurd: I have thought long and hard about that. There are two aspects. The first relates to possible action against individual police officers arising from the death. I cannot second-guess the independent decisions of the Director of Public Prosecutions, who has examined all the evidence, including the film, part of which was recently shown on television, and has come to that conclusion. I have no grounds nor standing to second-guess that.

The second aspect relates to the control of the use of plastic baton rounds, which I have also examined carefully. The House should know that every incident in which the Royal Ulster Constabulary now has to use those rounds is reported to me, and that the use of each round now has to be accounted for. [Interruption.] Yes, compensation has been given.

Mr. Bell: I appreciate the fullness and frankness of the Secretary of State's answer, but does he recall the statement by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State during the debate on the Baker report. He said:

"The law provides that any person may use only such force as is reasonable, and both the police and the Army in Northern Ireland have to operate within the law"?—[Official Report, 20 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 645.]

Does the Secretary of State feel that the force used in the killing of an innocent bystander was reasonable in relation to the circumstances surrounding that death? If he does not, why does he not accede to the demands for an inquiry and establish culpability if there is culpability?

Mr. Hurd: I tried to explain in my original answer the reasons why I do not believe that I can second-guess the decision of the Director of Public Prosecutions, who had access to all the evidence available. I should modify slightly my last answer to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry). The action that Mrs. McCabe's husband brought against the Chief Constable for the death of his wife was settled out of court on 29 November for a substantial sum.

Funerals (Propaganda)

14. Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to prevent the Irish Republican Army and Sinn Fein from using the funerals of terrorists for propaganda purposes.

Mr. Scott: I know that paramilitary displays at funerals give great offence to many people. I am satisfied that the law makes adequate provision for the control of such funerals. It is for the commanders of the security forces on the ground to decide what action to take within the law, whether at the time or subsequently. They must balance the extent of the offence caused by a paramilitary display with the implications of intervention for public order and security.

Mr. Beggs: On behalf of the Ulster Unionists, may I welcome back the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, express our great pleasure at his recovery and our wish that it continues? I ask him to convey our good wishes to his good lady.

Is the Secretary of State not deeply concerned that Sinn Fein leaders have been openly involved in organising funerals for terrorists, at which volleys have been fired by other terrorists in Northern Ireland? Can he assure the House that the law is adequate to ensure and permit prosecution of those who organise such activities, and, if it is not, will he take steps to have the law so amended?

Mr. Scott: My right hon. Friend will have heard the opening remarks of the hon. Gentleman's question. I am satisfied that the law is adequate, but it must be for the judgment of the security forces on the spot whether they intervene in certain circumstances. In the past, people have been apprehended and convicted in those circumstances.

Rev. William McCrea: On behalf of the Democratic Unionist party, may I join with every hon. Member in welcoming the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) back to his rightful place in the Chamber, and convey every good wish to his good lady and pray that she will be restored to health and strength?

Does the Minister agree that paramilitary displays, such as those witnessed in Londonderry recently, are totally obnoxious to every decent citizen in Northern Ireland and should not be tolerated in any part of the United Kingdom? Why do the suffering citizens of Northern Ireland have to witness such a total disregard for the law of the land?

Mr. Scott: We have to rest on the judgment of the security forces commanders. The House will be aware that in certain circumstances intervention could put at risk other innocent lives. In those circumstances, the commanders might judge that intervention was not to be preferred against the possibility of identification and subsequent apprehension.

Mr. McNamara: May I also welcome back the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and, in his own style, may I say that I look forward to the time when he is gracing the Opposition Front Bench?

What instructions are given to the RUC about removing tricolours from coffins?

Mr. Scott: The tricolour would normally be removed only in circumstances that were likely to cause a breach of the peace. The public order implications that we discussed on an earlier question would be taken into account. That is entirely different from the discharging of volleys over coffins by armed men.

Provisional Sinn Fein

16. Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will instruct Northern Ireland civil servants and the employees of statutory bodies in Northern Ireland within his responsibility to refuse to meet or communicate with elected representatives of Provisional Sinn Fein.

Mr. Hurd: Contacts with such representatives are kept to the minimum, but, in the interests of constituents, and to ensure that administration is equitable, representations on purely constituency matters are dealt with at local level in a fair and proper manner.

Mr. McCusker: What aspects of the behaviour of Sinn Fein are so objectionable to the Secretary of State that they prevent him from meeting or communicating with its representatives? Why do they not apply to civil servants and those employed in statutory bodies, and to families, many of whose members may have been murdered by associates of Sinn Fein?

Mr. Hurd: It is right that Ministers should refuse to meet Sinn Fein representatives or to reply to letters from them until and unless Sinn Fein renounces violence. I make no apology for that. However, representations made on behalf of constituents must be dealt with properly and fairly in the interests of those constituents, which is why we have arrived at the procedure about which the hon. Gentleman knows.

Health and Social Service Boards (Staff)

17. Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of community doctors, nurses, psychiatric nurses, social workers and therapists employed by the various health and social service boards.

Mr. Scott: As the answer is in the form of a tabular statement I will, with permission, Mr. Speaker, arrange for it to be published in the Official Report.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Although I welcome the publication of the figures, is the Minister aware that there is growing concern that some vacancies in the community have not been filled? Is he further aware that some people suspect that this is an attempt to save money that will cause problems in the service given to patients? if there is to be a shift from care in hospitals to care in the community, will the Minister acknowledge that there must be adequate funding and staff to achieve that?

Mr. Scott: Of course, I recognise that. There has been the shift to which the hon. Gentleman referred, and there is provision for an expansion of community social workers in the immediate future.

Following are the figures:

	Eastern	Western	Northern	Southern
Community Doctors*	7½	3	7	4
Community Nurses	826	252	395	317
Community Psychiatric Nurses	33	25	8	14
Community Social Workers	444	110	188	103
Community Therapists	113	23	48	24

* Defined as specialists in community medicine.

The figures are as at 30 September 1984, except for community psychiatric nurses, which are at 13 December 1984.

Political Situation

18. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans to prepare discussions with all interested political parties in the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic on the future of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: No, Sir.

Mr. Flannery: Does the Secretary of State accept that those who believe that the last word has been said about Northern Ireland are sadly mistaken, and that the circumstances prove that to be true? Does he further accept that the future of Northern Ireland depends on many discussions and debates? Therefore, will he make it clear that, especially because the policy of the main Opposition party—the Labour party—is for a united Ireland, those discussions must continue with all interested parties, including the Republic?

Mr. Hurd: It would be rash indeed for anyone to predict the day when the last words had been spoken about Northern Ireland. There is an important distinction here which the hon. Gentleman constantly seeks to blur. The United Kingdom needs a good working relationship with the Republic of Ireland, but the initiative on discussions about the way in which the Province should be governed rests essentially with the elected leaders of the Province. I shall give any help or make any suggestions that I can to ease that process.

Mr. Steel: Will the Secretary of State lose no opportunity to make it clear to the populations of Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic that the one thing that unites all parties in the House is our determined opposition to terrorism, and that we all rejoice to see the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry here this afternoon? We wish him and Mrs. Tebbit well.

Mr. Hurd: We are all grateful for what the right hon. Gentleman has said.

Security Forces

19. Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he takes to publicise the role and achievements of the security forces in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: My right hon. Friend and I have taken, and will continue to take, every opportunity to publicise the work and achievements of the security forces in Northern Ireland. Their work is commended in statements and speeches and during the course of radio, television and newspaper interviews. Attention is also drawn to the achievements of the security forces by the regular inclusion of statistics in the answers to parliamentary questions and in press releases and other publications, and by the briefing of journalists and others from home and abroad. Ministers also make well-publicised visits to units of the security forces in the Province.

Mr. Maginnis: Is the Minister aware that there is a scurrilous campaign to discredit the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Ulster Defence Regiment — a campaign that is aided by naive members of the public who are not themselves connected with terrorism? Will he take steps to see that incidents in which members of the security forces are involved are more fully explained to the general public? We understand that, for security reasons, there must be constraints, but we feel that not enough is being done to put the case for the members of the security forces.

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman appreciates the constraints that frequently exist when criminal charges may be brought in certain circumstances. However, I can certainly agree wholeheartedly with him that everything that promises to be effective against terrorism in Northern Ireland is subject to a scurrilous campaign designed to discredit it. Ministers will do their best to counter such campaigns.

PRIME MINISTER

Secretary of State for Energy

Q1. Mr. Bidwell asked the Prime Minister if she will dismiss the Secretary of State for Energy.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): No, Sir.

Mr. Bidwell: Will the right hon. Lady explain to the House why the Secretary of State for Energy did not make better use of his meeting with the leaders of the Trades Unions Congress, led by that nice man Mr. Willis? As the pound slumps, and as further industrial action is contemplated in relation to the mining dispute, will the right hon. Lady do what Energy Ministers do not seem to be able to do, and get negotiations under way?

The Prime Minister: I believe that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy makes excellent use of all his opportunities. In particular, he never fails to explain what an excellent offer the National Coal Board has made to the National Union of Mineworkers. It is better than any previous offer. Both my right hon. Friend and I hope that more and more men will continue to return to work.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: Did my right hon. Friend notice that yesterday the Secretary of State for the Environment, after the National Economic Development Office meeting, said——

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman will consult his Order Paper, he will see that the question refers to the Secretary of State for Energy.

Engagements

Q2. Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 January.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Parry: Will the Prime Minister take time today to study the recent report by Dr. Alex Scott-Samuel, which suggests that hundreds of people are dying from causes related to mass unemployment, including 150 on Merseyside? What steps does the Prime Minister or her Cabinet intend to take to reduce unemployment and those horrifying figures? If the right hon. Lady had shown half as much commitment to reducing unemployment as she has to attempting to destroy the NUM, the picture today would be very different.

The Prime Minister: If we had fewer strikes, people might have more confidence in goods produced in this country and might place more orders. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the only long-term way to reduce unemployment is to produce goods and services that people in this country and other countries will purchase, and that is the aim and purpose of the Government's policies.

Mr. Fox: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to give her support to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education's excellent proposals to introduce assessment of teachers? Will she accept that this innovation would have the overwhelming support of the vast majority of parents, who want the education of their children to be improved?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I gladly respond to my hon. Friend's invitation. I believe that my right hon. Friend's proposals meet with great support, especially from parents and from all who are interested in raising the standard of education in this country.

Mr. Hattersley: Has the Prime Minister had time today to read the report submitted yesterday to the National Economic Development Council, which describes the chronic deterioration in Britain's infrastructure? Will the Government provide the money to remedy the increasing decay of our schools, hospitals, public sector houses and roads and thereby concentrate available funds on what every objective authority agrees is the best way in which to reduce unemployment—public sector capital investment?

The Prime Minister: That question comes from a right hon. Member who belonged to a Government who reduced and smashed capital expenditure in many Departments, especially on roads, housing and hospitals. The Government have put a great deal of extra expenditure into hospitals and roads. This year, for example, investment in major roads will be 27 per cent. greater in real terms than in 1978-79. We are also putting greater investment into the water industry this year. The purpose of making public investment is that we get a good return, or because certain investment is necessary. The Government have a good record on public investment. Moreover, fixed investment across the economy was running at an all-time record in 1984.

Mr. Hattersley: The Prime Minister totally ducks the unemployment question, which is central to what I asked her. I therefore ask her again: does she, or does she not, accept the evidence that is now supplied to her, even by the Department of Trade and Industry, that by far the best way to reduce unemployment and create real jobs is through public investment in repairs and construction? Does she accept that evidence? If she denies it, or refuses to comment on it, we shall know what we have always suspected—that once more a Conservative Government choose higher unemployment because they have other priorities more consistent with the Conservative philosophy.

The Prime Minister: I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman, or with what he says about what other people say. Public sector investment remains at about the same real level as it was during the last year of the Labour Government. We also have a record amount in fixed investment across the economy. I do not accept the right hon. Gentleman's view that extra expenditure on infrastructure is the best way in which to increase employment. As the right hon. Gentleman is well aware, we spend £2 billion a year on special employment measures. That secures far more jobs than what he is proposing.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Faced with the growing stocks of chemical weapons in the Soviet Union, will my right hon. Friend make it crystal clear today that Great Britain will keep to its permanent policy of improving its defences against chemical attack and seeking international agreement on the banning of chemical weapons, and will not resort to the manufacture of chemical weaponry in Britain?

The Prime Minister: The facts are that Britain abandoned its chemical warfare capability in the late 1950s. There has been no change in Government policy since then, nor is any change now proposed. However, as a responsible Government, we have a duty to keep defence policy under review in the light of what my hon. Friend said about the massive Soviet capability in chemical weapons. As my hon. Friend said, the Government are playing a leading part in the international negotiations in Geneva for a comprehensive, verifiable and worldwide ban on these weapons, and we tabled important initiatives in March 1983 and February 1984 on verification and challenge inspections. We abandoned our chemical weapons. Any criticism should be directed at the Soviet Union for keeping a massive chemical warfare capability.

Dr. Owen: I welcome back the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and salute his courage.

Can we expect that the Confederation of British Industry's request for £1 billion of capital investment in our crumbling infrastructure will be given a rather better hearing than it has received recently? Will the Prime Minister deal with the Institute of Fiscal Studies' estimate that £1 billion of capital investment would create 165,000 jobs and that the same amount of money in tax reliefs would create only 30,000 jobs?

The Prime Minister: I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman. As I said in reply to a previous question, the Government are spending, through the taxpayer, a considerable amount of money on infrastructure. This year, partly because of the drought, we are increasing investment in the water industry—it is 9 per cent. up. Investment in major roads is 27 per cent. greater than it was under the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member. I would not accept, and I do not know where he gets it from, that expenditure on infrastructure is the best way of increasing jobs. We get a far better deal for £2 billion expenditure on special measures, which, as he knows, helps 400,000 to 600,000 people.

With regard to alternative methods, I think that the right hon. Gentleman mentioned reductions in taxation. Reductions in taxation are one way of increasing net take-home pay without increasing industrial costs and therefore keeping competitiveness in industry.

Q3. Mr. Blair asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Blair: If the Prime Minister is saying that these works of infrastructure are not to be done now, when will they be done? Is she aware that delay is making the cure costlier? Does she not agree, at the very least, that any room for manoeuvre on Budget day should be dedicated to measures that increase investment in the infrastructure and thus combine necessity, efficiency and employment?

The Prime Minister: I do not quite understand why the hon. Gentleman is not hearing what I am saying about the amount spent on public sector investment. Public sector investment remains at about the same real level as in 1978-79. It is £24 billion. The extra spending on infrastructure does not gain anything like the same number of new jobs as spending on special measures. We spend £2 billion on special measures. That includes a great deal of training. That training also helps young people to be equipped for some of the science-based industries of the future. That, I believe, is the right way in which to increase employment possibilities.

Q5. Mr. Proctor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Proctor: Will my right hon. Friend ensure that during 1985 the main economic target will be the continued control and reduction in the level of inflation, as this is likely to lead to the greatest number of people in employment and to a potential increase in employment?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful to my hon. Friend. We shall, of course, maintain our objective of continuing to reduce inflation. I understand that that might even find support on the Opposition side of the House, as I recall the occasion in December 1978 when the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said:

"Our immediate intention is to hold the inflation rate at or about its present level. Our eventual aim is to reduce the figure to the level enjoyed by our most successful competitors, for unless we achieve our objectives none of our other policies—economic growth, lower unemployment, higher investment and improved services financed by public expenditure—can fully succeed."—[Official Report, 13 December 1978; Vol. 960, c. 677.]

Mr. Alfred Morris: In December it was widely reported that the Prime Minister would be considering the Stansted report during the recess. What is her reaction to it? Is she aware that a quick and definitive rejection of the inspector's recommendations is wanted by hundreds of us on both sides of the House, not least by those from the north, where even the thought of £1 billion-plus expenditure at Stansted excites not just outright opposition but anger?

The Prime Minister: I hope that many hon. Members had a very interesting recess, as I did, reading that report and that they will be ready to have a debate in the House. The right hon. Gentleman is well aware that I can say nothing whatsoever about it, for obvious reasons. We are committed to having a parliamentary debate before too long, I hope, before the Government make up their mind. By the time we have that debate, I hope that hon. Members will have read the report.

Q6. Dr. McDonald asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official enagagements for Thursday 10 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Dr. McDonald: Why, in the answers that she has given about public investment, has the Prime Minister consistently ignored the fact that the NEDC report talks about many million of pounds worth of repairs still to be carried out to roads, sewers and houses in particular?—[Interruption.] Why has she ignored housing and the fact that many people are living in gross discomfort in damp and dismal homes and that repairs to those dwellings would make their lives far more comfortable and would provide many jobs—[Interruption.] Is she aware that a moderate spending of £1 billion a year would provide between 70,000 and 100,000 more jobs each year, and will she cease to dismiss this as unimportant?

The Prime Minister: In so far as I could hear the hon. Lady, I repeat that on public sector investment this Government are spending some £24 billion. There has been a switch of emphasis on housing—as people want —from public to private sector, and that reflects this Government's belief that most people wish to own their own homes. Owner-occupation rose by 1·7 million between 1979 and 1984, and the hon. Lady clearly criticises the Labour Government's housing record because the dwelling stock rose by 900,000 between 1979 and 1984.

Mr. Flannery: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take points of order after the private notice question unless they arise directly from Question Time.

Mr. Flannery: My point of order is about questions, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the Prime Minister constantly to read all her answers instead of answering questions in a proper way?

Mr. Speaker: Everyone has his own method of dealing with questions in this House, and it is not a matter for me.

Mr. Flannery: She is cribbing.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Putney (Explosion)

3.31 pm

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the explosion which occurred this morning in Putney.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Tom King): The House will be aware that at 7.12 am this morning there was an explosion at Newnham house, Manor Fields estate, Putney, in London.

I have to inform the House, with great regret, that the latest information is that three people have died, six are unaccounted for, and a further two are in hospital.

Rescue operations are still in progress. Emergency services were quickly on the scene, and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, in whose constituency the explosion occurred, has told me of the skill and bravery being shown by the rescue services working in the present dangerous conditions.

While it has not yet been possible to establish with certainty the cause of the explosion, all the evidence available at present points to it being a gas explosion. Responsibility for gas safety rests with the Health and Safety Commission and Executive. A team of inspectors from the executive reached the site early this morning. An investigation team from SE Gas is also already present at the scene. The Health and Safety Commission has now set up an inquiry under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act, and I have asked the chairman to let me have a preliminary report at the earliest moment.

I know that the whole House will join me in extending our deepest sympathy to those bereaved, injured and homeless as a result of this tragic occurrence.

Mr. Soames: The House will appreciate that, apart from the great concern and interest felt by all hon. Members, I ask this question at the request, and on behalf, of my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), who because of his ministerial duties is unable to do so.

Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the inquiry by the Health and Safety Executive will be conducted with the greatest urgency and that the report will be published as soon as it is to hand? Will he also pass on to the emergency services the gratitude and admiration of hon. Members for the great skill and courage which they have shown?

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I can confirm my request that the report should be prepared at the earliest opportunity. I understand that it is the intention of the commission that the report should be published, and I certainly support that.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): May I on behalf of this side of the House express our deepest sympathy to the injured, to the relatives of those who have so tragically died and to the homeless as a result of this explosion? May I also express our appreciation and admiration for the immediacy of the response of the police and our emergency services who are continuing to deal with the emergency? Since the Secretary of State has said that the report will be published, may I ask him how long he believes the report will take to prepare and whether the interim report will lead to a statement being made by him?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this is the first domestic gas explosion to be investigated by the Health and Safety Executive since it took over responsibility in 1984? Will he ask the executive to look at the extent of gas explosions, despite the very good safety record of the gas board, during the last five years and to include an assessment in the final report?

Mr. King: I am very grateful to the hon. Member for his expressions of sympathy and respect and of admiration for the emergency services. The House will know that they have been working throughout the morning in a very dangerous structure, with gas still escaping. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department himself told me of the great courage being shown by people who are working with great dedication in very dangerous circumstances. Therefore, the tribute paid by the hon. Gentleman and by my hon. Friend is well deserved.

Obviously it is not possible for me at this stage to answer the hon. Gentleman's two questions about whether it will be appropriate to make a further statement on any interim findings, but certainly I take note of his interest and of the concern of the House to be kept informed. I shall be anxious to ensure that that is done in the most appropriate way. In terms of the general safety record, it is worth remembering that there are 16 million gas consumers and that there are 9 million central heating gas installations. Last year there were 25 serious explosions. It is interesting to note that the figures show a steadily declining trend over the past three years and give some indication of generally very high standards of safety within the gas industry.

Mrs. Angela Rumbold (Mitcham and Morden): I extend my sympathy to the bereaved and the injured and also my admiration for those public services which have had to deal with the results of the explosion, but, when the inquiry is completed, could public authorities and private owners of blocks of flats where there are gas installations be requested to have a further look at their installations with a view to increasing awareness of the danger of such explosions? I believe that this is something which the House must take into consideration.

Mr. King: I pay tribute to the general standards of safety, but my hon. Friend's wise words of caution—that people should be aware of the importance of taking proper precautions—are most important, and the general guidance of British Gas and the area gas boards should be closely followed.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): May I associate my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Liberal and Social Democratic parties with the expressions of sympathy and the recognition of the work done by the emergency services. I am sure that all London Members will want to join me in saying that.

May I ask that the proper inquiry that is to be conducted by the Health and Safety Executive should be extended as soon as possible to look at the two clearly related matters which are often of great concern to all of us and to the public: first, the immediacy of the response to emergencies of the statutory undertakings—not only the gas board—and, secondly, the need for money to be made available where it is required for the maintenance of the infrastructure, in this case piping, if in bad weather such as that which we have experienced recently it is shown that that is a contributory factor to the inability to deal quickly or properly with complaints about the gas service such as those which have been made in recent weeks, we understand, in Putney?

Mr. King: I would rather not comment on the latter part of what the hon. Gentleman said in advance of even the preliminary findings of any inquiry, but I should like to put it on record that my understanding is that a reported gas leak was recorded by SE Gas at 7.2 am, that the explosion occurred at 7.12 am, and that the response of SE Gas was so fast that a van was outside at the time of the explosion. There was some concern that the gas safety inspector was inside at the time of the explosion, but happily that proved not to be the case. However, that shows the speed with which the statutory undertakers responded to the call.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Minister confirm that this is the second occasion within the past six months when Ministers have felt it necessary to praise the professionalism and integrity of public sector workers in non-profit making industries such as the National Health Service, the ambulance service and others connected with rescues? As Secretary of State for Employment, will he give a guarantee that when those people put in for a wage increase they will not be subjected to denigration and that if they have to go on strike to further that claim they will not be further attacked by the Government?

Mr. King: I do not think that the House would expect me to respond on this occasion to that intervention.

Business of the House

3.41 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): May I ask the Leader of the House whether he will state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 14 JANUARY—Second Reading of the Trustee Savings Banks Bill and of the Water (Fluoridation) Bill.

Remaining stages of the National Heritage (Scotland) Bill.

TUESDAY 15 JANUARY—Opposition Day (5th Allotted Day). A debate on an Opposition motion on the reduction of unemployment through public investment.

Motion on the Food Imitation (Safety) Regulations.

WEDNESDAY 16 JANUARY — Motions on the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 2) 1984-85, (No. 3) 1983-84, and on the Rate Support Grant Report (England) 1985-86.

Motion on the Welsh Rate Support Grant Report 1985-86.

Motions on the Wildlife (Northern Ireland) Order and on the Nature Conservation and Amenity Lands (Northern Ireland) Order.

THURSDAY 17 JANUARY—There will be a debate on a Government motion on regional policy.

Motions on the Assisted Areas Order, the Regional Development Grant (Qualifying Activities) Order and on the Regional Development Grant (Prescribed Percentage, Amount of Limit) Order.

FRIDAY 18 JANUARY—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 21 JANUARY—Second Reading of the Hong Kong Bill.

Mr. Hattersley: The Leader of the House will recall the Opposition's hope that the House would soon debate in Government time the threatened post office closure programme. Will such a debate be arranged?

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman will also recall that we are anxiously awaiting an opportunity to debate the Government's Green Paper on long-term public expenditure options. May I once more repeat the request that that debate is held sufficiently early to enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take part in it before the Budget?

Thirdly, there have been great expectations that a statement would be made this week on the privatisation of British Airways. When will that statement be made?

Finally, could the Leader of the House find some time next week to remind the Prime Minister that when I made the speech that she so flatteringly quoted unemployment in Britain was rather more than 2 million less than it is today?

Mr. Biffen: I am flattered that I should be required to go in to bat for the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) in respect of his last point, but of course I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to his observation.

I am not aware of any plans for a statement to be made next week on the privatisation of British Airways, but I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to the right hon. Gentleman's interest.

It might be helpful to the House if we were to await the report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee which is now considering long-term public expenditure before we debated that.

I have looked at the matter of Post Office closures. Clearly it is a topic of great interest to the House. None the less, it falls very much within the remit of the Post Office and I can offer no Government time for a debate on the topic. However, I have no doubt that it will fall within the designation of public investment to which the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends will be drawing the attention of the House on Tuesday.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the growing public concern about the commercial exploitation of surrogate motherhood. He will also be aware that the Warnock committee made a strong recommendation that there should be early legislation and that that was echoed when the House debated the matter before Christmas. May we expect an early statement of the Government's intentions about laying legislation this Session?

Mr. Biffen: I very much endorse what my right hon. Friend says about the importance of this topic. The matter is now under consideration and I shall draw the points he makes to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): In view of the method, which is controversial from a constitutional point of view, being adopted by the Government to secure approval for an additional payment to the European Economic Community, may we be assured that there will be full opportunity for debate not only of the Estimate but of the authorising statute?

Mr. Biffen: I shall give further consideration to that point.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): Will the expected debate on Stansted take place before 31 January, and is there any truth in the rumour that it will be spread over two days?

Mr. Biffen: I would not wish to tie myself either to specific dates or to rumours. My hon. Friend clearly speaks for many, however, when he underlines the importance of having an early debate.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Will the Leader of the House reconsider his previous comments on the closure of post offices—bearing in mind that their closure has much wider concern than exists within the remit of the post office itself—and find time, possibly on a motion for the Adjournment of the House, to debate the subject?

Is there any possibility of debating at an early date the question of penalising strikers in relation to housing benefit, a matter which is raised in early-day motion 247, which is in the form of a prayer and which stands in the names of my right hon. and hon. Friends?

[That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Housing Benefits Amendment (No. 4) Regulations 1984 (S.I., 1984, No. 1965), dated 17th December 1984, a copy of which was laid before this House on 18th December, be annulled.]

Will there be the possibility of an early debate on matters pertaining particularly to youth? I understand that the right hon. Gentleman received sympathetically an all-party delegation recently in connection with International Youth Year. Is there any likelihood of a debate on matters which are of particular concern to younger members of the community?

Mr. Biffen: I recognise the importance of the whole issue of the future of the post office structure, but I can go no further than I went in my reply to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley).

I regret that I cannot offer the hon. Gentleman the prospect of Government time to debate the other two matters he raised, but as an experienced parliamentarian he will be aware that there are other opportunities that he can pursue.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): Is there likely to be a statement next week about the need for an RAF trainer replacement aircraft? Recently there was a short list of two which did not include Firecracker. There is considerable uncertainty, and I understand that the short list has been extended to include Firecracker. Is my right hon. Friend aware that many thousands of jobs in the east midlands depend on Firecracker being selected and that the sooner there is a statement the better?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate the serious constituency factors which are involved for my hon. Friend. I shall draw the attention of the Secretary of State for Defence to the points he makes and to the desirability of an early statement.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is the Leader of the House aware that a fourth group of academic accountants and economists has now challenged the accounting arrangements of the National Coal Board and that in response the NCB has appointed independent accountants to assess the board's accounting techniques? In the light of those facts, is it not time that the House was given an opportunity to debate this highly important matter, particularly as many of us believe that the solution to the dispute lies in our understanding, and the Government having a further appreciation of, what changes can be made?

Mr. Biffen: There seem to be as many interpretations of the finances of the NCB as there are accountants to take part in this practice. There is no time available next week for the Government to promote a debate on this topic, but undoubtedly there are many other opportunities open to hon. Members such as the hon. Gentleman, and I have no doubt that they will take advantage of them.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Returning to the issue of a debate on Stansted and terminal 5 at Heathrow, as we now know that the next sitting of the Standing Committee on the Civil Aviation Bill is scheduled for 12 February, is it not a fair assumption that any debate on Stansted and terminal 5 should desirably take place before then?

Mr. Biffen: I am ever anxious to be helpful to the House on this matter because I know that the House is trying to be helpful to me. However, I cannot go any further than what I have already said on the subject, and that was intended to be helpful.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the Leader of the House aware of the widespread concern about the tremendous difficulties faced by pensioners and others on limited incomes in trying to keep their homes warm in the present cold spell? Why has no Minister come to the Dispatch Box this week, nor shown any willingness to do so next week, to make a statement on this matter? Does this demonstrate the Government's indifference to such suffering?

Mr. Biffen: Politicians are becoming thin on arguments when they have to engage in spurious accusations of comparative morality and compassion.

Mr. Winnick: The right hon. Gentleman does not have any trouble.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is as well provided as I am. I shall draw his anxiety to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the interest of hon. Members on both sides of the House in the Prime Minister's recent and successful tour of the world and its consequential negotiations. When may we expect either a statement or a debate on the subject?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot hold out hope of a statement, but I shall bear in mind that at some point there will be a natural occasion for a debate on foreign affairs. The Second Reading debate on the Hong Kong Bill will enable the House to express a view on the matter.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): When the Leader of the House considers the method of payment to the EEC for the supplementary budget for 1984, as he intimated to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) that he would, will he bear in mind the background to this matter? Would it not be singularly unfortunate if, in addition to a debate on the Supplementary Estimate itself, there was not an opportunity—not necessarily all night—to debate the Second Reading of the appropriate special Consolidated Bill?

Mr. Biffen: That is taking the matter considerably wider than is necessary—the hon. Gentleman's smile confirms that.

Mr. Spearing: No.

Mr. Biffen: I am sorry; perhaps the hon. Gentleman never smiles. I shall take account of what he has said.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): May I urge my right hon. Friend to reconsider his answer about a debate on post office closures? I draw to his attention the fact that just before Christmas it was announced that two sub-post offices in my constituency were to close, a decision that will cause enormous hardship and suffering if it goes through. Should not this be challenged on the Floor of the House in a debate on the subject, and not left to someone who may be fortunate enough to squeeze the matter in during a debate on public expenditure?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes a powerful constituency point, and it would be appropriate if he were to seek his good fortune in an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that at Croydon coroner's court this morning the coroner recorded an open verdict on the death of Peter Nadin on the Greek island of Mikonos last summer? In view of that, should not the Foreign Office be pursuing the Greek Government with great vigour to ensure that we get a full report of the circumstances surrounding the death of this person outside a police station on that island? Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Foreign Secretary to make a statement to the House?

Mr. Biffen: I was not aware of the decision of the coroner's court, but I shall represent to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary the points that have been made.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): As the subject of chemical weapons has been raised, will my right Friend take account of the fact that many Conservative Members feel that it is almost close to negligence that, whereas the Soviet Union and the Warsaw pact forces handle and train regularly with these ghastly weapons, our forces have no experience of them and, therefore, in the event of hostilities, they would be far more likely to be used than if there were a more balanced position?

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend says. I am afraid that I can be no more forthcoming than to say that there will be no opportunity for a debate on chemical weapons in Government time next week.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): How does the Leader of the House respond to the complaint of Mr. Justice James McClelland, the chairman of the Australian Royal Commission investigating the events during the 1950s at Maralinga in Western Australia, that the British Government have stymied the work of the Royal Commission and that he has to carry out the inquiry with his hands tied behind his back? Is it not outrageous that a Royal Commission should meet in this country to investigate the problems of Australian ex-service men when such a right is not afforded to our own ex-service men?

Mr. Biffen: There is a wide range of parliamentary opportunities for raising points such as that.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend go a little further than he did in responding to my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) about surrogate motherhood? I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware of public disgust at surrogate motherhood for gain and the intense wish throughout the country for early legislation to prevent such action in the future. Will my right hon. Friend be more forthcoming about when we shall have such legislation?

Mr. Biffen: If I were able to be more forthcoming, I should have "forthcomed". There is, of course, appreciation of the great public interest in this matter. It is now under consideration, and as soon as a Minister can appropriately come to the House to make a further statement that will be done.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Is the Leader of the House aware that the article written by five academic accountants which was suppressed from the magazine Accountancy in December last year has now been published with little change, although there has been consultation with the National Coal Board? The Leader of the House said to my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) that the Government cannot find time for a debate on the accountants' report or other reports and the present coal mining dispute. Will he ask the Secretary of State for Energy to make a statement on this issue which is the fundamental cause of the present coal mining dispute?

Mr. Biffen: I am not sure that I would accept the hon. Gentleman's conclusion, but as he has made this request I shall gladly accede to it and convey to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy the anxieties that have been expressed that a statement should be made on the NCB's methods of accounting.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): In view of the Opposition requests for a debate on the coal strike and on heating costs, does my right hon. Friend agree that, if Opposition time were used for a debate on the coal strike, the House would be given a chance to explore how the strike is not only destroying jobs outside, and ultimately inside, the coal industry but unnecessarily increasing heating costs?

Mr. Biffen: That is perfectly true, but, alas, we shall not have that opportunity next week.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Leader of the House aware that, if we had managed to obtain a statement on the NCB's accounting procedures, we might have been able to raise the question of the strange accounting procedures criteria that are acceptable to the Government when dealing with banks? Will the right hon. Gentleman explain or call upon any other Minister to explain why those banks whose reserves are exhausted, which are uneconomic units of production and have crooks running them are able to get a nod and a wink from the Government to save them and to receive more than £75 million from the Bank of England—the taxpayers' bank—to save them, yet, when——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Skinner: I am almost done.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is business questions. The hon. Member should be asking whether a debate can be held on these matters and not asking the Leader of the House to give a definitive answer.

Mr. Skinner: During such a statement or debate, the Minister could draw a comparison with the shabby treatment received by the miners when they called on the National Coal Board to adopt proper accounting procedures that would show that every pit in Britain was economic.

Mr. Biffen: I have a warm affection for the hon. Gentleman in the way in which he pursues diversionary tactics for a dying cause. That is precisely the position he is in. I can go no further than I have already gone on the question of the representations I shall make to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy. I shall, of course, append the hon. Gentleman's voice to the voices of those hon. Members who have already spoken on the subject.

BILL PRESENTED

Hong Kong

Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Brittan, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. John Biffen, Mr. Attorney-General, and Mr. Richard Luce, presented a Bill to make provision for and in connection with the ending of British sovereignty and jurisdiction over Hong Kong: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 56.]

Orders of the Day

Milk (Cessation of Production) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

4 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Last May, when I declared the Government's intention to introduce an outgoers compensation scheme for milk producers as part of the milk quota arrangements, I said that I should seek legislation as soon as possible to provide the necessary statutory authority for the payments that we intended to make under the scheme. The primary purpose of the Bill is to provide that authority.

The outgoers scheme is one element in the Community supplementary levy arrangements for milk. The introduction of the arrangements after last year's price fixing was intended to achieve an immediate cut in production in most member states in an attempt to restrain the growing surplus in the dairy sector and the ever-growing expense to the Community of disposing of that surplus. In 1983-84, the milk sector alone was supported under the common agricultural policy to the tune of more than £3 billion of Community money, with the prospect that this would rise to about £4 billion in 1984-85 and exceed budget provision unless drastic measures were taken to curb over-production.

As I have often told the House, we argued strenuously in Brussels for action via the price mechanism, but it became clear that other member states would not agree to price cuts of the severity necessary to deal with the problem. The only prospect for effective action to tackle the surplus was therefore through a quota scheme, and agreement was accordingly reached on a package of measures involving quota for each milk producer and a supplementary levy on milk produced in excess of quota.

In the United Kingdom the introduction of quotas required an immediate cut in production of 6·15 per cent. by comparison with the 1983-84 marketing year if producers were to avoid supplementary levy. In addition to this we felt it necessary, in accordance with provisions in the Community legislation, to provide a reserve of wholesale quota for reallocation to producers who satisfied special case criteria. About 2·5 per cent. of the United Kingdom quota was held back to fund the reserve for special cases. Overall, then, with the production cut and the amount withheld for the special case reserve, United Kingdom wholesale producers' primary quota allocations —that is, their basic quotas—have been set at 9 per cent. below their 1983 production levels.

It is a matter of common consent that one group of producers has been particularly hard hit by the imposition of production quotas — the small specialist producers who have no alternative to milk production because of the kind of farms that they occupy and little scope to adapt their dairy enterprises to lower levels of production under the quota system. We wanted to do something to help those smaller producers. In England and Wales, those producing less than 200,000 litres per year represent about 40 per cent. of all milk producers. Our aim is to enable those producers to return to their 1983 levels of production without becoming liable to supplementary levy. We also decided, particularly in the light of the views expressed by hon. Members in the debate on 3 July, to make provision to help producers who might suffer exceptional hardship because of the introduction of quotas.

On the other hand, we felt that there were many producers, especially small producers, who would be willing to leave dairying altogether if means were found to make it easier for them to give up production and to move into some new enterprise or, for those of retirement age, to leave agriculture altogether. The quota released by those producers could then be reallocated. We estimated that for Great Britain about 1·25 per cent. of total quota would be needed to meet our objective of helping those small producers who wished to stay in milk production.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): The Minister's tone of argument seems to suggest that the Government want to get rid of small producers and look after the interests of the big ones.

Hon. Members: No!

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood, as the reaction of my hon. Friends shows. That is not what I was saying.

We added a further 1 per cent. to the 1·25 per cent. to assist other categories of producer particularly adversely affected by the introduction of quotas. The objective, therefore, was to buy up 2·25 per cent. of the total quota in Great Britain. In Northern Ireland we set the objective at 5 per cent. of quota in view of the greater reliance on dairying, the rate of expansion in the past few years and the number of small producers there.

The quickest and most effective way of releasing the extra quota needed was to introduce an outgoers scheme under which producers would receive compensation in return for surrendering their quota, which would then be reallocated to those in particular need. Our outgoers scheme accordingly came into operation on 24 July.

Naturally, it has been necessary to impose certain conditions on participants in the scheme. First, they must surrender their quotas in full and will not be able to return to milk production so long as the quota scheme is in operation. Secondly, tenants in England and Wales will have to obtain their landlords' consent to surrender their quota. I am aware that this has led to difficulties for some tenant farmers, but in many cases it has been possible for landlords and tenants to reach amicable agreements allowing the tenant to become an outgoer. The House may be interested to know that 45 per cent. of the payments that we have made under the scheme so far have gone to tenant farmers. That is an important figure, which may surprise many hon. Members. Many tenants have therefore been able to reach agreement with their landlords and I am grateful to the president of the Country Landowners Association for recommending to his members that before any decisions are taken they discuss them with, and consult fully, any of their tenants interested in becoming outgoers.

As regards the cost, we are devoting up to £50 million to the scheme over five years at a rate of 13p per litre of quota surrendered, or the equivalent of about £650 per cow at a yield of 5,000 litres per cow. The response shows this to be a reasonable incentive.

The last feature of our outgoers scheme to which I should like to draw attention is its non-statutory nature.

There were several reasons why we felt it necessary to introduce the scheme without specific parliamentary authority.

First, it was vital to the success of the scheme that it be brought into operation urgently so as to encourage outgoers to surrender their quota before they had used up too much of their 1984-85 allocation. There was, however, no existing United Kingdom legislation on which we could base an outgoers scheme. The Community provision allowing the payment of compensation to outgoers is permissive only and member states are not under any Community obligation to introduce outgoers schemes. For this reason, section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972 did not provide powers for the introduction of a statutory outgoers scheme, although it provided for the introduction of other parts of the supplementary levy arrangements through the dairy produce quota regulations 1984 which were made under section 2 of the Act.

We therefore decided that it would be best to introduce the outgoers scheme on a non-statutory basis and to introduce legislation providing full authority for payments at a later date. Until this legislation was obtained, payments could be made under the authority of the Appropriation Act and the payments that we have made so far have been made under that Act. It is, however, a general principle that the extent to which, and the time for which, payments are made under the Appropriation Act should be minimised. As we had made provision to spend up to £50 million over five years, it was clearly right that specific statutory authority should be obtained as soon as an opportunity in the legislative programme could be found. I made it clear at an early stage that I would seek this authority as soon as possible. Hon. Members may recall that in the meantime I put copies of the Milk Supplementary Levy (Outgoers) Scheme in the Vote Office and the Library prior to our debate on the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1984 on 18 July last year.

I hope I have explained to the House in sufficient detail the need for the Bill. I now turn to the Bill itself and outline clause by clause—there are only seven clauses—what it is intended to do.

Its primary purpose, as I have indicated, is to provide the necessary specific statutory authority to pay compensation to milk producers who agree to discontinue milk production and to surrender their quotas to our reserve. This power is contained in clause 1 and gives effect to part of article 4 of Council Regulation 857 of 1984. This article allows member states to "grant to producers undertaking to discontinue milk production definitively compensation paid in one or more annual instalments".

This article of Community legislation is the fountainhead of the outgoers scheme.

As far as the existing scheme is concerned, payments made in pursuance of the scheme once the Bill is enacted will then be made under the authority of the Bill. Until that time, as I have said, the Appropriation Act will provide the necessary authority. The power to pay compensation contained in clause 1 will cover not only payments made under the existing scheme but also payments under any future scheme.

In addition to this general authority to pay compensation, clause 1 also contains powers which will enable any future outgoers scheme to be made by statutory instrument.

Although no further schemes are planned to succeed the scheme currently in operation, I believe that, as primary legislation is being sought at this time, the opportunity should be taken to provide for statutory schemes should there ever be the need for another outgoers scheme in the future, and I hope the House will agree to that.

Clause 1 also provides that any money paid out under a scheme may be recovered if the person who receives the payment fails to comply with the conditions of a scheme. I am sure hon. Members will agree that public funds should be protected in this way. It would not be right for a producer who had received public money to retain that money after failing to comply with any undertakings he had made to qualify for payment.

I am sure that hon. Members will also appreciate on similar grounds the need for the powers of entry on to land and inspection of records contained in clause 2. The purpose of this clause is to enable checks to be made to ensure that recipients of compensation under an outgoers scheme are not involved in milk production.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South, Down): Before the Minister leaves clause 1, will he make it clear whether there is any obstacle under the Bill or under Community legislation to the use of a quota bought in any particular region to inure to the benefit of producers or purchasers in other regions in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Jopling: I shall check the answer that I give to the right hon. Gentleman, but as I understand it there is no immediate bar to a quota bought in one part of a member state being transferred to another. I shall check that and, if it is mistaken, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will allow my hon. Friend the Minister to refer to it in his winding-up speech.

I can assure the House that we have taken care to draft as narrowly as possible the powers provided by clause 2 consistent with the aim of enforcing the conditions of our scheme and of preventing the abuse of public money.

Clause 3 deals with offences and the penalty to which people will be liable if convicted of those offences. A person will commit an offence if he gives false information or obstructs an authorised officer in order to obtain or retain payment whether on his own behalf or on somebody else's. On summary conviction, the penalty will bea fine of up to level 5 on the standard scale, which currently stands at £2,000.

Clause 4 provides in the usual way that payments made to producers in accordance with clause 1 shall be made out of money provided by Parliament, and that any money recovered where producers fail to comply with the conditions of payment shall be paid into the Consolidated Fund.

Clause 5 defines the Ministers who may exercise functions under the Bill. It means in effect that any future schemes should be made by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Secretary of State for Wales or the Secretary of State for Scotland acting either individually or together in any combination.

Clause 6 applies only to Northern Ireland. Our existing outgoers scheme applies throughout the United Kingdom, but for constitutional reasons this Bill does not apply, with the exception, of course, of this clause, to Northern Ireland. This clause simply provides that an Order in Council which is made for the same purpose as in clauses 1 to 3 of the Bill shall be subject to the negative resolution procedure.

[Mr. Jopling]

Normally, an Order in Council in the transferred functions field would be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure, but as the order which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland intends to lay before the House immediately after the enactment of the Bill will replicate its main provisions, we have thought it appropriate to provide that the order may be made subject to the quicker negative resolution procedure. This will make it easier for the main elements of the Bill to be given effect in Northern Ireland as nearly as possible at the same time as the Bill comes into effect in the rest of the United Kingdom.

As a safeguard, the wording of the clause ensures that the negative resolution procedure may be used only where the Order in Council does what the Bill does.

Clause 7 deals with the short title, commencement and extent of the Bill. It provides that, with the exception of clause 6, the Bill will not come into effect for two months after it is enacted. The purpose is to allow my right hon. Friend time to obtain his Order in Council to introduce similar arrangements in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): The Minister has referred to the possibility of future schemes and, as he will be the first to appreciate, future schemes will be introduced by way of statutory instrument subject to annulment. As my right hon. Friend knows, such a statutory instrument procedure is not subject to amendment in the House. Would he feel able to give an undertaking to the House that, if there should be a future scheme, he would always lay before the House draft regulations which would be the subject of discussion and subsequent amendment?

Mr. Jopling: I shall certainly consider my hon. Friend's point, and it is an issue I would clearly expect to be discussed in Committee of the Bill. If I might ponder on that point, we can them come to our conclusion and announce it to the House at the appropriate time in Committee.

I hope that I have provided the House with a clear exposition of the Bill now before us.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Before my right hon. Friend is too sure that he has done that, will he tell the House where the legislative provision is to be found entitling the recipient to compensation under the outgoers scheme to elect for tax purposes whether it is treated as capital or income? I cannot see any such provision in the Bill. Where is the legislative provision for that circumstance which he described in introducing the original regulations, although not on a statutory basis?

Mr. Jopling: I am sure that my hon. Friend will be aware that matters of taxation are for the Chancellor of the Exchequer and not for me. That is the reason that, as a matter of consequent taxation, this does not come into the Bill. While I cannot do it off the top of my head, I am sure that it is possible to think of many precedents for arrangements to be made in one Bill and the tax treatment of them to be dealt with in existing or future legislation. I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that that point will be covered in other legislation that will be available to enable that situation to occur.

Hon. Members will see that it is a short and relatively straightforward Bill. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State in my Department made clear in our debate on quotas on 18 July last year, its purpose primarily is to put the payment of compensation to milk outgoers on a firm statutory basis. I am aware that certain sections of the media have misunderstood the purpose of the Bill as setting up a new outgoers scheme in addition to the one we already have. This, as I hope I have made clear in my remarks today, is not the case. The Bill is intended to cover the existing scheme and although it would allow another scheme to be set up on a statutory basis, neither I nor any of my right hon. Friends are considering introducing a further new scheme at the present time.

The closing date for applications to take part in this scheme was 28 August 1984. As we are now right in the middle of processing applications and inviting selected producers to make firm offers, I think this is an opportune moment for me to report to the House what progress we are now making with the outgoers scheme.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): My right hon. Friend will be aware that many hon. Members received, either yesterday or today, representations from the National Farmers' Union concerning the present outgoers scheme, and asking that the Bill should be passed as speedily as possible. However, it also pointed out that our attention should be drawn to its inadequacies, especially with regard to meeting the hardship of development cases. In that respect we have been invited to urge the Government to consider an extension of the present scheme. Will my right hon. Friend comment on the NFU's suggestion? If he cannot do so now, perhaps his colleague can do so at the end of the debate.

Mr. Jopling: Given the difficulties of extracting the original £50 million from the Treasury and the problems —[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Any one who has ever tried to extract £50 million from the Treasury knows that that is no mean feat. But given the Government's desire— which has my full support — to reduce Government expenditure, I can give no promise of an extension of the scheme, as that would mean that more public money would be needed at this difficult time.

Mr. Robert Hicks (Cornwall, South-East): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Jopling: Yes, but I think that this had better be the last time.

Mr. Hicks: Bearing in mind the very traumatic experience that the whole principle of imposing milk quotas has had not only on individual producers but on the countryside as a whole, is it not a desirable objective to allow those who wish to take advantage of the outgoers scheme to do so, so that, conversely, those who wish to remain in milk can get as large a quota as possible?

Mr. Jopling: In theory my hon. Friend has brought us a worthy objective from Cornwall. But there is the problem of public spending. However, I hope to give some idea now of how the scheme has gone——

Sir John Farr (Harborough): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Jopling: This must be the last intervention.

Sir John Farr: The House is a little uneasy about what my right hon. Friend said to my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), inasmuch as a parallel order introduced in relation to another subject is not in any way amendable. Surely it would be an inappropriate vehicle to use unless there was a draft order first. In echoing what my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham said, may I ask whether, if a similar order was introduced, it would be likely to relate to milk or to some other agricultural commodity?

Mr. Jopling: My remarks so far about powers for any further scheme apply to milk and not to any other commodity. But I must now get on with my speech.

The initial response was very encouraging, with producers expressing interest accounting for almost nine per cent. of total United Kingdom quota. Thus, in national terms, the scheme was heavily over-subscribed, though regionally the response varied, and overall we expected a significant number of applicants—for example, those whose special case claims were successful—to drop out once they had clarified their exact position. That is, in fact, precisely what has happened.

In England and Wales, 4,826 producers came forward with offers of 1,186 million litres in a full year, which is about four times the planned target of 289 million litres, In Scotland, offers amounted to 9·5 per cent. of quota for Scotland, which is about four times the planned target of 29·8 million litres. We decided, therefore, to give priority to the smallest producers most dependent on dairying, that is, those with fewer than 200,000 litres in England and Wales, and with fewer than 268,000 litres in Scotland. A small number of producers for whom milk is a relatively small part of their total enterprise have also been excluded.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) rose——

Mr. Jopling: I have given way much more than most hon. Members do, and I must now make some progress.

Our first invitations went out to some 2,747 producers with 200,000 litres or less of primary quota allocation in England and Wales, and to 168 producers in Scotland with 268,000 litres or less. As soon as it became clear that a significant proportion of these producers were not going to become outgoers after all, we sent out further invitations in England and Wales in tranches of 25,000 or 50,000 litre increases, beginning with those having between 200,000 and 250,000 litres of quota on offer. Our last batch of invitations went out to producers with between 275,000 and 325,000 litres.

In Scotland invitations have now gone out to producers with up to 300,000 litres. If current trends continue in Great Britain as a whole, we may eventually be able to invite producers with up to 500,000 litres to join the scheme. As we gradually work our way towards the target, full allowance is being made for applicants who are unable to decide whether to become outgoers because their special case appeals or exceptional hardship claims have not yet been finalised. Once their claims have been dealt with they will have four weeks to make up their minds one way or another.

Although the drop-out rate has been fairly high, the scheme is operating satisfactorily in Great Britain. The objective is to take up 289 million litres of milk in England and Wales, and nearly 30 million litres in Scotland. By 4 January, 1,186 producers had committed themselves to the scheme in England and Wales. In total they will surrender some 136 million litres of quota on a full year basis. In Scotland at the same time, 77 producers had committed themselves, providing a total of 12 million litres of quota in a full year.

We therefore now have 148 million litres of quota out of a planned total of 319 million litres already committed in Great Britain. Many producers still have to decide whether to proceed with their applications, and there is still a substantial number who have not yet been invited to join the scheme. There is therefore a good deal of slack to be taken up, and I believe that we shall reach our target of 319 million litres in Great Britain.

In Northern Ireland the position is less satisfactory. Indeed, 565 producers came forward offering 52·9 million litres of quota. This amounted to only four fifths of the target of 66 million litres—which of course represented 5 per cent. of the total quota rather than 2·25 per cent. as in Great Britain—and all those applicants were therefore invited to proceed. As expected, some did drop out, but by 4 January, 166 producers had committed themselves and they will surrender 10·8 million litres of quota in a full year. A further 131 have special case or exceptional hardship claims outstanding and we will not know how much quota will be available from these producers until their claims have been settled.

Thus it is difficult to say what the final position will be in Northern Ireland, but there seems likely to be a substantial shortfall in the quota made available by the scheme. That is disappointing and has obvious implications for small producers and those meeting the exceptional hardship criteria. My colleagues and I are looking to see if there are ways of dealing with the difficulties that arise from the poor response to the scheme in Northern Ireland, but we are not yet in a position to reach decisions.

The precise arrangements for re-allocation of outgoers' quota will vary somewhat between England and Wales, and Scotland and Northern Ireland in the light of local circumstances and priorities. In England and Wales, our intention is, as I have previously made clear, to help exceptional hardship cases and all producers with less than 200,000 litres of quota. In 1985-86 we expect, subject to re-examination of the figures when the outgoers scheme is completed, to be able to give exceptional hardship cases the full amount of quota determined by the tribunal.

Wholesale producers in England and Wales with less than 200,000 litres quota will, subject again to re-examination of the figures, have their quotas for 1985-86 increased by 11 per cent.—these are important figures—that is, sufficient to offset the 9 per cent. cut made in 1984-85 and the 1 per cent. cut to be made for all producers in 1985-86 in accordance with the original agreement last March.

A corresponding increase will be made in the quotas of direct sellers with under 200,000 litres. However, no producer's quota will be raised above 200,000 litres. The adjustments will be tapered to avoid anomalies for producers just above or below the 200,000-litre mark.

Any quota available in 1985-86 after meeting the needs of exceptional hardship cases and increasing the quotas of small producers may be used to help producers who are awarded development quota by the tribunal—that is, producers engaged in expansion programmes, whose awards will have been pruned back in 1984-85 to keep within the total amount of quota available. This figure will be of great interest to the House: in 1984-85 it looks at present as if the cut in those awards in England and Wales may be of the order of 35 per cent. Next year we hope to be able to reduce the cut by this use of the outgoers quota, which is spare.

Because producers who became outgoers will have used a significant part of their quotas before joining the outgoers scheme, the total amount of quota available for re-allocation in 1984-85 will be substantially less than that available for a full year. In 1984-85 we envisaged using all the quota becoming available to help exceptional hardship cases.

Obviously, the United Kingdom is not the only member state to have an outgoers scheme. All other member states, with the exception of Denmark, Greece and Luxembourg, have announced details of their own schemes. Naturally, they vary in character considerably to reflect different circumstances and different aims. For example, Germany hopes to buy 4 per cent. of national quota as against 2·25 per cent. in Great Britain. In Italy payments will be made not for quota surrendered, as in other member states including the United Kingdom, but for each dairy cow slaughtered—the aim being to reduce the size of the national dairy herd by 5 per cent.

Mr. D. E. Thomas rose——

Mr. Jopling: I must finish my speech.

The main differences between the various schemes illustrate the difficulty of drawing direct comparisons between them. For that reason, I do not think that an attempt at comparative analysis would help the House. Nevertheless, compared with other schemes, we are satisfied that our scheme is advantageous for individual producers. The French scheme, for example, offers considerably lower payments to producers than does ours.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: In his progress report on the outgoers scheme the Minister gave us statistics for Scotland, Northern Ireland, and for England and Wales together. Will he ensure that he gives us the statistics for Wales separately from those for England because his right hon. Friend bears equal ministerial responsibility to that of the agricultural Ministers for Scotland and Northern Ireland?

Mr. Jopling: I cannot do that now. I have provided a mass of statistics because I wanted to give the House the best information I had. If the hon. Gentleman cares to table questions about specific points, we shall see what we can do to help him.

Certainly, the encouraging response in Great Britain shows that the rate of payment for the surrender of quota was pitched at about the right level to provide sufficient incentives. Some other member states appear to have been less successful in attracting an adequate response from producers. Both Germany and the Netherlands have had to extend their deadlines for outgoers into this year. In Great Britain, on the other hand, the outgoers scheme closed on 28 August—well over four months ago—and we certainly do not expect there to be any shortfall in the amount of quota offered.

The outgoers scheme is going well, and I hope that hon. Members will agree that the Bill should have a smooth and rapid passage through the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) referred to the NFU documents, and hoped that the Bill would soon be enacted. The Bill is short and narrow in scope, but for all that it is extremely necessary because of the large amount of public money involved. It will benefit individual producers and the country if that money can be disbursed under the authority we seek to provide through the Bill. I have pleasure in commending the Bill to the House.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): We welcome the opportunity for a further debate on the dairy industry. We were interested in what the Minister had to say, especially in the intriguing insight into negotiations between the Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We are always grateful for such information.

If I cannot compliment him on the contents of his speech, I can at least compliment the right hon. Gentleman on the frankness of the short title of the Bill: Milk (Cessation of Production) Bill. We get a lot of upbeat but fundamentally dishonest, short titles to Bills, but with characteristic finesse the Minister gives us a "cessation of production" Bill. There is nothing like calling a spade a shovel. No doubt we can look forward to "cessation of production" Bills for the coal and engineering industries as the Government continue their lunatic progress through the British economy.

Before I turn to the details of the Bill, I appeal to the Minister of State when he replies to say more than his right hon. Friend did about the progress, or lack of it, of the quota system throughout the European Community. That is inextricably tied up with the Bill's provisions. The outgoers scheme is an inextricable part of the quota system.

From previous debates the Government know that we regard the entire business as a dog's breakfast of expediency and incompetence. I do not know where the right hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker) got his reputation for being a wet. First the dairy farmers and now our miners have come to know him for what he really is. It is the misfortune of this particular right hon. Michael that he has been left with the job of rowing this boat ashore. Many dairymen earnestly wish that he was doing something else.

The right hon. Gentleman and the country know that the previous Minister negotiated a lousy deal for the British dairy industry last March. He gave the industry 15 days' notice to reverse the stated objectives of successive Governments for the previous 40 years. Forty years' progress was thrown into reverse virtually overnight. He added insult to injury by selling 6·2 per cent. of our production when the overall European cut was to be only 4·1 per cent. Britain had the best case, but the Minister managed to obtain just about the worst deal. He must be condemned for that failure.

The Minister will have a final chance to redeem himself in the eyes of the industry during the 1985-86 price-fixing negotiations. He should try to ensure that the additional 1 per cent. cut in production that is due in April will not apply to Britain. That may or may not be possible, but the Minister should at least fight for it. He has given away more than enough already, and our producers have suffered more than enough already. We are entitled to demand that he should retreat no further.

The Opposition understand perfectly the need to restrain dairy production in the Community and the need to restructure the industry, but we have consistently pointed to the fact that over-production is not a significant problem in Britain. There was no need for the Minister to make the concessions that he made last year. The Minister of State should say something more about that when he replies.

Against that background, may I ask the Minister for the clear undertaking that the British dairy industry will not be penalised for undershooting its 1984 quota? He has spoken about that in the past, but production has decreased significantly, partly because of drought during the summer, but largely due to the panic measures that were induced in the industry when the quota scheme was sprung on it last year. As a result, there could be a significant shortfall. I was alarmed to read a report in The Scotsman on Tuesday this week, written by its highly reputable agricultural editor, which stated:

"There are now fears that unless quotas can be met dairy farmers will face another imposed production cut this spring as part of the EEC's 1985 farm price package."

If the Minister wishes to nail that point here and now, I should be only too happy to give way to him. He has said that Britain should not be penalised for undershooting the quota this time, and doubts have been expressed again this week. I hope that at some stage we shall be reassured by a Minister, if not by the Minister himself.

The Government are motivated by many primitive fetishes, one of which is that the state should not intervene in the economy. That is probably why the Government always make a mess when they become involved in restructuring industry. In this case, the Minister has one hand on the throat of the dairy industry and the other hand across his eyes because he cannot bear to see the effects of what he is doing, and no wonder. There has been a succession of hasty decisions and rough justice, and the outgoers scheme is a case in point.

The Labour party would support a properly funded and sensibly drafted outgoers scheme. I should explain why we regard this scheme with considerable disdain and how we believe it should be altered. As the Minister said again today, the objective is supposed to be to buy in enough quota for redistribution to small producers to enable them to return to their 1983 production level. That is all very well as far as it goes, but other people need extra quota. If the Minister has any doubt about that, he should consult the members of the panels and tribunals that he set up to deal with claims for secondary quota. There are some extremely pressing cases.

As an example, let us consider the hypothetical small farmer with 50 cows who may have made plans, as he was encouraged to do until 1983, to build up his herd to 100 cows. Events overtook that hypothetical dairy farmer, and he was caught on the hop when the Government introduced the quota scheme. However, he was told that there was an opportunity to obtain secondary quota, so he presented his case to the tribunal, which had to accept it. However, the tribunal had to ignore the first 10 per cent. of the increase applied for, so it could recommend only a further 45 cows. So far, so good. That would be tolerable, but it is not the end of the story. The Government will be able to satisfy only about two thirds of the additional quota recommended by the tribunals. The Minister confirmed that fact today. The figure for Scotland, which has been finalised, is 57·5 per cent. of the additional quota which the tribunals regard as being justified.

Therefore, the hypothetical small farmer who has invested heavily in machinery, buildings and equipment for a herd of 100 cows may be allowed to milk only 80 cows. Such dairy farmers could face bankruptcy. The Minister must recognise the urgent need to obtain more quota for redistribution to such farmers. I could cite umpteen cases of disturbing examples of farmers who are not covered by the criteria laid down for special cases in the present scheme, and the Minister should be worried about that.

We must release more quota for distribution to farmers, who must be allowed to expand if the industry is to have any future. The only way to achieve that is through the outgoers scheme. The Opposition say that the scheme is cheap and nasty. It is nasty because the target of quota to be bought in for redistribution is inadequate and badly defined; it is cheap because the compensation to outgoers is inadequate. As we know, the scheme has been heavily oversubscribed.

The National Farmers Union estimates that there is a need for about 50 per cent. more quota than is covered by the present scheme. That figure may or may not be reasonable, but it appears that the quota the Minister intends to buy in is inadequate. If we need an additional 50 per cent. on top of what is already provided, that would cost an extra £25 million over five years. That is not an unduly high price for a secure future for an important industry such as the dairy industry, and it is far below the amounts provided in other countries, no matter how the Minister may try to avoid those facts.

The Minister's scheme will cost £50 million in compensation over five years. The first year of the scheme in France will cost £80 million, and a total of £200 million over three years. In Germany, the first year will cost £25 million, and the next 10 years will cost £206 million. On another basis, under the British scheme, outgoers will receive £130 a year for five years for each cow relinquished, which is a total of £650 per cow over five years. We should compare that with a possible payment of up to £940 per cow over two months under the Italian scheme. I recognise that that is an odd scheme, but it represents much money——

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The comparisons are interesting, but they do not take into account the fact that Italy, Germany and France have many more small producers.

Mr. Home Robertson: I accept that point, but what I am trying to say is that, once again, the Minister has sold short British producers. In most cases we are talking about small producers. They are the people who the Minister is encouraging to come out, so in that respect they should be treated equally.

The Labour party feels especially strongly about the fact that the scheme includes nothing for employees who will lose their jobs because of the process. Many creamery staff are being made redundant, and the Transport and General Workers Union estimates that about 250 dairy stockmen on farms will lose their livelihoods because of the scheme. There is no special compensation to help those people to make new lives. The Dutch and Danish outgoers schemes provide some compensation for dairy stockmen, and we demand that the British scheme should contain similar provisions.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): The hon. Gentleman seemed to be suggesting that anyone losing his job as a result of a farmer going out of business would be entitled to redundancy payment. Is he suggesting that the redundancy payment should be artificially high, say, similar to that offered to coal miners?

Mr. Home Robertson: There are parallels in other industries, but these are exceptional circumstances. This restructuring was introduced as a result of European Governments' policies, and there are grounds for suggesting that if the farmer receives compensation, the employees who lose their jobs should also receive some.

The Minister should consider further the consequences of the scheme for the people concerned, and for the communities where those people live and the land that they farm. The current scheme is designed to move about 80,000 cows off existing holdings, or, in other words, to take about 150,000 acres out of dairy farming. We understand that, on the whole, smaller farms will be affected.

For the sake of argument, let us say that between 1,500 and 2,000 small dairy units will disappear under the provisions of the scheme. We accept that part of the scheme may be necessary, but we would approach the problem in a different way. Let us consider again the hypothetical small farmer with 50 cows. Instead of struggling on and trying to get some additional quota, he may decide to opt for the outgoers scheme. Dairy farming will then be banned on that farm for the foreseeable future.

The pay-off for the farmer will be £6,500 a year for five years. That sum will be taxed in one way or another, and a substantial proportion of it may well be committed to the bank because of previous borrowings. The final figure of £32,500 is not very substantial. It will not be adequate for the establishment of alternative enterprises and employment in the areas affected. Most of the farms concerned will be in traditional grassland areas in the west of the country. What is the alternative land use in such areas? Beef production, which might seem to be the most obvious answer, is in surplus too. The Minister will therefore be throwing those areas into turmoil.

Some older farmers may well retire on the outgoers scheme. What will happen to their land, and the fragile rural communities in which it is situated? I fear that rural depopulation may be aggravated. I have personal experience of what that would mean, as I live in the Scottish borders, which have suffered from rural depopulation for many years. The rural areas are entitled to more civilised treatment from any Government.

The Minister may achieve his short-term objective within the constraints laid down by the Treasury. He was kind enough to tell us how such matters are arranged. However, I wonder whether he understands the consequences, and I seriously doubt whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer cares about them. We are debating the major restructuring of a major industry, which, sadly, will entail taking some land out of dairying. The Minister's policy is to buy in quota at the lowest possible price and then to wash his hands of the consequences. That is not good enough. He should be offering positive incentives and responsible guidance on alternative enterprises suitable for the former dairy units.

While considering what happens to the money paid under the outgoers scheme, I should like briefly to refer to the skullduggery engaged in by landlords in some areas. I refer the Minister to a report in Farmers Weekly of 21 December. Under the headline the report states:

"Rent 'blackmail' for milk outgoers",

"In Yorkshire, complaints of blackmail are being applied to demands on tenants wishing to quit milk. The owner's signature of consent"— that is, the landlord's signature—

"for a tenant to take the Outgoers' Scheme is being made conditional upon the tenant first agreeing to a hefty rent increase or to paying a cash sum to the landowner . . . More immoral still was the action of one landlord, working through nationally-known agents, who had not only made owner's consent conditional on agreeing a rent increase, but had insisted that the existing rental should operate for only two years, rather than the legal minimum of three years."

The Secretary of State for Scotland is not renowned for oppressing landlords, but he has at least managed to prevent that particular abuse in the case of Scottish tenant farmers. There should be similar safeguards for tenants in England and Wales. The payments are mean enough already. There is no justification for allowing landlords to get their hands on any of the money. The Minister was warned about that possibility during the debate on 18 July. He sought to sidestep the matter. The problem has now arisen, and he should tell us more about it when he replies to the debate.

We had hoped that the Minister would say more about the question of transferring quota from one farm to another. Clearly, more flexibility is needed. We have our views as to how that flexibility should be achieved, but I wish to refer in detail to two aspects of the scheme that seemed to us to be too restricted.

First, the Minister has decided to restrict the outgoers scheme to small producers, and he is taking a very long time to decide which applicants to accept. As the months go by there is tranche after tranche, and the uncertainty that afflicts the industry is prolonged.

Mr. Jopling indicated dissent.

Mr. Home Robertson: The Minister may shake his head, but many people who applied six months ago are still waiting for a response, and that is causing uncertainty.

The Minister should buy in any quota that any producer wants to relinquish, within reason, and subject to alternative enterprises being available for the holdings concerned. Such a policy would be more flexible and might encourage some bigger producers to give up dairying in areas where feasible alternative enterprises are available. In that way a significant amount of quota could be bought back under the scheme, and the quota thus made available could enable proportionately far more smaller dairy farms to stay in business. That would be better for the broad rural economy.

Secondly, I cannot see why clause 1 has to compel producers to stop milk production altogether. The Opposition agree with the submission made by the Farmers Union of Wales that partial surrenders of quota should also be covered by the scheme. Such a scheme would make it possible to encourage dairy farmers to diversify their enterprises instead of abandoning dairying altogether. I urge the Minister to consider that point further. It is one to which we shall certainly return in Committee.

The Opposition are far from impressed with what the Bill does with the outgoers scheme. Every organisation representing farming interests has expressed the view that the scheme is pitifully inadequate. We are appalled by the way in which the Government have treated the dairy industry in the past year. Together with a number of Conservative Members, we voted against the quota regulations at the outset. The industry needs sensible restructuring. What it is getting is closer to rapid strangulation.

We do not oppose the principle of compensating outgoers, so we will not vote against Second Reading. However, we shall seek significant improvements in the Bill in Committee.

4.58 pm

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): The most important positive aspect of my right hon. Friend's introduction of the Bill was the flexibility that there will be. As there are, of course, pressures on legislative time, the best compromise is certainly for future additions to the existing scheme to be effected by statutory instrument. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) suggested, there should be a draft laid, so that hon. Members can respond to the Minister's ideas, which will then come before the House, as in the case of the quota regulations themselves, in a form in which they can pass rapidly into law. That is the best compromise for the further development of the scheme, and there is no doubt that there is a dramatic need for further development.

My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) is not able to be here today because of a twice postponed meeting with farmers in his constituency. He has asked me to cover points that he would have wished to raise had he been here. There is no doubt that there is special hardship for those who have invested in development at the direct encouragement of the Government agency, the agricultural development advisory service. We should not be mealy-mouthed about this. Right up until the day before quotas were introduced, officers in the Ministry for which my right hon. Friend is responsible encouraged farmers to expand and paid a grant from public funds to enable them to do so. That is the justification for putting public money into the outgoers scheme, additional to what has been announced. It is clear that the 2·5 per cent. which is being held back, and which made the total of a 9 per cent. reduction on the 1983 figure, is inadequate—as my right hon. Friend admitted—to meet the assessment made by the panels and the tribunals of those who have applied for secondary quota on grounds of development, the Government being party to the encouragement of that development.

I am glad that today, unlike his earlier appearances at the Dispatch Box, my right hon. Friend did not pretend that farmers should have foreseen what he himself did not foresee. He adopted that wholly unacceptable posture last year. We should commend such progress. I am afraid that my right hon. Friend must go back to the Treasury and say that the litreage that he has been able to buy in through the outgoers scheme—he knew what the maximum would be, because it was limited by the £50 million—is not adequate to meet the full exceptional development conditions which are set out in his own regulations.

Although the regulations provide for scaling, in acknowledging the need for this secondary quota my right hon. Friend is acknowledging the case for buying back, at public expense, enough quota to meet those needs as assessed. I cannot press him to do that too enthusiastically. He will have to do it in the end—the sooner and with the better grace, the better.

We should consider the case of other aspects of Government policy that are equally unavoidable. I am not pretending that the EEC surplus is the result of the Government's policy. Successive Governments have endeavoured to persuade the EEC to tackle this wholly visible problem long before it did. Some of us—I can say this as it is a matter of public record—called for quotas seven or eight years ago, before the massive expansion in France and Ireland, which has resulted in quotas being introduced so agonisingly for many of our small producers.

I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister would comment on my next point. A pool was held back by the EEC for extra distribution to areas that are especially dependent on milk production. I never heard from the Dispatch Box by what formula such areas were to be recognised. Was it a matter of political pressure, or was it one of overt formula which can be tested in other areas, including the United Kingdom, to see whether they qualify as much as, for example, the Republic of Eire? Consideration of income tax to which producers are liable in the United Kingdom and the notorious absence of taxation of farmers in Southern Ireland reveals that what matters is not just net income—the difference between gross returns and gross expenditure — but post-tax income. Producers' standard of living, their ability to undertake capital development or to reduce debt, whether in southern Ireland, the United Kingdom or Luxembourg, depends on how much money they have after tax. On what formula is the held-back litreage allocated?

The outgoers scheme is rendered necessary by the quota system, so it is wholly in order on Second Reading to discuss matters without which the Bill would not have come to the Floor of the House. This is our only opportunity of a Second Reading on this matter as there will not be subsequent Bills. The implications of the Bill depend on the future of the quota system in the EEC, even after Spain and Portugal join, as they are likely to do. One of the prime reasons for present circumstances is the pressure on the EEC budget. It is highly likely, I hope, that quotas might be imposed on olive oil and wine as well. If so, it is probable that France will press for Algeria's right to send wine to the EEC not to be taken out of the French quota but to be treated as an obligation of the EEC because it has come in for many years. That has been recognised since Lomé. A similar analogy can be drawn with regard to New Zealand dairy produce. It has come to the United Kingdom for many years for reasons that are widely known. It is just as much an habitual inflow to the EEC as Algerian wine. My right hon. Friend should be working towards treating the import of milk products from New Zealand to the EEC not as a charge against the British quota. That is the best way in which to resolve the dilemma. Without such a resolution it will not be Britain but one small section of people in Britain—our dairy farmers—who will pay for New Zealand imports. A national obligation should be a Communitywide obligation. It is to that end that I would encourage him to work.

I wish to stress the strong resentment felt about the delay in the results of appeals. It is believed that there is inadequate secretarial staff on the panels and the appeal tribunals so that people have to wait eight, nine or 10 weeks for the result of appeals. It is also widely believed that although there is a common law throughout the United Kingdom, panels, often adjacent to each other, decide on widely different allocations of secondary quota although the factual bases of the cases may have been similar. This leads to considerable resentment.

I wish to draw to my right hon. Friend's attention one category of claim for secondary quota that has been dealt with parsimoniously by tribunals and panels. Where a small farmer has extended his premises with his own hands instead of employing a contractor he has not been treated well. In other words, his commitment to expansion has been out of his own resources, in some cases without the use of any Government grant. The pattern in these cases is that the panels have been conspicuously parsiminious in allocating a secondary quota although, had the physical expansion of facilities been financed even partly by Government grant and had there been bills to show from a contractor, it seems that there would have been a much greater allocation of secondary quota. I hope my right hon. Friend will agree that this is unjust.

So long as the facts are demonstrable about the expansion of equipment or buildings or the purchase of cattle, it should not be relevant to the determination of secondary quota whether the expenditure was part of an ADAS-approved scheme, or whether money was lent by a bank. Even though those may be supporting evidence, that is not the essence of whether someone was committed to expansion. There is greater hardship when a farmer has paid 100 per cent. of the cost out of his own resources than when part has been paid by grant.

As many of us knew when it was introduced, the scheme is imperfect. It will be tolerable only if my right hon. Friend and his right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales—he is not on his own in this battle—can extract from the Treasury the tiny sum of about £25 million—we are not talking about a large sum—to buy enough quota to allow the allocation of secondary quota to go through without diminution. That is the most important point that needs to be made in the debate so that the Bill can be welcomed for its ability to bring in quickly an extension of the existing scheme.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): It is well known that, although the milk quota system has been in effect for more than nine months, the whole scheme appears still to be a complete shambles and, in the opinion of the majority of farmers, far from satisfactory. When one talks to members of the National Farmers Union, the Farmers Union of Wales, the Country Landowners Association and others involved with the industry, one finds that they are all despondent and will never forgive the Minister of Agriculture for making such a political blunder as he made last year.

There may be a lull in the protests, but this is only because of under-production due to various factors. I predict that in a year's time the position will be far worse if drastic action is not taken by the Government. As one who represents an area where the majority of dairy farmers have small or modest holdings—this is true of Wales as a whole and of many parts of Britain—I feel strongly that the Government have signally failed to protect the interests of small farmers and have stood by seemingly indifferent as the rural economy has deteriorated as a direct result of the quota system.

The Bill is unlikely to help and should be modified drastically to ensure justice to an industry that has received more than its fair share of knocks in the past year. My colleagues and I will not vote against the Second Reading because it is the wish of many people that the Bill should pass through the House with all possible speed, but unless the Government will accept amendments to the benefit of dairy producers it is more than likely that my colleagues and I will vote against Third Reading.

I understand that by mid-December only 1,060 producers had applied to go out of milk production, and of those the majority appeared to be farmers with 30 to 50 cows. As the Minister did not like what I said earlier in the debate, it would be useful if he could confirm this when he is replying and also give a breakdown of how many farmers in Wales, in Dyfed particularly and in various regions of England and Scotland have gone for this option. If the correct figures are given on the Floor of the House, we shall know whether the Government are trying to persuade small farmers to give up dairying.

Because of the provisions outlined in the Bill and the operation of the quota system in general, it is inevitable that it is the small producer who will be forced out of business while the larger farmer, because of the nature of his enterprise, will be able to carry on with just a small adjustment in production. Like many other hon. Members, I feel that it is fundamentally wrong for this discrimination against the small producer to continue. Ways should be found to alleviate the hardship that many of them face. There should be more flexibility.

As it stands, the Bill makes it a condition of the outgoers scheme that a producer must surrender his quota in its entirety if he wishes to participate in the scheme. If farmers were given the option of giving up only part of their quota there would be a much greater response from the larger producer who would be more able to diversify. This would release more quota for use by the smaller producer who is not able to diversify.

If the scheme is to be successful, the terms for outgoers should be more generous. I do not think that 13p per litre or £650 per cow is sufficiently attractive to make the scheme effective. The sums involved should in all fairness be tax free as the money would be needed immediately for investment in other agricultural ventures. It should not be treated like ordinary income or profit.

I was disappointed when the Minister did not say specifically that the money handed over to the producers would be tax free. He should consider this again, because these farmers will sell the cattle directly off the farm and will be starting a new enterprise the following day. Consequently, this will merely be passing a sum of money from an old business to a new one. That is why it should be tax free. That is food for thought for the Minister during the next few weeks while the Bill is in Committee.

It would also be helpful if at this stage, with his hand on his heart for once, the Minister could reassure agriculture that if a farmer chooses to go out of dairying and into sheep or beef production, for example, he will not be faced this time next year, or in the near future, with another quota system on those products. What guarantees can he give on that point?

Many hon. Members are aware that there are many county council smallholdings throughout the country. I have received a letter from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) who received it from Lord Hooson. It has been written by Andrew Thomas, group secretary of the NFU in Newtown, and states:

"On behalf of our member Mr. E. J. Davies, Cefncanol, Penstrowed, Newtown I should like very much to bring to your attention his situation as regards being a tenant farmer on a County Council small holding producing milk.

Mr. Davies applied to go out of milk, wishing to take advantage of the Outgoers Scheme. Powys County Council his landlord, have stated that he cannot take advantage of this benefit and go out of milk, unless the quota to which he is entitled was to stay on one of their holdings. Please find enclosed a copy of a letter requested from Powys County Council on behalf of Mr. Davies which sets out his position.

I am sure that you have received many such letters as a result of the implementation of milk quotas, but the problems amongst Tenant Farmers are very prominent. These problems need sorting out urgently. It is a very uncomfortable, and distressing situation to have land lord set against tenant in a way such as this, and the sooner the position ends the better for all parties concerned.

Mr. Davies requests that the matter be pressed with the powers that be, until a favourable reply is forthcoming. We are sure that we can rely on your support at this time.

Yours sincerely,
Andrew Thomas
Group Secretary

P.S. Mr. Davies has gone out of milk, has refused to sign a Milk Marketing Board letter in order to resign his licence, and is awaiting guidance on his position. We hope some favourable outcome will be forthcoming."

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Does my hon. Friend agree that the problem highlighted in that letter causes difficulties not only to tenant farmers but also to the Powys county council in the management of its substantial smallholdings estate, and that the county council as landlord in that case shares the anxiety of the tenants and feels that it cannot satisfactorily manage its estate until some provisions are made to compensate tenant farmers for coming out of milk production?

Mr. Howells: I entirely agree with my hon. and learned Friend. We are both aware that many dairy farmers are tenants with various county councils throughout Britain. I am sure that they will read with interest the advice which the Minister will give.

We in this country have always believed in fair play and justice, and these qualities are manifestly absent from the arrangements proposed for getting rid of milk surpluses in Britain. I hope that the Minister of Agriculture, the Secretaries of State for Wales and Scotland, and the Minister responsible for dairy production in Northern Ireland will go to Brussels this spring and make a special plea on behalf of these farmers to ensure that we get an additional quota for small producers who are so dependent on the milk industry for their living. Following this debate, I hope that Ministers will assure us that they will have another look at the content of the Bill and will do what they can to improve it in order to ensure that British dairy producers are well looked after in the future. They deserve that, because they have had a very rough treatment during the last 12 months by this Government.

5.26 pm

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): I entirely agree with the appeal of the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) that there should be flexibility in the application of the quota scheme. That is what the debate is all about, even though it is secondary to the fact that we are generally agreed that the Bill should be given a Second Reading. In that respect, I welcome the measure.

By way of introduction, I hope that my few brief remarks will be considered as an intervention rather than a speech, in the pious hope that as a result it will not be counted against my quota of speeches in Mr. Speaker's computer.

All of us, perhaps, have major reservations about the quota system. It was introduced at the worst possible time of year and with the most regrettable suddenness. As my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) has already pointed out, it was also introduced at a time when ADAS, as the organ of the Ministry of Agriculture, was encouraging milk production. Even so, and in the realisation that in saying this the wrath of God if not the NFU might be brought down on my head, it is a miracle that the introduction of the scheme has been so relatively smooth in such a short time.

All of us representing large numbers of dairy farmers were inundated with letters to start with. My response to most of them was, "I appreciate all the problems and difficulties with which you are faced, but let us give it a little time for the system to settle down. After all, it works in some other parts of the world, and there is no reason why it should not work here."

Broadly speaking, the system is beginning to settle down, and we must now look to the future and try to smooth off some of the rough edges. It must be evolved sensibly and realistically so that the disadvantages that exist are tackled in the best possible way in the interests of farmers, and small farmers in particular.

I strongly support the NFU's plea that changes in the system should be introduced to enable an interchange between wholesale and direct sale quotas. Several of my constituents are deeply concerned about this. I know that my right hon. Friend and his colleagues are sympathetic, but I hope that somehow they can twist the arms of their ministerial colleagues in the Council of Ministers and obtain some concessions. Presumably this must be of some advantage to European farmers just as much as to our own.

Secondly, there is the question of the transfer of quotas and also the question of the relative importance of the interests of the tenant farmer and the landlord. The National Farmers Union has said that it is vital that quotas should be vested in the producer and should be made saleable on conditions which would include the reasonable protection of the landlord's interests. I agree entirely with that. Quite unwittingly, it is, unfortunately, a fact that the balance of advantage lies with the landlord. I say that in no critical spirit; it is just how it has worked out.

I agree strongly with the Minister that the president of the Country Landowners Association has spoken with maximum responsibility about trying to ensure that his members are as objective as they can be in responding to requests by tenant farmers that they should be allowed to join the outgoers scheme. Nevertheless, as one tenant farmer of the Ministry of Defence in my constituency pointed out, at present the tenant under the system is worse off and the landlord inadvertently is better off, since the quota system enhances the value of a let dairy, not only as of now but looking to the future, should a tenant farmer retire and a collection of potential new tenants tender for that farm. Therefore it is important that the balance should be redressed, hopefully as a result of agreement between the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on the one hand and the NFU and the CLA on the other.

My next point is that there is some criticism of the rules and operations of the tribunals. A number of my constituents have complained to me about this aspect of the scheme. One point which was drawn to my attention by one tenant farmer was that the tribunal before which he appeared apparently always based its judgment on numbers of cows rather than on the efficiency of the producer. The farmer who came to see me said that he had invested a considerable amount of money in modernising his dairy with the intention partly of increasing the number of cows in his dairy—he was quite prepared to accept that he would not be allowed to do that—but mostly with the intention of increasing the efficiency of output of his existing herd. He claimed that that point was not fully taken account of by the tribunal before which he appeared.

Another farmer grumbled justifiably about the delays in obtaining decisions from the tribunal. In a letter which he wrote to me recently he said:

"The quota scheme came into operation on April 2nd last year. It would seem that I have to wait patiently for nearly ten months before I can have any indication of the parameters upon which I have to plan my business in future. Even then I shall have to wait at least another month before I can even hazard a guess as to the possible cutback in any secondary quota award. Such treatment is quite unacceptable".

I think that we would all sympathise with the point he is making. I realise the difficulties, but what he has done is to emphasise the need for speed in drawing these matters to a conclusion.

Finally, I make a strong plea for the interests of new entrants into farming to be taken fully into account. Many new farmers, whether owner-occupiers or tenants, go into farms which, for one reason or another, are not in good order. Perhaps they have been run down because the previous farmer was getting old and was not quite so enthusiastic as he had been in his younger days. Account has to be taken of considerations of that kind. Therefore I hope it will be possible to give special consideration to new entrants.

In other words, I am emphasising the need for flexibility, common sense and a steady evolution of the scheme. I believe that it is beginning to work reasonably well. I think that, as time goes on, it can work much better. Such a system works perfectly satisfactorily in other parts of the world. I hope that we shall learn from others. I have great confidence that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department will ensure that the scheme continues to make progress.

5.35 pm

Mr. James Nicholson (Newry and Armagh): I should like to refer to that part of the Bill which relates to Northern Ireland. As the Minister said, Northern Ireland legislation will go through by Order in Council but will follow fairly closely the Bill which is before us today. As other hon. Members have said, the Bill is a bad Bill. It does not go far enough. I agree with previous hon. Members who said that the Bill does not do sufficient to entice farmers to go out of milk production. There is no tax allowance. If a farmer turns from one part of the industry to another part of the industry, consideration ought to be given to that fact.

May I also draw attention to the serious lack of attendance at this debate by Ministers from the Northern Ireland Office. This is not the first time when a major debate has taken place that not one Minister has appeared on the Government Front Bench to represent Northern Ireland agriculture or to hear what is to be said. This happens continuously. On behalf of those whom I represent and on behalf of all those whom the Ulster Unionist party represents I have to say that we find this deplorable and disgraceful. Especially on a day when Northern Ireland questions have been asked and Ministers are here, it is deplorable that they cannot make time to attend this important debate. It is small wonder that Northern Ireland agriculture is in the position it finds itself in today if Ministers cannot make time to come to listen to this important debate on the most important industry in Northern Ireland.

I should much prefer it if measures such as the outgoers scheme were not necessary. We are putting small farmers out of business. Many of them do not wish to go out of business but they see no alternative. In the longer term this can only have a damaging effect on the industry. Small farmers in Northern Ireland are the backbone of the agricultural industry. Many of them, as I hope to demonstrate, have no alternative. This is to the detriment of dairy farmers in Northern Ireland. Some of these small producers, who are making a living by producing milk from 16 or 25 cows, find that those cows are more important to them than the 200 cows belonging to another farmer. From that point of view the scheme is very important to the small farmer in Northern Ireland.

When the Minister of State addressed the House on 3 July 1984 he said that he proposed to buy up 5 per cent. of the total quota in Northern Ireland because of the large proportion of small producers there. In his reply he said:

"We have adopted this approach because we recognise the special problems of Northern Ireland, which include an especially high number of small producers. That is why we have given it favourable terms under the outgoers' scheme." — [Official Report, 3 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 235.]

I do not for one moment doubt the sincerity with which those statements were made, but with hindsight, as the Minister has recognised today, we can say that the scheme never got off the ground in Northern Ireland. It has been a disaster there.

The Department of Agriculture received offers in the region of 4 per cent. of total production and to date has only had firm offers in the region of 10 million litres—one sixth of what the Minister proposed to buy out. Placed against the Minister's original intention to purchase 66 million litres in Northern Ireland, that 10 million litres pales into insignificance.

The Minister recognised today and in earlier debates the importance of the scheme to Northern Ireland dairy production and dairy farmers, especially the small farmers. What proposals has he to rectify the position? Will he assure the House tonight that no farmer in Northern Ireland will be placed at a disadvantage by the scheme's failure?

No doubt many would ask why there was not the same enthusiasm for the outgoers scheme in Northern Ireland as in other parts of the United Kingdom. The main reason, as I outlined earlier, is that the dependence of the small farmer for his livelihood on milk production with no alternative to turn to means that he had to have second, and indeed third, thoughts about even considering entering the scheme. The fact that the present uptake has been only 10 million litres and that few farmers are likely to come forward in the next few months as they receive their results from the tribunals, shows that they will, if at all possible, try to continue and do their best. Farmers felt that they had no alternative. The will to survive will have to remain with them as they get the results in future.

Most will agree that the famers placed in the worst position of all in Northern Ireland — perhaps in the United Kingdom it would be different—are those with fewer than 40 cows or 200,000 litres. In many instances they were not expanding. They did not contribute in any way to the surplus. The vast majority of them had the same herd size five or six years ago. Consequently, they received no allocation of secondary quota from expansion. It has also been extremely difficult to achieve anything for them under the hardship scheme.

Those with 16 to 25 cows have come out worst of all. For such a farmer the loss of one cow in any given 12 months will hit his income hard. But a farmer with 100 or more cows who loses 10 can sustain that loss. That is why I am most angered about the position of the small farmer in my area.

On 3 July and again today the Minister said:

"We shall be aiming specifically to make extra quota available to dairy farmers who produce less than 200,000 litres annually".—[Official Report, 3 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 168.]

Broadly speaking, that is what I have been referring to in my remarks.

I could support that proposal and I have no doubt that my colleagues could too. It would effectively restore the small farmer to the 1983 production level. Will the Minister exercise equality for all and extend the proposal throughout the United Kingdom because it has great merit? If it were extended to Northern Ireland it would go part of the way to solving many of the problems of many of our small farmers.

This afternoon, the Minister said that he hoped to bring farmers in England and Wales in the region of over 200,000 litres up to the 1983 production level. For Scotland he referred to figures—I stand to be corrected —in the region of 250,000 litres. Northern Ireland is entitled to the same consideration and to the same proposal. I hope that when the Minister replies he will deal with that point.

I want to take this opportunity to assure the Minister that I do not propose to refer to the long-debated 65,000 tonnes which we never received in the first place. But that does not mean for one moment that we accept the situation or agree with the explanations which have been given. The issue is still at the forefront of our minds. Instead, I want to deal with the buy-out scheme in particular.

The main effect of quotas is when they fall on the shoulders of those who may be forced to pay levy at the end of the time. To the best of my knowledge Northern Ireland is the only part of the United Kingdom at present where levy is due. It is hard to get up-to-date figures because of the holiday but the best figure that is available is for the first six months where collection is due. At that stage farmers were due to pay over £5 million in levies in Northern Ireland. Agriculture in Northern Ireland in the present climate, certainly dairy producers, cannot afford that sort of figure. It is bad enough to have to pay the co-responsibility levy, which should not have been imposed in the first place and is no longer achieving what it was brought in for, but it is even worse to have to pay the levy. Unfortunately, some farmers are beginning to come to the conclusion that it will disappear. Let me make it clear —I hope that the Minister will do so when he replies— that it will not disappear and farmers will eventually have to pay that levy at whatever level is finally worked out.

I have attended a fair number of tribunals and panels while representing my constituents over the past couple of months. Some farmers are in an unfortunate position. There are those who, under the regulations, do not qualify for claims for development, hardship or epizootic disease. To coin an old phrase, they have fallen between two stools. Everyone recognises that they should receive something, but there is nothing. There is no way under the regulations by which they can receive any consideration for quota at all. They are mainly the medium size farmers with between 50 and 80 cows in a herd. They are the farmers who appear to be hit hardest.

As has been said, no Government have the right to put a farmer, who has to change within 15 days or even one day, out of business, and certainly the EEC has no right to do that.

I implore the Minister to give further serious consideration to the plight of Northern Ireland's small dairy farmers and to introduce new sound proposals which will enable us to tell our farming constituents that this House recognises their difficulties and is reacting accordingly.

5.51 pm

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): I am grateful for this opportunity to speak on an important subject. I welcome the Bill because the outgoers scheme was announced in reply to a letter from, and parliamentary question tabled by, me.

As my right hon. Friend said at the outset of his remarks, the scheme has been introduced because of the category of small farmers whose land can be used for nothing but dairy farming. Faced with the dramatic cut imposed on them by the quota scheme, some of them, perhaps because of the stage they have reached in their farming careers, have no alternative but to get out, and it is right that the Community should have a scheme to help them leave agricultural production.

Still well to the fore in the minds of all hon. Members who represent areas with a heavy concentration of dairy farmers is the suddenness with which the scheme was introduced and the shock that it presented to dairy farmers, not to mention the difficulties they encountered in trying to plan their businesses following that shock. However, I do not share many of the criticisms that have been directed —particularly from the Labour Front Bench, although there was an element of tongue-in-cheek in some of those criticisms—at my right hon. Friend.

I direct my criticism at the Council of Ministers, at the EEC, because I have great sympathy for a dairy farming constituent who wrote to me during this dramatic time saying, in effect, "I read the writing on the wall. Some years ago I realised that such a scheme would have to be imposed because I, like my dairy farming colleagues, recognised that we could not continue, as members of the EEC, indefinitely over-producing. I have not pushed up my production and I hope that you will not introduce a scheme that will help bail out those who have done so." I have sympathy with his foresight, but we also have a responsibility to those who were directed to increase production under some of the development schemes.

[Mr. Nicholas Baker]

Any institution such as the EEC which is responsible for running an industry such as dairying and which gives those working in that industry so little time to prepare for change — change introduced in a sudden, almost retrospective, way—leads one to question the viability of that institution. If the CAP cannot be changed in a more business-like, gradual and farsighted way, we are right to question the institution. People who run businesses must be able to plan their future in a better way than dairy farmers have been able to do.

We must consider the effect of such sudden change not only on dairy farmers but on ancillary industries. Some of the most heart-rending cries to which I have listened have come from those engaged, for example, in drainage and dredging, industries that help with the clay soil of Dorset, which is suitable for few other forms of agricultural production.

I had hoped that a way would be found to resolve the problem of the quota belonging to the landlord and therefore remaining with the land. I hope that the Government will continue to devote to this the attention that they were devoting last autumn to securing agreement between representatives of landlords and tenants so that the quota can be transferred from one genuine producer to another. That is particularly relevant to tenants of county council farms, where it should be easier to arrange such a compromise.

Reference has been made to the difficult position faced by those who raised their production under one of the development schemes, who have been, in a preliminary way, entitled to secondary quota but who have been told that that quota must be cut. I hope that my right hon. Friend will see what he can do to help people in that position, particularly those who, as part of raising their production, have changed their breed of cows. There seems to be no provision for farmers who have changed from one breed to another, yet that category of farmer is being unfairly treated.

I support what has been said about the interchange between wholesale and direct sale quotas. I appreciate that in other EEC countries this alleviation of the scheme might be abused more than would be the case here, but that problem should not be incapable of resolution and I hope that my right hon. Friend will find a way of dealing with the matter.

May we be told what other EEC countries are doing and how far they have progressed in implementing their schemes? United Kingdom dairy farmers are watching how their counterparts are applying the schemes in their countries. If they are not implementing them adequately, we shall have to revise the way in which we look at the whole issue.

I consider the Bill to be an essential element in making the quota scheme fair and tolerable and in helping those who leave dairy farming, and for that reason I wish the measure a speedy passage.

5.58 pm

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): I take issue with the hon. Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) on only one point. He was critical of the way in which milk quotas had been introduced by the European Community and suggested, in effect, that we should consider the whole decision-making process of implementing measures of this kind.

To be fair to the EEC, one sees from examining the documents that the Commission must be given credit for saying that a quota system would have to be introduced some time before it was implemented by the British Government. Our Government, in splendid isolation at one time, argued that the whole matter could be resolved by the price of milk. The result was the the British Government had to make the change overnight, whereas the European Community had recognised that a measure such as this would have to be introduced. It is worth getting on the record exactly who made the overnight change. It was not the European Community but our Government.

This Bill is of a type I have seen all too frequently in my years here—one against which one would love to vote but cannot do so. It offers far too little to the dairy farmers, but to vote against it would be to give them nothing. Being a good, sensible west country man, given the choice between very little and nothing, it would not take me long to make up my mind which of the options I would prefer. However, while I am willing to go along with the Bill, it still gives cause for much dissatisfaction.

If I had to describe the Bill in a few lines, I would describe it as a Bill to buy out small producers to help to satisfy other small producers. The net result in our dairy producing areas will be fewer small milk producers. That is why my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) and my other colleagues on the Liberal Bench take the view that this Bill is anti the small farmer. In the end, he will be annihilated and will be made an even rarer part of our mixed economy when those of us who live in the country know just how important he is. The Government could have dealt with the matter differently if they had so chosen.

There is no point in rehearsing the economic effects on rural areas. If I wanted to select 20 or 30 hon. Members who knew and understood the effect of such measures on the rural areas, I would select the 30 hon. Members who are in the Chamber now. Sometimes I wish that I could press a button to move out all the hon. Members who are here and bring in the ones who are not interested enough to come to listen to the debate, because they are the ones we have to convince of the logic of the argument. I fear that the problems in the industry have only just started.

One of the most unfortunate parts of the Bill, and the regulations that go with it, is the Government's decision on the relevant merits of the tenant and the landlord. I am aware that there are just about as many relationships between tenants and landlords as there are tenants and landlords. In some cases, the landlord has built the cowhouse, invested the capital and ensured that the farm is efficient, and should have control over the quota. However, the Government have not said that they will recognise the landlord's position in that case, but have legislated on the basis that in every tenant-landlord relationship it is always the landlord who has invested the money to build up the farm.

The legislation automatically gives an absolute veto to the landlord regardless of the circumstances and the use of the outgoers scheme. There is no logic in that, and I suspect that it is a political reflection of who really has power in the Government. Given an argument between the Country Landowners Association and the National Farmers Union, it is hard luck on the NFU. The Government come down on the side of their friends and the powerful, not of the weak. The Government should have given the presumption — not the veto — to the tenant so that the landlord could have taken his case on appeal to argue it out and if he had made the capital investment he should have control over the quota.

I shall use this opportunity — I think that I am just within the bounds of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker — to draw the Minister's attention to a tragedy in my constituency, which is based on a misunderstanding and which worries me a great deal. It concerns direct sellers. If anything in this legislation is genuinely unsatisfactory, it is the way in which direct sellers have been treated. One of the great enterprises in my county is selling Cornish cream. I was brought up on what is known in Cornwall as thunder and lightning. For those who are not initiated in the delights of this dietary lack of control, I explain that one takes a nice piece of bread and generously spreads across it some Cornish cream until the bread is no longer porous. One then spreads a nice lot of treacle over the top. If ever any hon. Member wants to put on weight, there is nothing in the world to beat thunder and lightning.

The selling of Cornish cream is a great enterprise and many people have set up substantial mail delivery systems. Over Christmas a lot of Cornish cream is sold over the counter. However, it is sad that in Cornwall there are many examples of people selling Cornish cream direct who did not appear to realise that the crux is whether they are over quota on direct sales and not whether they are over quota altogether. A number of farmers in my constituency have been successful this Christmas in selling Cornish cream and have now discovered that they are wildly over quota on direct sales and are therefore likely to be penalised quite seriously.

The confusion has arisen as a result of rumours. I read articles in The Economist and other magazines and have raised the matter myself. The rumours were to the effect that, although a farmer may be over quota this year, because of the drought and the initial reaction to this legislation, Britain was under quota and therefore there was no likelihood of any farmers paying any levy. Therefore, it was thought that that would apply to those selling their product direct. I hope that the Minister will clarify this matter, because I fear that the farmers in my constituency who thought that are wrong and could end up paying for large quotas. I shall draw the attention of the Minister to one or two cases where farmers are in danger of going bankrupt and, given the vagaries of the mail, send him some information.

The lunacy is that if the farmer who is in real danger of going to the wall had merely taken his milk down to the dairy he would be under quota and so in no difficulty. However, because he had the initiative to build up a clientele that would buy his milk—albeit in the form of cream — and to post it off to the customers and to collect the money, he is likely to be fined. Between now and the day that the levy is to be collected, the House and the European Community must be made to realise that that is mad, and that something needs to be done. I give the Minister early warning that a number of these cases will be brought to his attention. I hope that something can be done to relieve such difficulties.

Some interesting questions were put to the Minister about the outgoers scheme and the attitude that he showed in replying to those questions was more revealing than the replies. There is no point in having the appeals procedure — with the hundreds, if not thousands, of hours spent on it — to allocate a number of farmers extra milk but then in the final analysis to tell them that, although they have won the allocation, they still cannot produce that milk. That is manifestly lunatic. We do not have the final figures, so we do not quite know, but if in the end a further quota has been allocated but is not available because there is not enough of the outgoers scheme, the Minister must go to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to get some more money to expand the scheme. To do anything else would be lunacy of the type with which the House is not normally associated. The milk can and must be allocated through the outgoers scheme, and the Government should provide the money.

I recognise that the Minister has some difficulty in getting money out of the Chancellor, but he need only present the House with the opportunity to make a decision on this matter. If the Minister allowed us to vote on whether we want another £10 million or £25 million — the amount is no larger than that — to alleviate this problem, I believe that hon. Members would go through the Lobby to support that provision. If we are given only one of these ghastly negative orders, to which we have become so accustomed over the years, we would have to vote for either a little or nothing and would not be able to give the Minister the backing he needs to go to the Chancellor. I look for an assurance that, if the figures do not match, an attempt will be made to persuade the Chancellor to produce the pennies required.

My point about tribunals is made more on the basis of my role as a representative politician than anything else. There is a number of dairy farmers in my constituency. I have to tell a dairy farmer who explains his case at some length to me that there is no point in me, as his elected Member of Parliament, taking that case to the House and trying to convince the Minister that the tribunal has made a mistake. The Minister has so tied up the regulations that the tribunal is free to act. Even if one could convince the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that, for instance, Harry Bloggs at Rosudgeon was unfairly treated, the Minister has so tied up the regulations in this quango — such is the Government's enthusiasm to transfer the power to make decisions from the elected representatives to appointed quangos — that my constituent could not win his case. That is a denial of the purpose of the Bill and of democracy. The Minister has made it impossible for us to argue our case because of the way in which he has tied up the regulations. That is as outrageous a part of the legislation as any other. I suspect that that is something with which the Minister will have to deal repeatedly.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson) referred to the co-responsibility levy. I remember reading the reasons given for introducing this levy. I cannot say that I was ever enthusiastic about the levy, and I no longer see any reason for it. There is a quota regime throughout Europe. I am not especially against the quota regime for solving this horrible problem which should not have grown so large. All the reasons given five or six years ago for introducing the co-responsibility levy have now vanished, yet the levy is still collected. Why? Where is the money going?

I look to the Minister to campaign within the European Community for the scrapping forthwith of the levy. That is one of the few steps that can be taken to give the farmers a real increase during the next three years in the value of their production. If that is not done, there will be an immense and continuous argument in the House about the full impact of the three-year freeze. Why is the co-responsibility levy collected? Is the Minister trying to get rid of it?

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): I hope that the House will forgive me if I do not go on about thunder and lightning — perhaps we could settle for a little fine drizzle instead. My hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) suggested that it was a miracle that the levy system had got off the ground. It would be churlish if we did not pay some tribute to the tenacity of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for getting it off the ground. It would be wrong not to be frank about the fact that my right hon. Friend has benefited from a certain amount of divine intervention in getting his miracle off the ground in the shape of the weather. I am slightly worried that we may be developing a false sense of security. Who knows what the weather will be like next year and the year after? That point is often made to me by my constituents.

My right hon. Friend was against the levies because of the inflexibility they imposed upon production. The keynote of this debate has often been the need for flexibility. Flexibility is needed in three respects. First —I join hon. Members on both sides of the House— there should be flexibility with small farmers. I am in favour of the outgoers scheme which provides a type of flexibility. We are asking small farmers to go out of business to encourage other small farmers to stay in business, and that is a paradox. A number of my constituents have said to me that it would be more sensible to raise the threshold to encourage farmers with 60 or 80 cows and who can put their land to alternative use, to go out of business, thereby enabling a number of smaller farmers to stay in business. We should not forget that it is the small farmers who do not have an alternative use to which they can put their land because such acreages do not provide viable alternatives.

Secondly, I should encourage my right hon. Friend to continue to do all he can in Brussels to obtain elbow room on transferability of quota, because that is an important element of the flexibility for which we are looking. Thirdly, I believe that my right hon. Friend should not discard the possibility of being slightly more flexible in dealing with his colleagues in Europe. Because we have this scheme—no one has suggested any other scheme that will work—we must ensure that it operates fairly and quickly. We must not be lulled into a false sense of security because of the way in which matters have gone this year. Although we are right to tell our colleagues in Europe that we will not collect the levy until they sort themselves out, we should be careful about the way in which we play our hand in future, especially when we consider that, for example, the French owe 35 million ecu and we theoretically owe 2·9 million ecu. We do not want to be used by the French as a justification for their not paying that large sum. The object of the exercise is to get them to pay and not to bring down the whole levy system. No one has anything to put in this system's place.

A small farmer, who does not have a battery of secretaries but whose wife acts as secretary, may come into my surgery and spread out before me many incomprehensible documents. He seems to understand them better than I do, being more intelligent than I am. It is extremely difficult to grapple with these documents. I beg my right hon. Friend to do everything he can in the cause of simplicity. No doubt my right hon. Friend remembers what was said by Helmut Schmidt about monetary compensation. He said that only two people in the world understood how monetary compensation amounts work—one was Helmut Schmidt and the other was the deputy governor of the Hungarian national bank. It would be a pity, given that we have no alternative but to implement quotas, for the quotas to be in danger of collapsing under the weight of bureaucracy.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): I am happy to take part in the debate so soon after my colleague from Cornwall, the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon). The hon. Gentleman was right to concentrate on aspects which especially affect our county, particularly the subject of Cornish cream on which I have corresponded with my right hon. Friend the Minister who, I believe, must do something to alleviate the problem.

I take issue, however, with the suggestion by the hon. Member for Truro that the Bill was somehow anti small farmers. I believe that that is quite wrong. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would have indulged in one of his famous rants, as he describes them, if things had been the other way round. If those with first call on the outgoers scheme had been the larger farmers I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would have put up a great show of wrath, fury and indignation and convinced the entire House that small farmers should have first call on the scheme if they wished to use it. Therefore, I believe that the Government's approach is right in that respect.

Mr. Penhaligon: I believe that the Government should have skewed the original reductions in production against the big farmers, thus putting the load on the top and saving a strong small farmers' community, if not for all time at least for the foreseeable future. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman himself would agree with that.

Mr. Harris: I do indeed. It is no secret that the hon. Gentleman and I, with others Members from Cornwall, had a most interesting and informative meeting with NFU representatives from our county. I understand, too, that Cornwall was by far the best represented county in the delegation that lobbied the House today, showing the importance of this matter to our county. I venture to suggest, however, that if the hon. Member for Truro had expressed the same view at that meeting the NFU would have been split all ways. Although he and I agree with such an approach, I suspect that the farming community as a whole would have been far from unanimous. That is the reality of the situation.

I therefore sympathise with my right hon. Friend the Minister, who was unfortunate enough to have been left holding the parcel when the music stopped. As he is no longer present, I should also say that I believe that there has been a great deal of unfair criticism of him. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) has said, the real culprit is not the Minister or the Commission but the Council of Ministers, of which my right hon. Friend is just one member. Successive British Ministers and the Commission have urged the Council of Ministers to face this problem. Had the Council of Ministers done so, the whole business of restraining output could have been carried out in a sane, sensible way without all the aggravation and the awful uncertainty which have made the past year the most dreadful year for agriculture since the war.

Our collective job now is to try to get some sanity back into the situation. I believe that we shall have to live with quotas for a very long time. That makes it all the more important to try to sort out some of the nonsense in the present scheme. In this respect, the House owes a great debt of gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) who first drew attention to the vexed question of tenant and landlord. As many hon. Members have said, the Government must give further thought to this. Again, of course, it is to some extent in the hands of the Community. Here, too, the hon. Member for Truro was not quite right, as the original regulation on which the scheme is based makes it clear that the quotas must be invested in the land. I believe that we must change that. I agree with the hon. Member for Truro that we must ensure greater flexibility and a much fairer system, certainly in the south-west, although I gather from speeches so far that the relationship between tenant and landlord is a major source of concern in many other parts of the country.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will be able to answer the following question. When will the Government be in a position to redistribute to small farmers the quota made available as a result of the outgoers scheme? When can those small farmers be certain that their production levels will be restored? They are entitled to an assurance on that. After such a traumatic year, there is an urgent need to restore confidence in agriculture and especially in the dairy sector.

In this context, I echo the plea of so many hon. Members for the immediate abolition of the co-responsibility levy. When I tackled my right hon. Friend the Minister on this some weeks ago I was somewhat disappointed, as he gave the impression that, although he would press for a reduction in the levy, he would not—for reasons that I did not understand—press for its complete abolition. The hon. Member for Truro asked why the levy was still in place. It is because the Community looks to the levy as a source of funds for its hard-pressed budget. That is absolutely wrong and we have a duty to see that the levy is scrapped as quickly as possible. If my hon. Friend the Minister of State can assure us today that that will be one of the Government's aims in the next round of negotiations, he will do much to restore confidence in the farming industry.

In conclusion, I welcome the Bill, although I do not believe that it goes far enough. I believe that more must be done and I add my voice to those who have pressed my right hon. Friend the Minister to go to the Chancellor for more money. My right hon. Friend said that the Bill involved considerable amounts of public money. With respect, that is absolute nonsense. We are talking about £50 million spread over five years and we are dealing with the future of a vital industry. I believe that for a comparatively small sum of money we could make the scheme really work. That is what we must set out to achieve.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): I am glad to be able to contribute briefly to this important little debate on a mopping-up Bill designed to straighten out the existing situation.

I commend my right hon. Friend the Minister and my right hon. Friend the Minister of State on their alacrity in getting the outgoers scheme under way, providing an important anchor of confidence for the industry at a time of turmoil, anguish and anxiety. The fact that the scheme was announced so quickly and was adequately financed, at least for the first stage, was most reassuring.

As the amount of money involved is sometimes described as very little, it is worth putting the matter in context. It is nice to know that the Ministry provided the second most generous scheme within the Community because, if I read the AGRA Europe publication of 29 June 1984 accurately, France is the highest contributor in this respect with a support of £88 million, we come second with a support of £50 million and Germany, which is sometimes vaunted as showing a more generous response to this problem, comes in a poor third with £25 million. I think the response to that German scheme indicates its lack of acceptability.

Much has been said in the debate about flexibility. In the context of quota and the outgoers scheme, flexibility is the key. To maintain flexibility somehow or other within the rigid framework of the overall quota is the fundamental problem that has to be dealt with and resolved. In that structure, I am glad that it has been clearly enunciated by my right hon. Friend that protection of the smaller producer is the most important consideration. I have given much thought to how it might be better undertaken, but I think that the smaller producer on balance has been protected best. Those on the level of 40 cows or below wishing to stay in have been given, or will be given, the bias of support while those on the 40-cow level who are seeking to go out will also be given the balance of preference because of the lack of viability of their particular holding or circumstances.

Another point that has not been made so far in the debate concerning the small producer relates to the movement of quota. Many requests have been made for more flexibility, for a greater ability for quota to move. The National Farmers Union has made a specific request for the saleability of quota, subject to certain safeguards. This worries me. The decision to attach quota to the land seems to me to protect the smaller producer against the depredations of the larger producer, who would have the resources to buy in quota if it were freely available on the market. Therefore, to link quota to the land gives the best possible defence to the smaller producer and ensures that it is not possible for quota to accumulate in the hands of a few large producers.

One or two problems have to be accepted as a consequence. There has been considerable mention of the question of tenancies. I note the point made by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) and by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris), but I think that the answer lies the other way round. If it can be shown that the tenant has made the investment in the dairy, he should have the right of appeal against the landlord rather than the other way round. That secures the fundamental position of the quota being linked to the land. The right way round to tackle the flexibility of quota seems to me to be in terms of leasing. I wonder whether the Minister, in winding up, can give the House some indication of what thought has been given to the development of the concept of leasing of quota on an unsecured basis so that it can return to the land when the circumstances indicate that it should do so. That would give the necessary flexibility, put the proper value on quota and thus satisfy all the requirements.

As a final point on flexibility, the hon. Member for Truro gave the most graphic description of the absurdities that will come about as a result of the inflexibility between wholesale quota and direct sales quota. In my view it is vital that this problem be resolved. We cannot have a situation in which successful sales are penalised; they must be recognised and encouraged. Successful sales mean consumption which has to be set against the present difficult market scene.

My penultimate point relates to what I referred to last May as the knock-on effect. I bear very much in mind the fact that I come from a beef-producing as well as a dairy-producing part of the world. In terms of substitution, the development of the beef herd is obviously important as, indeed, will be the lower production of commercial beef resulting from the dairy herd. It is essential that there be full maintenance of the confidence in that sector of the market for the foreseeable future. I must underline the importance of sustaining the variable beef premium scheme because, as I have said before, the variable beef premium scheme puts beef on plates, and it gets beef down throats and eaten, which cannot be bad, and it also provides the confidence that is necessary to ensure the future of the beef industry at a time when it particularly needs it.

As to the future, my right hon. Friend said that at present no further schemes are planned. When this scheme is completed and all the quotas have been allocated, will he undertake a formal review? I am sure that every other commentator, magazine and, indeed, official body will be carrying out the same exercise, but it would be helpful if the Minister would undertake a full review of the point we have reached to establish whether it is appropriate to consider taking in a further scheme. If he does bring in a further scheme, may I reinforce the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) when he intervened in the early stages of the debate to ask that the regulations be brought forward in draft form so that they can be considered and possibly amended in the light of debate in the House? The value of that process was heavily underlined at the start of this whole wretched exercise when the milk quota regulations in my view were far more suitable and enhanced in quality as a consequence of such a process. I look forward to that and to the satisfactory and speedy passage of the Bill so that the situation can be properly formalised.

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): I have listened with great interest to a debate during which the Benches of the official Opposition have been empty. I am not surprised. Her Majesty's Government are doing all the Opposition's work for them. They believe in quota controls and all the apparatus of the State, which we are now imposing on one of the last efficient industries in the country, the agriculture industry. I love the fascinating way in which hon. Members who have not been in the House very long today criticise my comments because by their non-attendance they are bringing about the destruction of the industry. Our farmers have the capacity to feed the hungry not only of this nation but of other parts of the world. I am saddened that, in the debate, hon. Members have shown gloom, some despondency and some petty self-congratulation while none of them have queried the fact that in the House we are attempting to go back to a situation, that I thought we left many years ago, in which this Government—and I am ashamed because it is the Government whom I generally support—revert to this terrible system of control upon control.

What do quotas mean? They mean things that are fixed from a paper basis; they mean inflexibility. Of course one can always appeal to a tribunal, which means more tribunals. What do they penalise? They penalise the efficient. Who else do they penalise? They penalise those who wish to grow, to expand, to bring their families into the business to make that growth. What do they encourage? Bureaucracy, of course; form-filling, of course—indeed, much form-filling by farmers who are far better at growing food. The bureaucracy that we are grafting on—for want of a better agricultural word—is one that I find totally unacceptable and, frankly, shameful.

It is quite easy for us to say that we can do nothing and tonight we shall have no vote. All right, there is no vote against this concept because we say that the concept is accepted and we are part of a club. The Government, of course, will not vote against it and the Opposition do not wish to vote against it. Even the Liberal party, which has been present in some profusion, will not vote against it. So we accept, and what do our farmers do? They have to accept it, because we have made the ruling. We, here at Westminster, and they, down the line, will bear the consequences. The consequences are easy to see. We are surrounded by empty green benches. Soon in Devonshire and North Devon I shall be surrounded by empty green fields because this form of system always supports those who are big enough to have an accountant and to employ a surveyor and who do not have to have the lady of the house do the paperwork. We shall empty our countryside, just as we have emptied other parts of the country. We have pretty well destroyed our manufacturing industry. Everybody will tell me that this is in the cause of greater efficiency—greater Japanese or German efficiency.

So we are now set fair to destroy perhaps the last really superb working part of Britain—the small green-field farm plus, of course, farmer and family. As they are destroyed, so the village, and with it, the village school and pub, are destroyed. In my part of the world more people live off agriculture than practise it. It is not just the farmer or the rapidly disappearing farm worker who is affected, but the man who services the tractor or who sells it, or perhaps the man who sells the car, or the concentrate. It is the professional advisers who are affected. In the small towns in areas such as Devonshire we are sentencing them all, not to a lingering death, but to a fairly quick one.

The big man can, of course, improvise and move into other areas. A big farm is usually fairly flexible and has the advisers and adaptability. But on a small farm a man is trained for a lifelong job and it is that or nothing. It is no different in many industrial areas, where skilled men no longer have work because their skills are no longer needed.

Time is always short just before the wind-up speeches, but I am saddened that there has been no more temper in the debate. Mention has been made of the CLA and the NFU. I have not had the CLA on to me, but the NFU has been here in strength. I know how it feels. It is aware that the big man will survive because he always does. But I thought that Parliament and this House were meant to stand up for and look after the small man. I am not prepared to see the people whom I seek to represent destroyed economically because people say, "Oh well, what can we do about it? We belong to a club." I sometimes wonder these days whether that club is worth belonging to.

I shall make my points briefly. My good friend, my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills) cannot be here today. He is in his constituency dealing with farmers and farmers' interests. But as my hon. Friend the Member for Taverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) said, if £5 million or £50 million is all that is required from national resources, that is very little compared with the vast sums—I play it from Left to Right—that we waste on miners who do not care if their pits fall to pieces, or compared with the vast sums we spend on defence where many of us believe that there are savings that can be made. When we consider the sheer petty-cashery needed to save the way of life of the small farmer, it is unbelievable that a Government who were elected on the promises that they made should no longer be prepared to honour them.

There is to be no Division in which one can show one's shame at the way in which we are treating the industry.

Mr. Home Robertson: Why not?

Mr. Speller: Alas, one hon. Member is not enough to divide the House. Perhaps the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) who shouts out from a sendentary position is too tired to contribute to the debate. But I, for one, am deeply saddened by the tenor of the debate. I know that we are stuck with the system, but some of us now wonder whether, just because we accept the system as it exists, we must also accept that it is good. If it is not good perhaps we should consider changing it, instead of talking about making amendments in Committee or dividing in Committee. We all know very well that in Committee the majority wins.

Today there appears to be a minority of one who says that we are not winning but losing as we destroy the best things in Britain—the countryside, the small farm, and all the beauty of life that goes with them. If we destroy them, we shall be as guilty as those who, over a hundred years ago in Scotland and not so long ago in the north of England, made desolate what was once beautiful thriving countryside. This evening we are contributing to that desolation.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for calling me to speak in the rather unfamiliar surroundings of a debate on agriculture. I understand that the Bill deals with compensation to farmers for the imposition of quotas. I am sure that even my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) would support that principle. But for those of us not wholly bound up with farming, the Bill does not go nearly far enough.

Until the speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) and for Devon, North no one seemed to recognise that agriculture consists of more than just farmers. Indeed, the ancillary industries which depend on farming have been hit far more severely as a result of milk quotas than any dairy farmer who is to receive compensation under the Bill.

I draw the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister to a company called BOCM Silcock Limited in Avonmouth, in my constituency. It is a mill that manufactures feeding stuffs. For historical reasons, more than 80 per cent. of its production consists of cattle feed. As a result of quotas, that mill will close in the first quarter of 1986 with loss of employment for up to 199 staff. Their jobs will disappear as a result of the imposition of milk quotas. Where in the Bill is there compensation for them?

I am not talking about an inefficient company that is giving an excuse for going out of business. Prior to the imposition of quotas it was economic. The prices of its products were comparable with those elsewhere in the EEC. It achieved a 10 per cent. productivity gain in the years since 1976. It was not overmanned, and shed more than 100 staff in the same period. It was not under-capitalised and in recent years it has built a new silo, a new blending plant and additional bulk loading facilities. In addition, 50 per cent. of its extrusion presses have been replaced. It has improved its warehousing and has computerised vast areas of its operation.

Prior to quotas the company had the option of upgrading its manufacturing unit, and, given turnover continuing at former levels, it would have been economic to do so over a period of two or three years. But then came milk quotas, and in one year its turnover fell by 28 per cent. Consequently, of course, the level of return on capital is unacceptable, the upgrading option is no longer economic and the mill will close. It is worth considering what that will mean to those involved.

All the speeches today have been about people, but they have all been about farmers. I should like to widen the debate's horizons a little and to talk about workers at that mill. The average age of the production staff is 50 or more. The majority of them live within 10 miles of the mill. Within that same area unemployment stands at 30 per cent., which is not large enough to qualify for development area status. There is little alternative employment for those people, and what jobs there are pay substantially lower rates of pay. Therefore, as a result of the imposition of milk quotas, most of them face permanent unemployment.

The average age of the clerical staff is a little over 40. They are mainly female and, because of the special procedures within the mill, most of them will need retraining before they can even consider obtaining another job. But because it is not a development area and because there is no special provision for those parts of the agriculture industry that are not termed "farming", they cannot obtain any retraining grants from the EEC, and there is no provision in the Bill to provide them.

In addition, just to make things slightly worse, the company is a reasonable employer and so will be able to offer the staff some additional redundancy over and above the basic statutory scheme. However, it can do so only on condition that between 80 and 90 per cent. of them stay on until the last day before the mill closes. Therefore, they will not have the option of going out and looking for work. They will have to stay until they are made unemployed.

[Mr. Michael Stern]

I am aware that the outgoers scheme is not designed as a form of social payment and I am not suggesting that it should be. In principle, I support the scheme, but it is designed to compensate those involved in agriculture who have suffered as a result of the Government's action in accepting quotas. The Government accepted quotas and are now saying, "It is fair to use taxpayers' money to compensate those who will suffer most." Why should only farmers be compensated? We are told that farmers are entitled to compensation because they have had to cut production by 9 per cent. over the country as a whole. The mill has had to cut production by 28 per cent. Therefore, why should farmers alone be entitled to compensation?

Some farmers are losing the whole of their livelihood because of the quota scheme. As the Minister rightly says, those farmers for whom we have most sympathy are most entitled to compensation. Some farmers will lose only part of their livelihoods, but the mill workers will lose the whole of theirs. Therefore, why are they not entitled to compensation?

Why is the Bill blinkered so that it deals only with compensation to one small part of a large industry? Why does it not take into account the effects of the Government's action on other parts of the industry? The Government rightly set up the principle that those people most affected by Government action should be compensated. For that reason generous compensation was offered to miners, dockers and steel workers. It is now being offered to farmers. Why is it not being offered to the entire agriculture industry?

If the Government wish to compensate only part of the industry, they must accept that they will not earn the support of hon. Members who are troubled by the suffering in other parts of the industry.

Mr. Home Robertson: I have already drafted an amendment to be tabled in Committee which would provide compensation for people who lose their jobs because of the scheme. Does the hon. Gentleman expect to be nominated as a member of the Committee, and, if so, will he vote for such an amendment?

Mr. Stern: No, I do not expect to be nominated as a member of the Committee. However, when the Bill returns to the Floor of the House, unless it contains provision to compensate people such as those in my constituency I have described, I shall continue to be unable to support it.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): It is a pleasure to be called to speak in this debate. My main criticism of the debate is that it has so far been largely a west country benefit. As I am the only east midland hon. Member to make a speech I shall put our case.

The outgoers scheme was introduced to encourage some dairy farmers to go out of milk production to release quota which can be redistributed to farmers who wish to stay in milk production. The problem is that the present scheme is heavily over-subscribed. On behalf of dairy farmers in my constituency I add my voice to those who urge the Government to extend the present scheme. That would encourage more farmers to cease milk production, and thus make available additional quota for those who wish to remain in production and make a good living at it.

That would particularly help producers who have made application to the quota tribunal as development cases. I understand that there will not be a cut in the base year quota awards and that if the present outgoer scheme is successful, there will not be a cut in the exceptional hardship awards made by the tribunals.

We now understand that substantial cuts of awards to development cases, perhaps of 30 or 40 per cent., may be made. Hardest hit if that happens will be the younger farmers and farmers who, before the imposition of quotas, made long-term financial commitments to develop their farming businesses. They feel that before the imposition of quotas they were encouraged by Government agricultural policies to expand, only to find literally overnight that their plans were in ruins and that no alternatives were available to them.

Dairy farmers in my constituency and in my county feel strongly that milk production quotas should be transferable either by sale or by lease, subject to any necessary restrictions and regulations. I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) on this. The linking of quotas to the land puts farmers in a straitjacket. They feel that that should apply to all farmers in the European Community, but they query whether it does and feel that a more robust attitude on the part of my right hon. Friend the Minister in Brussels could relieve them of the adverse effects of that straitjacket.

I shall be interested to hear whether my right hon. Friend is having discussions with his colleagues in the EC about removing that straitjacket. It can do no harm to his Department, nor to the financial position of this country, and my farmers advise me that it could do good to them if it were removed. I look forward to hearing from the Minister in his reply that he will do so.

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): We have had an interesting debate on a matter which has affected the countryside. All hon. Members will have been told about cases that have created great hardship. However, until the new milk production quotas come into existence, we shall not know the full extent of hardship. There will be a greater effect on rural communities than any hon. Member can guess.

I do not say this in a pejorative sense, but our debate has been rather like a Committee stage, in that all hon. Members, with one exception, have welcomed the Bill, however reluctantly, because it gives a measure of justice to people who, through no fault of their own, will lose their livelihoods. Therefore, we have concentrated on trying to improve the Bill by making suggestions about flexibility.

There has been a fair measure of consensus about those measures. Pleas for flexibility are all very well—I agree with almost every point that was made — but the Government's response to those pleas is what is important. I hope that they will not take our reluctance to vote against the measure, which cushions people who are undergoing hardship, as an excuse for saying that their plan is perfect in every way and that hon. Members will not vote against the Bill because its underlying purpose is good. I hope that the Government will listen to the suggestions of ways to improve the scheme and act on them.

The hon. Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) alone went to the root and branch of the Bill in his criticisms. As he is now absent, may I say through the columns of Hansard that he must not take fireworks night too literally when he makes a controversial speech. This evening he lit the blue touch paper and retired. He has left the Chamber and we cannot consult or debate with him. He would have done much better, after firing such a volley, to wait in the Chamber to hear what hon. Members have to say in reply.

The state and the farming industry have been in partnership since the second world war, with the full assent of farmers. That has greatly benefited the country. On this occasion, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, for whatever reason—I accept the defence of him by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris)—changed at short notice the encouragement that the Government have offered for more than 40 years. However, I do not take too seriously his defence of the Minister, who is not so tender a flower as to need people rushing to his aid.

The House should remember that two or three days before he attended the meeting of the Council of Ministers, the Minister pledged undying opposition to the scheme. The only historical parallel that I have been able to find to such a volte face is that of the Duke of Marlborough, who left London at the head of James II's forces and returned at the head of William and Mary's army. With such a short time span and such a radical change in everything that had been expected of dairy farmers for many decades, it is no wonder that there was introduced in the industry instability which bordered on panic for a considerable time.

The introduction of the scheme was an unpleasant shock, and many of us believe that its implementation has been chaotic. There is no question but that many more farmers have appealed against the quotas allocated to them than was foreseen by the Ministry. The Government should have expected many farmers who were faced with the loss of their livelihoods to appeal against the quotas. As a consequence, the tribunals, from their inadequate beginnings, have been stepped up, although they are way behind with their work. We do not know whether their work will be completed by February or March. In the interim, no one has been certain of anything, which must cause great dissatisfaction in the industry. It is ironic that, due partly to the drought that afflicted us last year, Britain will not fulfil its quota.

As my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) said in opening, we want a specific assurance that under-production this year will not lead to further pressure for an even lower quota. The panic with which bodies of an official or semi-official nature are trying to encourage farmers to increase their milk production for the rest of the year suggests to the industry that that might be a possibility.

The hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) said that the Bill does not cover all those who will have to leave the dairy industry as a result of the quota scheme agreed by the Minister in Brussels. First, it does not cover tenants, unless with the landlord's consent. I hope to say a little more about that later. My hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian said that the Opposition would table an amendment seeking an extension of the scheme to cover all those who work in the dairy industry. He used herdsmen as an example, but we believe that the Bill should cover those who work in the dairy products industry, which will have problems different from those of a normal business that fails. It was not that industry's fault that the quota system was agreed; it could do nothing to avoid it.

My major criticism of the Bill is that the existence of the scheme begs several questions that have not yet been answered by Ministers. The first question, which was asked by several hon. Members including the hon. Members for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells), for Devizes (Mr. Morrison), and for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon), was whether the Government intended the quota system to protect the small producer and to keep him in operation. If that is the case, it is strange that the scheme is available only to small producers. A Victorian ballad says, but this scheme takes that saying to absurd lengths. The Minister will say, "We have gone from 200,000 to 325,000 litres." He tried to make a virtue of desperation, because farmers are not fulfilling their quotas and are not getting the firm assurances that they wanted. I should have thought that the scheme would be open to larger farmers to facilitate either a whole or—here I agree with the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North—a partial surrender of quota. That would be helpful to the small producer, who could continue with part of his quota as a contribution to a mixed farm, and it would also increase the volume of milk surrendered by some bigger farmers into the pool, which will help the allocation of quotas and avoid some of the hardship that would otherwise be caused to small farmers who specialise in dairy herds.

Secondly, is the Bill intended to protect communities? It is not generally appreciated that the farming industry's most significant role is as the base of rural life. Not only will small farmers face hardship, but, as the hon. and disappearing Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) said, many others who depend upon agriculture directly or indirectly will be affected. Gradually, the entire life of a region will be affected if we change agriculture in ways that have not been fully thought out. I appreciated the contribution of the hon. Member for Newark (Mr. Alexander), who is from the east of the country, and I agree that in this case there is no north-south divide, but an east-west divide. There is likely to be a split between east and west, with the dairy industry in the west being disadvantaged, unless the Government are more clear about the communities that they hope to see at the end of the reshaping of the dairy industry upon which they have embarked.

The third and most important question that the Government have not answered is what they envisage as the future for the outgoers from the dairy industry. Do they want them to quit agriculture completely? If so, what will those outgoers do? What other occupations could they have? What other forms of agriculture would the Government advise outgoers to take up, if they wish them to change to another product rather than quit agriculture altogether? If the Government wish outgoers to quit altogether, they should consider the environmental effect of the abandonment of large numbers of smallholdings, many of them in very inaccessible places. If a tenant quits with the landowner's blessing, the landowner can put the land to another use, but if a somewhat inaccessible holding is quit by the small owner-occupier, the land will be sterilised for any useful occupation in the future. The Government must decide whether they want outgoers to quit the industry completely or to produce something else. They must take that decision before we can decide whether they should accede to the pleas for the extension of the outgoers scheme that have been made by almost every Back Bencher who has spoken today.

It may be the Government's intention to encourage some different form of agriculture. However, under the present terms and conditions of the scheme, the outgoer will not have much chance of changing the way in which he gets his livelihood. It seems that the average compensation is likely to be about £32,000. Such a sum will not buy many sophisticated machines designed to facilitate other types of farming. Also, as my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian has said, much of the money may already be owed to the bank.

I hope that the Minister of State will answer those points. With a scheme that did not achieve any of the desired objectives—a scheme that simply did not work—we would be in the worst of all possible worlds. In his opening speech, the Minister told us that less than half the number needed have firmly declared their wish to take advantage of the outgoers scheme. He said that he was confident that the required number would apply. However, any restructuring of the industry must be carried out in the most sensible way possible. Is the Minister confident that a restructuring based on the present outgoers scheme will help to create the sensible new industry that would provide the best base for the future?

A number of hon. Members referred to tenant farmers. The right hon. Gentleman said that 45 per cent. of those who have a firm intention to stop milk production are tenants. However, do we know how many landlords, in giving their consent, are asking for extra rental or doing any of the other things described recently in Farmers Weekly? How many tenants are suffering changes in conditions because they are taking advantage of the scheme?

In the representations that I have had from farmers, the matter most often mentioned has been the transferability of the quota. The Ministry needs to study more carefully the question of leasing and sale. However, I hope that the simple ability to buy the quota will not be the criterion in consideration of the type of protection to be given. I hope that those who have made a great deal of money out of other forms of agriculture will not be allowed to filch quota away from other parts of the country where it underpins the economy. I think that every hon. Member who has spoken in the debate has called for some safeguard in that area, as well as for flexibility. The Government must consider the matter urgently.

The hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) and other hon. Members have referred to the Government's obligation to those who took up development schemes because of the enthusiastic encouragement of the Government. In so doing, a number of people became unwisely over-committed to the banks, and poverty is now staring them in the face. The Government have a responsibility to those whom they encouraged to expand their herds. I hope that they will consider the possibility of allocating extra quota to such people.

I also hope that the Minister of State will clarify the figures. I admit that I cannot understand the simplest figures. However, first of all, we were told that where the tribunal had assessed the need for extra quota, about 35 per cent. less than the sum needed was being allowed because of the insufficient supply of extra quota. Then the Minister said that 11 per cent. would be added in future years. I shall be grateful if the Minister will clarify the relationship between the two figures.

The hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) and the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) both asked about direct sellers. Direct sellers were certainly not given clear information when the scheme was set up and many of them—through an inadvertence that they share with many hon. Members as well as people outside—now find that they have exceeded their quota or that their quota is in the wrong form. Unless direct sellers are treated sympathetically, they will suffer considerable hardship.

The situation is volatile. In principle, the Bill deserves the support of the House. The fact that it does not include everyone does not mean that it will not help those with whom it deals. However, I hope that, in Committee, the Government will consider questions such as the extension of the scheme, and will not hold too firmly to the statement in the Minister's opening speech.

As has been pointed out, even under the Labour Government of 1966-70 one had to wait until Cabinet Ministers were out of office before their memoirs—such as the Crossman memoirs—appeared. However, now we do not have to wait for publication or for the fall of the Government. With a bland disregard for collective responsibility, the Minister of Agriculture tells us what terrible fights he has with the Treasury over sums that are pitifully small in terms of total Government spending or in terms of the Minister's own contingency fund allocation.

Everyone has asked for an extension of the scheme to make it more flexible and to alleviate the hardship that will undoubtedly affect many groups of people in the industry. I hope that the Minister will not regard the sacrosanctity of public expenditure targets as more important than the well being of those who have served the community for a long time. We are discussing comparatively small amounts of money. If the Minister and territorial Secretaries of State cannot form a powerful and noisy wedge in the Cabinet to press the Treasury for extra provision to extend and make the scheme more flexible, I do not believe that he will have discharged the duty to the outgoers that we all recognise.

The Bill should be given a Second Reading. It should be improved vastly in Committee, but the most important thing which should come out of today's debate is not the improvement of the Bill but the improvement of the scheme. It is on the scheme that justice for the dairy industry depends.

7.20 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): I have been asked an enormous number of questions during this comparatively short debate. I shall endeavour to answer as many as I can without going on interminably.

Mr. Home Robertson: The Minister has until 10 o'clock.

Mr. MacGregor: I suspect that the House would think it unwise of me to go on for two and a half hours in response to a debate which was not much longer than that. If I do not deal with all of the issues that have been raised, they can be considered in Committee. Indeed, some of them could equally well have been raised in Committee.

In the opening comments of the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) we had yet again an example of the Opposition speaking with two voices. Indeed, the Opposition have almost literally spoken with two voices as only two Opposition Members have spoken. Only two Opposition Members have been present for most of the debate.

Mr. Home Robertson: There have been three.

Mr. MacGregor: Very well. However, I meant two voices in the more usual sense.

The predecessor of the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) as Opposition spokesman on agriculture, the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes), constantly said that agricultural subsidies were too high. I do not believe that the hon. Member for Pontypridd dissents from that view, but having, as usual, criticised the high level of agricultural subsidies, the Opposition take the easy way out on specific issues and call for even more public expenditure and subsidy. Such was the case today when they urged more subsidy for outgoers; yet they criticise the Government for spending too much on agriculture.

The hon. Member for East Lothian showed schizophrenia in his speech. He lamented the fact that the outgoers scheme would result in people leaving the land, thus having a serious effect on rural areas, and almost in the same breath called for even more expenditure to get even more people off the land. He should consider the implications of some of his arguments. He called the payments to producers under the outgoers scheme inadequate. That can hardly be the case as, unlike other member states, the amount that we are asking for will be taken up in full.

I should like to consider the sole policy point that the hon. Member for East Lothian raised and then deal with the many questions that he asked. He said that the Opposition expect us to ask in the price review, for the United Kingdom only, that the transitional arrangement of an extra 1 per cent. in quota for 1984-85 should be continued next year. In other words, our policy should be to ensure that there is not the expected reduction of 1 per cent. The hon. Gentleman is aware that that was a transitional arrangement, that we still have a substantial surplus of dairy products throughout the Community, and that we have to pay for that transitional arrangement through an extra 1 per cent. on the co-responsibility levy. If they knew that there would have to be an extra 1 per cent. in co-responsibility levy, most farmers would have preferred not to have the transitional arrangement. The hon. Gentleman must face up to what he would do about that extra 1 per cent. If he argues that it should be removed, he should consider where the extra money would come from.

The hon. Gentleman asked about progress in cutting production, as a result of the quota system, throughout the Community. One of the problems is that statistics for October and November are only provisional and none exist for December. However, those estimates suggest that from April to November 1984 milk production in the Community was cut by about 4 per cent. compared with the same period in 1983. The important point is that, for the Community as a whole and for individual member states, as the previous agriculture Commissioner made clear at a Council meeting in December, that downward trend is accelerating. It has taken longer for the downward trend to show through in some member states than it did in the United Kingdom, where the drought and the disciplined response of our producers had an impact.

I must emphasise that the figures are provisional. They are not official statistics and will have to be revised. To give an idea, however, I shall give the statistics for member states from April to November, as previous figures to the end of September suggested that many member states were increasing rather than reducing production. The provisional figures show that production in Belgium is down by 4·6 per cent. compared with the same period in 1983, that in Denmark it is down 6·5 per cent., that in Germany it is down 6 per cent., that in France it is down 1·3 per cent., that in Luxembourg it is down 5·1 per cent. and that in the United Kingdom, as we know it is down 8·9 per cent. Although the figures are provisional, they show that the quota system is beginning to bite in most member states and that production is decreasing towards the targets.

The hon. Member for East Lothian also asked for international comparisons. My hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) asked about international comparisons on the outgoers scheme. I am grateful for what my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) said about our outgoers scheme being relatively generous. It is difficult to make precise comparisons, because the schemes have quite different elements. They might range over a longer period or have different purposes or be directed at particular types of producer. For example, the French are concentrating on those they want out of the industry because they want to restructure it. The scheme is concentrated on the over-55s. Comparison is difficult, but there is no doubt that the United Kingdom has a fair and reasonably generous scheme. The German scheme runs for 10 years and the French scheme is less than ours in regard to the amount paid per litre. I do not have time to go into detail but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford said, analysis would show the British scheme to be relatively generous.

It is important to remember, as my right hon. Friend the Minister has said at Question Time, that there is no sin in not cutting milk production. If member states exceed their quotas, they are penalised through the application of a super-levy. There is no obligation to cut production to quota levels but there is an obligation to collect levy on production which is in excess of quotas. That is why the fair application of the super-levy throughout member states is critical and why we have concentrated so much of our attention on it in recent Council meetings.

The hon. Members for East Lothian and for Pontypridd asked for an assurance that we would not be penalised if we were to fall short of our quota this year. That could well happen because of the impact of the drought. There is no such suggestion in any discussions that I have heard on this matter in the Community, and if it were suggested we should resist it.

Indeed, we would point out, as many other Ministers and the previous Commissioner have said, that one of the reasons why United Kingdom production has come down faster than that of other member states is the drought, which was more marked here. That would obviously be a strong argument we could put if there was any attempt to penalise us for under-production. I can give the assurance asked for by both hon. Gentlemen that we would resist that totally.

[Mr. MacGregor]

In regard to redundancy for farm workers and for other employees in ancillary industries, the hon. Member for East Lothian said that he would be putting forward an amendment that the Bill should provide for redundancy payments for stockmen as well as for outgoers. That is not appropriate for this Bill because it does not deal with redundancy payments. We already have a general statutory redundancy scheme, so redundant stockmen and others would benefit from it. It is not appropriate to compare payments under the outgoers scheme with redundancy payments because the outgoers scheme is not a redundancy scheme. It is important to understand this.

The outgoers scheme is a measure to enable the industry as a whole to adjust to the quota arrangements by making the additional quota available in particular to smaller producers but also to others. It is not a redundancy scheme as such. The number of redundancies among farm workers appears to be limited but, as I have said, it is always open to an employer and an employee to agree more favourable redundancy terms than those available from the protection of the statutory arrangements under the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978. They can agree more favourable terms than the statutory minimum, and this has been done in some cases. The Milk Marketing Board is doing so for its creameries.

It is not right to draw an analogy with what the Dutch Government are proposing. They are making specific provision for redundancy payments for people in agriculture because the Dutch Government have no statutory redundancy scheme. This is the big difference. We have a statutory redundancy scheme which will make redundancy payments available to those who are made redundant.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Will my hon. Friend tell us how this applies to the self-employed? This is news to me. Generally farmers are self-employed.

Mr. MacGregor: What I was asked about in the debate was the position of stockmen, employees of farmers and employees in ancillary industries. The self-employed farmer will be able to take advantage of the outgoers scheme which is intended to restructure the industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) and the hon. Member for East Lothian drew attention to the uncertainty for the farmers who do not yet know what their secondary quota is. They, like several other hon. Members, mentioned some of the difficulties that individual farmers have had with the panel and tribunal system. We have always had two objectives. The important point was to try to get the balance between them. On the one hand, there was the determination to get as much fairness and thoroughness in the appeal system as we could; but, on the other hand, there was a need to complete the process as soon as possible to let producers know exactly where they stood. That was the balance we had to try to achieve, and I believe that in general we have achieved it.

In regard to the uncertainty for outgoers, we were asked why we had made firm offers to producers in tranches. There are two answers. First, we could not give an immediate offer to all who had applied because the scheme was heavily over-subscribed and we could have found ourselves making offers to too many people. We always assumed that some would not wish to take up the offer, but if we had made immediate offers to all and sundry we could have had more commitments than we could meet.

Another important point is that many people in farming were concerned that if all the outgoers went out of production at the same time there would be a severe effect on the market in beef. We have endeavoured to avoid that and I think we have been successful, in view of beef prices. That was another important reason for staging the tranches.

The hon. Member for East Lothian asked me, as did some other hon. Members, why we were insisting that producers should get out in toto if they took up the outgoers scheme and why we could not allow partial surrender of quotas. The straightforward answer is that Community regulations permit us only to make payments to producers who "discontinue milk production definitively". This means that we had to insist that outgoers surrender their entire quota, which can, of course, relate to more than one farm.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton asked again, as my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) had asked my right hon. Friend, whether, if there ever were another outgoers scheme, we would ensure that there was an opportunity for the House to comment on draft regulations. I am sure my hon. Friend realises that it is a hypothetical question, because my right hon. Friend has made it clear that we do not intend to introduce another scheme. He drew attention to the fact that if it occurred there was a precedent in what we did with the quota regulations in July where we gave the House an opportunity to comment before we put forward the final regulations. I have noted the feeling in the House on this. I repeat that it will depend on whether there is another outgoers scheme; but whether one should do it in that way will also depend on what that scheme contains.

My hon. Friend asked me to say what formula was used for the additional allocation of quota this year. He will know that the extra allocation went to Eire, Northern Ireland and Luxembourg, which got a small amount. Basically it went to areas where the total economy was more dependent on dairying than other areas in the Community.

There is no link between the production quotas which have been fixed under the quota system and what was agreed in the price review last March on imports of New Zealand butter. That is why I do not think one could argue the case in future negotiations on the super-levy system because the production quotas were based on delivery and sales levels in members states and not on imports of dairy produce or anything like that. Therefore, there was no link between those two.

My hon. Friend drew attention to a problem which has been raised with me as I have moved around the country and by several of my hon. Friends—the possibility that producers have been treated differently by different panels. In a system that has had to be introduced and carried through with the rapidity that we wanted so as to leave producers clear where they stood on quotas, it is not possible to ensure absolute and complete consistency, but we have made every endeavour to do that. The key point is that the setting up of the tribunal system, where it is easier to achieve consistency, gives producers who feel that they have been treated unfairly the opportunity to appeal. The tribunal system gives that safeguard.

My hon. Friend talked about discrimination against the small producer who carried out improvements without the expander scheme or a loan from the bank. There is no discrimination in the regulations on that point. In general we do not believe that local panels or tribunals are making such discrimination, but producers must be able to demonstrate that they have carried out or committed themselves to investment which is leading to the increase in output that they are claiming. In some cases producers have not been able to satisfy panels that the work they have done will produce the expansion in production which they are claiming.

In regard to my hon. Friend's question about statutory provision for tax treatment, as I think he will know, the non-statutory scheme which will be in existence until the Bill is passed gives producers the choice of two types of payment and gives favourable tax treatment for payments under the outgoers scheme. The tax treatment given to these two types of payment results from the provisions of general taxation legislation and the way in which the outgoers scheme was conceived. The same will apply to any future statutory scheme. Therefore, it is not necessary to provide for the tax treatment in a Bill of this sort.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) and I have debated endlessly why the quota system was introduced and whether it is fair to the United Kingdom. He knows why we felt that in the end it was inevitable. He knows why we dispute entirely his charge that the outcome was unfair to United Kingdom producers. In fact, we got a very good deal.

I shall not go into that, but I wish to comment in particular on three of the points which the hon. Gentleman made. He argued that the outgoers scheme did not acknowledge the plight of small producers and did not do enough for the rural areas. He asked for the precise figures on the outgoers scheme in Wales as distinct from the 1,186 which my right hon. Friend quoted for England and Wales. So far, 213 Welsh producers have firmly responded to the firm offer of the outgoers scheme, but the objective of the scheme is to give that extra allocation to small producers who wish to stay in business and to bring them back to their 1983 levels. That is particularly effective in the rural areas such as Wales.

So far, there has been a considerable redistributative effect to small producers in Wales as a result of the outgoers scheme. It looks as though it will operate to the advantage of Welsh small producers, because while Wales accounts for only 15 per cent. of the outgoers so far signed up, about 25 per cent. of the reallocated quota will go to small producers in Wales. That is a clear indication of how the scheme has been directed to help small producers and rural areas in Wales.

Mr. Geraint Howells: I am grateful to the Minister for trying to clarify the position in order to avoid a slanging match. I respect the hon. Gentleman in many ways, and he has been very fair in many of our debates. Out of the 200 small farmers in Wales who have accepted the outgoers scheme, how many have herds of fewer than 40 cows?

Mr. MacGregor: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will table a specific question on that. I suspect that the vast majority have fewer than 40 cows, because in the early stages the scheme has concentrated on small producers.

The hon. Gentleman also suggested that part quotas should be introduced into the outgoers scheme. As I have already said, we are bound by the Community regulations.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that a producer who had to sell his herd would face a considerable tax payment, thereby reducing the amount available either to start another business or to reduce his overdraft. He knows that, in addition to the favourable treatment in the outgoers scheme, we have through the herd basis on taxation given favourable treatment to the producer who wants to get out and who gets rid of 20 per cent. or more of his total herd. Under the herd basis, the proceeds of selling the herd will be totally tax free. In addition, we made a change in the Finance Act 1984 to enable much greater flexibility this year and last so that the producer could elect for the herd basis and take advantage of it. That is an important point in relation to tax treatment and the proceeds available to continue a business in another direction.

Mr. Geraint Howells rose——

Mr. MacGregor: In view of the time, I shall not give way. I am fairly certain that the hon. Gentleman and I will have an opportunity to debate this further in Committee.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) for his opening remarks. He said that the system was beginning to settle down. We have tried to operate the scheme as helpfully and flexibly as we possibly could within the rules ever since it was introduced.

My hon. Friend urged that there should be greater interchange between wholesale and direct sale quotas, particularly for mixed businesses. We entirely agree, and for many months in Council meetings we have endeavoured to get a change. We have put forward a proposal to the Commission and the Council which will achieve that without undermining the super-levy system. The previous agriculture Commissioner said that he would consider this, but the previous Commission was clearly reluctant to make any changes in its latter months. My right hon. Friend and I will again raise this point with the new Commissioner Mr. Andriessen, when we meet him tomorrow. We have it very much in mind.

Within the existing rules we have the opportunity, through the MMB, to undertake a swap shop. As my hon. Friend may know, we have now reached agreement on how that will operate, and the information has now gone out to producers from the MMB. That will present a limited possibility at least of getting greater flexibility and interchange between wholesale and direct sale quotas.

My hon. Friend also raised the much wider issue of transferability of quota generally. It was also referred to by the hon. Member for East Lothian, my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford, who called for leasing of quotas, my hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Mr. Alexander) and the hon. Member for Pontypridd. We would like to see much greater flexibility in the quota system and more transferability of quota. The first aim was to get the outgoers scheme operating; that was what we concentrated on. We are now moving to ideas on the transferability of quota, and I understand why so many hon. Members have raised this issue. I agree that it is desirable to try to achieve something.

The hon. Member for Pontypridd suggested that there was almost unanimous agreement about what should be done. It is not as simple as that, because there are many difficult problems. However, this is an appropriate opportunity to tell the House that in the last few days we have issued a consultative document entitled "Mobility of Quota". I have it with me. It goes into all the issues and difficulties raised by hon. Members who have asked for greater transferability of quota, and is a genuine consultation document. There are many issues to be decided and we are also going out to the industry for consultation. I urge my hon. Friends to obtain a copy of this document. It is in the Library. Alternatively, I shall happily provide them with a copy so that we can obtain their views.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: How do we obtain copies of the consultative document?

Mr. MacGregor: I am sure that hon. Members would wish to have copies of their own, and if they contact my office I shall ensure that they get them immediately.

Whatever we finally decide should be obtained for the United Kingdom, it must be agreed by the Commission and in the Council. One way or another we must ensure that it is put on the negotiating table. That will not be easy. But the consultation document outlines the direction in which we should like to go and shows that this is the next stage on which we would like to see action.

My hon. Friend the Member for Devizes also spoke of the delay in informing people of their quota, particularly their secondary quota. I have partly dealt with that, but another important point is that up to September no super levy in England and Wales will be paid this year for producers who overproduced. That may well be the position at the end of the year. For the year as a whole, in England and Wales there is room for some recovery of production. So long as production in the three months from January to March 1985 is not more than about 2 per cent. above production in the same period last year, no levy will be payable by wholesale producers selling to the MMB at the end of the marketing year. That is important for those who still do not know what their secondary quotas are.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson) specifically asked about our proposals for the outgoers scheme in Northern Ireland. We are still assessing the results of the scheme throughout the United Kingdom. We do not yet know the outcome, but we are aware that a shortfall will occur in Northern Ireland. As my right hon. Friend said this afternoon, we and our colleagues concerned with agriculture, including my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, are looking at whether there are ways of dealing with difficulties which arise from this disappointing response.

The amount of payment of levy due from Northern Ireland will be a good deal less than the £5 million at the end of September which the hon. Gentleman suggested. We have made it clear, as has the Prime Minister, that the supplementary levy arrangements must be applied properly by all member states. We are not prepared to see our producers disadvantaged compared with others. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that at the end of the day, depending on the outcome of discussions in the new Council and with the new Commission, we still have a liability to a payment in Northern Ireland up to the end of September.

But we are keeping the situation under review. We have to be ready to collect and pay over any levies which may be due to us once the legal position becomes clearer and we are satisfied that other member states are conforming to the requirements, always depending upon the outcome of further discussions which are taking place currently in the Council.

Mr. James Nicholson: I am grateful to the Minister for recognising that at the end of the day the money is still there and that the Bill is still against the farmers in Northern Ireland. However, will he deal with the point I made regarding the quality of the relationship between farmers in Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom, especially the small farmers and bringing up to 1983 levels those producers with fewer than 200,000 litres?

Mr. MacGregor: That is very much tied up with the outcome of the discussions which we are having on the outgoers scheme and the disappointing response in Northern Ireland. I can go no further this evening than to say to the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh that we are aware of the problem and that we are discussing it.

The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) raised a point about direct sellers and asked for clear guidance on the position of direct sellers if they have overproduced by the end of the year. The hon. Member is quite right. Direct sellers are not under the same formula B as the wholesale producers in England and Wales. Therefore, individual sellers who were over their quota at the end of the year would be liable to the super levy. I am very much aware of some of the points which the hon. Member for Truro and other hon. Members have made about the position of direct sellers. We are anxious to obtain greater flexibility for them. I take the point that they are producing for a market. They are not producing for intervention. This is a very important aspect.

The hon. Member also asked about the co-responsibility levy, as did my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris). We have to take into account the fact that the co-responsibility levy raises a considerable sum of money which goes into the dairy products pot in the Community. It was estimated to be £412 million in 1984 for the Community as a whole. It is put to certain uses, such as promotional campaigns, the school milk programme, the normal disposal measures relating to butter, and so on. If the co-responsibility levy disappeared, either we should be back to the budgetary problem or we should have to drop some of those schemes.

There is, therefore, still a problem. We share the hon. Member's view about the co-responsibility levy. We are anxious that its impact should be reduced. Provided that everything else could be sorted out, we should welcome a proposal to abolish it, but it would have to be looked at in the context of the other measures to continue restraint in the milk sector.

Mr. Penhaligon: On the co-responsibility levy, the point which the Minister makes regarding the use to which the money is put to get rid of the surplus—the schools programme and so on—is logical, but what part of the £400 million that is raised would be used?

Mr. MacGregor: All of it would go into those sorts of schemes. A few days ago I saw a precise breakdown of where it has gone in the last year, but I was unable to get hold of it for this debate. If, therefore, the hon. Member will table a question I shall make sure that he receives an answer almost immediately. My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives asked for more flexibility and said that the quotas should not necessarily be linked to the land. One of the main points of the mobility of quota paper is precisely that. I am sure that he will wish to study the paper and let us have his comments.

My hon. Friend also asked when, under the outgoers scheme, the allocation of quota to bring small producers up to the 1983 level would occur. My right hon. Friend dealt with this point. Briefly, my right hon. Friend said that this year, because most of the producers coming out of the outgoers scheme have already used up a great deal of their quota for this year, there is not a great deal left and that we shall be concentrating on hardship cases. But the small producers may find that there is no levy to be paid at the end of this year and that we have every intention of making sure that the small producers of fewer than 200,000 litres are in 1985-86 brought up in full to the 1983 production levels.

My hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) attacked the quota system as a whole. I dislike the controls and the bureaucracy that quotas entail, but I hope that my hon. Friend recognises that there is a limit to the financial support that we can give for producing surpluses that cannot be sold on the market and that go into intervention stores. The amount of support for the dairy industry last year—my hon. Friend gave the impression that there was none—was colossal. In 1984 it amounted to £3,400 million across the Community as a whole and to several hundred million pounds in this country. One could do without the bureaucracy of schemes of this sort if we dispensed with financial support of that kind, but I suspect that my hon. Friend's constituents would not appreciate it. Since we could not obtain a solution based upon a reduction in price, which itself would not have been heinous, we had to accept the quota system.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) asked a question during my right hon. Friend's speech. I can confirm to the right hon. Member, as my right hon. Friend said, that there is no restriction in the Community legislation upon the reallocation of the outgoers quota across regional boundaries. However, we would need to look again at the detailed provisions of our own dairy produce quotas regulations if we wished to do this. We should need to specify precisely how the transfer was to be carried out. However, there is no bar upon it under the Community regulations.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Did I understand the Minister earlier in his speech to say that in order to make such transfers we should have to go to the Community for its agreement? Perhaps that was said in a different context.

Mr. MacGregor: No, I do not think that is what my right hon. Friend said. That is not the case. It is possible within the Community regulations.

I come finally to the points made by the hon. Member for Pontypridd. I hope that he will forgive me, in view of the fact that I have been speaking for a long time, if I do not go into some of the wider issues which he raised. They were interesting issues which we shall have to debate later about the impact on rural areas, but on this Bill it would not be appropriate for me to take up the time of the House upon them. However, I should like to deal with one or two of the hon. Member's specific points.

The hon. Member asked whether it is the Government's intention, through the outgoers scheme, to keep the small producer in operation. The answer absolutely is yes. The primary objective of the outgoers scheme is to reallocate quotas to the small producer who is staying in milk production. The hon. Member hinted that because we started by making firm offers to those small producers who want to come out we were, in a sense, letting the small producer help the small producer, but I repeat that the primary objective is to reallocate the quota. Since there was over-subscription of the outgoers scheme, we took the view that it was sensible to allow those small producers who wished voluntarily to come out of milk production to have the first option to do so, but it was in no sense an attempt to say that small producers are helping small producers. If no small producers had taken up the firm offer of the outgoers scheme, we should then have gone on to the next stage—the producers. However, I repeat that the primary objective is to give the small producer who wishes to stay in an opportunity to stay in at his 1983 production levels.

Finally, the hon. Member asked me to clarify the position on two of the figures to which my right hon. Friend referred in his opening speech—the 35 per cent. and the 11 per cent. I well understand the difficulty which the hon. Member has with some of the figures, but there is no real connection between the two. The 35 per cent. is an indication — it can be no more than that at the moment — of the amount of scaling down which may have to happen to the special cases—expanders—when we see finally what the tribunals have awarded and what the panels which have not gone to the tribunal have awarded.

We made it clear from the outset that we should allow a certain proportion to be deducted from the primary quota in order to provide for those special cases but that it was very probable that it would not be sufficient and that therefore there would have to be a scaling down. We made it clear throughout that there may have to be quite substantial scaling down. My right hon. Friend said today that at this stage it could be up to 35 per cent., but we have to be very clear that it is still a tentative figure because there is still a great deal of work to be done as the tribunal figures come through.

The 11 per cent. related to the reallocation of quota to small producers next year. The 11 per cent. figure will enable small producers to return to the 1983 production levels next year. That may sound a little odd since the reduction for 1983 was 9 per cent., so let me explain briefly.

If the original primary allocation of primary quota to the small producer was 9 per cent. below its 1983 level, it has to be rather over 9 per cent. above the 1984-85 level to take him back to his 1983 level. But there is the further point that the additional 1 per cent. that will have to be reduced next year because the transitional period runs out will not apply to that small producer. Therefore, we have said that it will be 11 per cent. to enable a small producer to return to his 1983 production level without any penalty on the loss of the transitional period. I hope that that explains briefly a rather complicated matter.

I hope that I have dealt with most of the issues that have been raised in the debate. It has come through clearly from the debate that there is broad support for the Bill. Some, inevitably, would wish it to go further, but it has broad support. We are anxious to get it on the statute book for the cause of the small producers. Therefore, I hope that it will have a fair and quick wind in Committee.

[Mr. MacGregor]

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

MILK (CESSATION OF PRODUCTION) BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purpose of any Act resulting from the Milk (Cessation of Production) Bill ("the Act"), it is expedient to authorise—

(a) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any payments made under the Act by a Minister of the Crown for the purpose of compensating persons, who are or have been registered in the direct sales register or a wholesale register maintained under the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1984, for discontinuing milk production; and

(b) the payment into the Consolidated Fund of any sums repaid to a Minister of the Crown under the Act.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

European Community (Fisheries Arrangements)

8 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 10171/84 and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's unnumbered explanatory memorandum on 1985 total allowable catches and quotas; of the unnumbered explanatory memorandum on 1985 catch quotas in Greenland waters, and of the unnumbered explanatory memoranda on the fisheries agreements for 1985 between the European Community and Norway, the European Community and the Faroe Islands and the European Community and Spain; of European Community Documents Nos. 10697/84 on technical conservation measures and 10264/84 on 1985 fish guide prices; and welcomes and approves the provisional agreement reached on these arrangements for 1985 with the improvements obtained for the United Kingdom fishing industry.

The motion before the House makes it clear that tonight's debate covers a number of documents on EC fisheries legislation, most of which are concerned with the fishing arrangements for 1985 under the common fisheries policy.

Those documents have been recommended for the further consideration of the House by the Select Committee on European Legislation. We are, as always, grateful to the Committee for its careful scrutiny of these matters, particularly on this occasion when, I understand, it held a meeting yesterday in addition to its planned programme in order to deal with some of the later documents which have come before us.

Before going into detail on the various documents, I should first explain that the complete proposals on total allowable catches and quotas and on the third country agreements were presented on 18 December for discussion at the Fisheries Council the very next day, and that, after lengthy negotiations, a compromise package emerged to which all the other member states were able to give their agreement.

I considered that that package was satisfactory for the United Kingdom, too, but, in view of the recommendation of the Select Committee, I entered a formal reservation on the adoption of the regulations for 1985, pending a debate in the House.

However, in order that fishing should not be interrupted, I agreed that the regulations should be adopted on an interim basis to 20 January only, pending clarification of the United Kingdom position following completion of the Parliamentary scrutiny procedures. Therefore, the position of the House is fully reserved.

I should also mention that the proposals on guide prices for 1985, which were considered by the Select Committee on 14 November, came before the Council for urgent adoption in a revised form on 4 December. Given the nature of the proposals, and the need for a number of detailed implementing measures to be taken before the new prices could take effect on 1 January, I judged that it would not be in our interest to hold up adoption.

Therefore, I subsequently wrote explaining this decision to the Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) who is so assiduous about such matters, and I am glad to say that with his customary understanding he was able fully to accept my explanation.

Having dealt with these procedural questions, let me now deal with the substance of the measures involved. I shall deal first with the TACs and quotas for 1985 covered by document 10171/84 and the unnumbered explanatory memorandum of 4 January.

The annual fixing of TACs and quotas is of course one of the principal cornerstones of the common fisheries policy, determining as it does the opportunities for fishermen, and it is of particular concern to the United Kingdom given our major interest in most of the stocks concerned.

In 1984, agreement was reached on the TACs and quotas for the year at the end of January, but we and the other member states were determined this time to make every effort to settle TACs and quotas for 1985 before the beginning of the year, so as to give the industry a clear basis on which to plan. That we have now achieved, subject only to my own parliamentary reservation, and I see that as an important step forward in the development of the common fisheries policy as an effective instrument of fisheries regulation and management. I should also add that that was no easy achievement, given in particular the need for prior negotiations with a number of third countries, notably Norway.

Therefore, I think it right to pay tribute both to the Commission and to the Irish President of the council, that an acceptable compromise package was reached in the course of a single day's negotiations, particularly as a full set of proposals was not available until the day before the Council meeting.

I shall now outline the main elements of interest to the United Kingdom, starting with the North sea joint stocks. Here, there are increases in the availability of all white fish stocks, as agreed with Norway in the light of the latest scientific advice.

The higher United Kingdom quotas for cod, haddock and saithe in particular, representing increases of 15 per cent., 19·8 per cent. and 11·1 per cent. respectively, will be most welcome to our fishermen both north and south of the border.

In particular, it is gratifying that North sea cod, about which concern has been expressed in the House on a number of occasions, has shown enough signs of recovery to enable the TAC to be increased significantly for 1985.

It has not yet proved possible to reach agreement with Norway on the problem of the allocation of the North sea herring stock. But, without sacrificing our existing firm position on that issue, it has been agreed that negotiations will continue in the course of 1985.

In the meantime, both parties will regulate their herring fisheries independently on an interim basis in the light of the scientific advice. That involves a provisional TAC for the Community sector of 320,000 tonnes.

The United Kingdom quota in the northern and central zones—IV A and B—which is more important for us than the southern zone, IV C, is to be 58,490 tonnes, more than double our figures for 1984. For the southern zone, IV C, our quota has also increased to 9,700 tonnes, and the provision allowing the transfer of a part of this quantity in IV C to the central North sea, IV B has been increased from 20 to 25 per cent. So we could using that transfer mechanism, fish 60,915 tonnes in IV A and B and 7,275 in IV C.

That allocation between the three North sea areas therefore constitutes for the United Kingdom a considerable improvement over the Commission's original proposal and I know that the fishing industry attaches great importance to the changes which were achieved in the negotiation.

The quantities of North sea mackerel available to the Community under the agreement with Norway have also been also increased. In previous years, the United Kingdom had not been awarded a quota for this stock, but in this year's package several member states, including the United Kingdom have been allocated a small quantity, of 330 tonnes, mainly intended to cover unavoidable by-catches of mackerel in the North sea herring fisheries.

I come to stocks which lie outside the North sea. The TACs for west of Scotland haddock and herring will be lower than in 1984 in the light of clear scientific advice on the state of these stocks. I was, however, able to ensure that the figures in the final package were significantly higher than those originally proposed by the Commission. This is particularly important for the west coast herring fishery.

The so-called Manx herring TAC is further increased for 1985 to 4,400 tonnes, which will be particularly welcome to the Northern Irish boats which mainly prosecute this fishery.

The TAC for western mackerel, a stock of great importance to the United Kingdom fishing industry, is to be reduced following firm scientific advice. However, as I believe our industry recognises, this reduction is clearly in the best interest of the long-term conservation of the stock, and it should not in practice restrict the activities of our fishermen, as the reduced United Kingdom quota for 1985, of 220,000 tonnes, is still higher than our expected catch, which was about 185,000 tonnes in 1984.

Before leaving the question of TACs, I should mention a group of small but locally important white fish stocks in area VII; that is, the Irish sea, Bristol channel, Western approaches and English channel. During 1984, the TACs for this group of stocks and the management of the United Kingdom quotas attracted a great deal of attention, and although we were able to get a number of the TACs increased and arrange quota swaps with other member states, it was unfortunately necessary to close certain of the sole and plaice fisheries at various stages in the year.

Despite this, the Commission's original proposals for 1985 would have meant reductions in the United Kingdom quota for some of these stocks, and I thus pressed strongly for these proposals to be reconsidered.

I am glad to report that the compromise package retains the quotas for all the area VII white fish stocks at least the 1984 level, while in the case of certain stocks of particular interest to our fishermen—notably, sole in both sections of the English channel and plaice both in the Irish sea and in the English channel — we have secured modest increases.

We shall of course continue to have to manage these, and, indeed, many of the other, quotas carefully, since the fishing opportunities they provide are by no means unlimited. Nevertheless, I can confidently state that the outcome of the Council's deliberations on the quotas for 1985 represents an exceedingly good package for the United Kingdom fishing industry, and it has been warmly welcomed by the fishermen's representatives, and I have no hesitation in commending it to the House.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Do not the improvements in TACs and United Kingdom quotas place an additional responsibility on the Sea Fish Industry Authority more effectively to promote the sale of fish throughout the United Kingdom? Is the right hon. Gentleman satisfied with the performance of that authority?

[Dr. Norman A. Godman]

Mr. Jopling: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has raised that important point. I am sure that he is pleased to know that the Community has agreed to a programme which facilitates this important work and I am sure that the House is grateful to him for drawing its attention to that point.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): We are glad that the TACs are in place for 1985 at such an early stage. Causing the industry some concern in the latter part of 1984 was the fact that for saithe in the North sea the Commission had a stoppage of fishing before France and Belgium had fully fished their quotas. Concern was expressed that at a future time there might be a premature stoppage of fishing of a particular species perhaps before we had fished our quota. Has that been discussed by the Council of Ministers, and may we have an assurance that there will not be such a premature stoppage at a future date?

Mr. Jopling: I cannot give an assurance that there will not be a stoppage of that sort. We have discussed this matter in the Council. The Community must look at the total amount of fish caught. It is possible that a situation could arise — the hon. Gentleman has drawn the attention of the House to such a situation — when, because of over-fishing by one nation, the fishery must be closed before all the other countries with a quota in the area have fished their quotas. This is an unsatisfactory matter. I will now deal with the point which the hon. Gentleman has raised. We have consistently stressed to the European Commission the need to ensure that the rules of the common fisheries policy are properly enforced by all member states.

It was largely as a result of our efforts that the Commission set up its own fisheries inspectorate to investigate the way in which the common fisheries policy rules are enforced by the Administrations of member states, and I am pleased to say that we saw a good deal of progress in 1984. I appreciate that, rightly, the House has been keenly interested in this issue during the last year.

The inspectorate carried out a programme of over 50 visits to member states in 1984, as a result of which a number of irregularities were uncovered. We have asked the Commission to produce a report on the first year's operation of the inspectorate and have made it clear that we shall be looking to the Commission to propose suitable penalties for any systematic overfishing of quotas which can be proven.

This relates to the intervention of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) because the key point is to spot at an early stage the moment when a nation has over-fished its quota, so that when the fishery is closed, other people do not have to suffer. We are alert to this difficult problem and I assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall continue to work on the matter.

In 1985, further improvements in quota observance should result from the introduction of standard log books and landings returns, which are now expected to be enforced throughout the Community by 1 April. This is welcome progress and it is a date which we extracted from the commissioner as a result of our own initiative.

I come to the various arrangements for fishing in third country waters and at Greenland, as well as the reciprocal arrangements for third country fishermen in member states' waters. In view of the potential interest of the House in these matters, I made my agreement to these proposals also subject to the parliamentary reservation which I have explained.

I start with Greenland. Because the treaty covering Greenland's withdrawal from the Community had not been ratified by all member states within the agreed timetable, Greenland now remains, legally speaking, a part of the Community, although the withdrawal treaty is expected to come into full force later this month.

The Council accordingly agreed, subject to my reservation, interim arrangements pending the entry into force of the withdrawal treaty and the associated fisheries agreement. These arrangements are described in the unnumbered explanatory memorandum of 3 January.

The quotas are, with one exception, at the level provided for in the protocol to the long-term fisheries agreement. The exception is for cod at west Greenland, where scientific advice has indicated that the stock is in a serious condition. In order to allow fishing to continue without prejudicing the decision which it will be for the Greenland authorities to take after withdrawal, German and United Kingdom vessels will be able to fish until 31 January against the balance of their quotas remaining uncaught from 1984—although I must make it clear that United Kingdom catches in Greenland waters in 1984 were in fact very low.

To move from Greenland's icy waters to those of Norway, I have already explained that agreement was eventually reached in mid-December with Norway on a reciprocal fisheries arrangement for 1985 on a basis that is very satisfactory for the United Kingdom. Apart from the increases already mentioned in the availabilities of the joint stocks, the agreement—which is described in the unnumbered explanatory memorandum of 21 December — maintains our white fish quotas at Norway, which constitute the major remaining fisheries of interest to our distant-water fleet, and reductions were secured—at our request in these negotiations — in the allocation to Norway of western mackerel and west of Scotland herring.

On North sea herring, there will be no Norwegian access to the Community zone, pending the conclusion of further negotiations on the allocation of the stock. I hope that it will be possible to reach agreement on this in the course of 1985, as there are clear dangers to the long-term conservation of the stock if joint management arrangements cannot be restored. However, it must be said that the two sides are still far apart, and agreement will be very difficult to achieve, even on an ad hoc basis for 1985, let alone on the zonal attachment which both sides agree in principle should form the basis of lasting arrangements, as is the case with the other main joint stocks in the North sea.

The agreement with the Faroe Islands, as described in the unnumbered explanatory memorandum of 21 December, is of little interest to the United Kingdom. Nevertheless, it contains certain improvements from our point of view, notably reductions in the allocation to the Faroes of western mackerel and west of Scotland herring, and an exchange of letters committing the Faroes to negotiate constructively in the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation in June on the level of its intercepting salmon fisheries.

The final third country agreement mentioned in the motion is that with Spain. Given Spain's impending accession to the Community, which is a matter somewhat beyond the scope of tonight's debate, it has been agreed that Spain should in principle retain the same fishing opportunities in Community waters in 1985 as she obtained in 1984, and I think that this is only right. The arrangements are described in the unnumbered explanatory memorandum of 21 December, and the only change over last year is that the number of licences for the Spanish hake fishery will be reduced from 118 to 106.

That concludes my review of the TACs and third country agreements for 1985, but I think that the House would expect me to say a brief word about two other items that are covered by tonight's motion.

First, there is document 10697/84, which contains two proposals to amend the technical conservation regulation. One is simply that a decision on an increase in the mesh size for nets used in the English channel, which was due to be taken by 31 December 1984, should be deferred until 1 July 1987. This follows the most recent scientific advice that it has not been possible to make reliable assessments of the effects of mesh size changes in the channel because of the lack of appropriate data. I regret that this is so, but the Commission is now fully aware of the need to ensure that appropriate data are gathered, and I am hopeful that a proper assessment will be possible before the new deadline in 1987.

The same document also contains proposals to amend rules which apply to vessels fishing with beam trawls within 12 miles of our coasts. The present rules, which exclude from the 12-mile belt beam trawlers over 70 gross registered tonnes or 300 brake horsepower, have, as many hon. Members will be aware, proved extremely difficult to enforce. These new proposals are a development of proposals put forward earlier last year and debated in this House on 3 July. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State explained then, further consideration was to be given to other criteria for identifying a vessel's size.

As a result, the Commission's latest proposals include a formula for defining size by the product of the beam of a vessel and its overall length. All vessels which on that basis exceeded 120 sq m would then be prohibited from fishing within 12 miles of coasts with beam trawls. The proposal also includes an attempt to define engine power more precisely and to overcome problems associated with the derating of engines.

We are concerned to improve the enforceability of the rules governing beam trawling, but we are not convinced that these proposals will achieve this, not least because they are too complicated and likely to be too restrictive. We are not, however, alone in having reservations about this matter, and before the meeting of the Council on 4 December, it was agreed that this matter needed further study in a working group. The United Kingdom will of course be participating in that group, and we shall be taking fully into account the views and interests of the industry.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): My right hon. Friend will appreciate that there are those among us who think, for good fishery conservation reasons, that it would have been better if there had been no trawlers at all. Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind, particularly in that part of the North sea, the problems of British Telecom, as the beam trawlers fish up the telephone lines between here and Europe?

Mr. Jopling: I am glad to say that that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry rather than me, although I am concerned to hear about it. Beam trawling is probably one of the most controversial matters in fishing, as my hon. Friend probably knows as well as I do. If he wishes to make speeches advocating that beam trawling should be banned altogether, I recommend him to go and to try his luck in Brixham, and see how that goes down.

The final document before the House is 10264/84, which contains the Commission's proposals for guide prices in 1985. The importance of these prices lies in the fact that they are used to calculate the withdrawal prices that members of the fish producers' organisations must observe if they are to receive compensation from FEOGA for fish which has to be withdrawn from the human consumption market, and the Commission's proposals are in three parts.

The first of these is of greatest importance because it covers the main species of commercial value to United Kingdom fishmen. These are cod, plaice, herring and mackerel, and in this part of the Commission's proposal there is provision for increases ranging from nil to 6 per cent. Taken as a whole, the proposal seemed to us to have been drawn up on a sensible basis.

Nevertheless, we managed in subsequent discussion to secure agreement that the guide prices for plaice should be increased by three percentage points for the first four months of the year and by two further percentage points for the rest of the year, and that the guide price for cod should be increased by 6 per cent. instead of the 5 per cent. proposed by the Commission. Conversely, and as a consequence of adjustments made to reflect the concerns of other member states, the proposed increase for haddock was reduced by one percentage point to 5 per cent.

Overall, however, the changes made to the Commission's proposals represented on balance an improvement which should be welcome to United Kingdom fishermen. As I explained earlier, it was important to reach agreement sufficiently early in December to allow all the other prices derived from the guide prices to be applied from the beginning of the new fishing year in January; otherwise fishermen would have lost the benefit of new and higher price levels for the first few weeks of the new year. For that reason, I hope that the House will understand why, at the Fisheries Council on 4 December, I agreed to the modified guide price proposals, which all other member states were also in a position to adopt.

This occasion provides me with the opportunity, however, to commend to the House the revised proposals and all those in the other documents before us tonight covering the many aspects of the common fisheries policy. I hope that what I have said will have been enough to convince the House that the arrangements for 1985 which we have been able to negotiate, including the improvements that we have obtained for the benefit of the United Kingdom fishing industry, are satisfactory. I have no hesitation in asking the House to approve these proposals.

8.30 pm

Mr. Mark Hughes (City of Durham): I might be breaking with protocol by starting with a series of thanks. I thank the Minister for arranging this debate, for putting in the reserve the request of the Select Committee on European Legislation and for enabling us, at the earliest opportunity after the recess, to have the debate for which the Opposition pressed. I am grateful to the Minister for his efforts in producing this debate. I pass on the thanks of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), the Chairman of the Scrutiny Committee, who is very grateful and who wishes his thanks for this debate to be relayed.

Somewhat unusually, I thank the Deliverer of the Vote and his staff because a vast stack of documents were becoming available only during the recess. I thank them for making those documents available to me and other hon. Members at the earliest opportunity. I thank them also for all the hard work they have done to ensure that this plethora of material has been made available for tonight's debate.

On behalf of the fishing industry I repeat the thanks that have been expressed to me by Scottish, English and Welsh fishermen that an agreement was reached before 1 January and that we did not have to go through the farce of acting as though 1 January did not exist. I am sure that the whole fishing industry, whatever the detailed arguments it has against little bits, is delighted and thanks the Council of Ministers in general and our Ministers in particular for what has been achieved. It is a marvellous achievement, after the years of uncertainty that have surrounded the fishing industry, to know when the fishing year starts. Regrettably, the fact that fishermen have not known for the past eight years when the year started was a symptom of the disasters they have faced.

I thank the Minister on behalf of the fishing industry for the 16,000 extra tonnes of North sea cod and the 20,000 extra tonnes of North sea haddock quotas. Along with many other hon. Members I have received a briefing note from the Scottish Fishermens Federation which states that North sea cod quotas will increase by approximately 16,000 tonnes. The federation states:

"there are also smaller increases in our Quotas of North Sea Whiting, Saithe and Plaice and all in all the outcome should ensure a good year's fishing for the White Fish Sector of the Scottish fleet and at the same time go some considerable way towards meeting the problems encountered by the Processing Side of the Industry in 1984."

I convey to the Government also the thanks of the Scottish fishing industry and the Tyneside and Shields fishing industry for the strong stance the Government are taking in the negotiations with Norway. We are clearly in the lead, and the Government have the support of the east coast herring fishing industry totally and unequivocally. The demands made by the Norwegian Government are extravagant and unacceptable, and this Government will have the total support, and the thanks, of the British fishing industry, especially on the east coast, for their stand in negotiations with the Norwegians over these North sea stocks.

So much for the thanks. I now turn to a number of small questions, some of which were raised by the Minister. Did we fish any cod off the west coast of Greenland during 1984? Is it other than a paper transaction? I suspect that we have not fished that cod, that we have not wished to fish it or have had the capacity to fish it. Therefore, to include this measure is nonsense and to pretend that it is a significant part of any package helps no one.

The exchange of notes and the letter received from the Chief Minister of the Faroes leads me to suspect that, before too long, there could be a Faroese salmon war unless we are careful. At long last, we may have picked someone of our own size in such matters with whom to have a fight. The relationship between the Faroese assault on north Atlantic salmon fisheries and that by Greenland is like the relationship between a gnat and a vulture. I am afraid that we are straining to reach an agreement on salmon catches with the Faroese while we are permitting catches to be made in Greenland waters with no apparent difficulty.

I should like the Minister to be clear about the relationship between the white fish and pelagic fisheries fished by the Faroese and the discussions occurring within the confines of the north Atlantic salmon fishing arrangements and the reserved position the Faroese Government have taken if those arrangements should fail. We appear to be getting fairly close to going to war with the Faroes over a few salmon while the vast quantity of Greenland salmon are left untouched. That would be unsatisfactory to the Faroese and wholly unsatisfactory to our salmon fisheries.

The Minister mentioned en passant the control of trawling within the 12-mile limit on certain parts of our coast. Having read the documents, I can only agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the present proposals on derating of engines and so forth are so complex as to be unintelligible to anyone other than a marine engineer. Unless one takes account of the hauling capacity of a beam trawler, its catching capacity cannot be measured adequately. What matters is not merely the size of a vessel but how hard it can plough its beam trawl through on its engine power.

I have great sympathy with the view that beam trawling is repugnant and should be banned as soon as possible. I hope that the Government will press—at least in the long term if they cannot achieve it immediately—for the total abandonment of beam trawling in Community waters. I accept that some species will be more difficult to catch without beam trawling but as there is no way to ensure effective policing by Community enforcement authorities or by national authorities I see no alternative to banning it altogether. I hope that the Minister will take that very seriously.

On the long-term joint North sea herring stock shared between Norway and the Community in areas IV A and IV B the Minister said that up to 60,900 tonnes could be caught, including swap arrangements with other areas. Again, may we have an assurance that these are not just paper fish and that that quantity of herring can actually be fished? Moreover, will it find a market at a price sufficient to recompense the fishermen for catching it so that this delicious, edible fish is not turned into fishmeal due to intervention prices? We have properly allowed for intervention, but in the past year there have been periods during which the landing price of herring was so low as not to recompense the fishermen. To increase the quota in those circumstances is an extraordinary exercise in marketing. If herring cannot be sold for human consumption, are the Government satisfied that there should be an increase in the quota and the minimum price?

Dr. Godman: I asked the Minister earlier whether he was satisfied with the performance of the Sea Fish Industry Authority in promoting commercial species, especially in view of the additional catches which may or may not exist. We all welcome the increased quotas, but in those circumstances the authority has a very important role in persuading the consumer to buy the fish at its real value.

Mr. Hughes: I agree entirely. The difficulty is that after 10 years without herring the housewife has lost the appetite for it and in many cases has never learnt the skill of cooking it. It is regrettable, but people do not know how to put the oatmeal around the herring to dry it out, so there are technical difficulties in persuading the consumer. The Sea Fish Industry Authority and other bodies certainly have a major promotional and educational role to play in convincing people of the excellence of herring. My point, however, is that giving an extra quota of herring to be turned into fishmeal has a distinctly distasteful element. The British people should be educated to enjoy herring as real fish rather than as bacon and eggs put through a pig and a hen.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) may wish to say something about the Manx fisheries. Are we satisfied with the arrangements for the policing and control of those fisheries? I appreciate that there are constitutional difficulties which it would not be appropriate to discuss today. Nevertheless, I have found that the size of kippers available on the Isle of Man is often considerably below the minimum size permitted for mainland herring catches. Is the Minister satisfied that catches of undersized herrings which would be illegal elsewhere in the United Kingdom are not being allowed on the Isle of Man?

As for the sole and plaice allocation in area VII, is the Minister satisfied that sufficient stock exists to be caught? I have been in touch with many ports on both sides of the southern Irish sea and many have stated that there is an absolute shortage of decent-sized sole and plaice in those waters. If the fish are not there to be caught, an increase in the quota means not real fish but phoney fish and a phoney deal.

The Minister referred to common enforcement and the inspectorate. It would be foolish to suggest that 1 April is a proper day to introduce standard logbooks. I regret to say that I still have little faith in the willingness of some of our Community partners to enforce the common fisheries policy with the rigour with which we have enforced it in this country. However much we welcome most of the proposals and however much we thank the Government on behalf of the British fishing industry, unless our industry can be assured that it is not being discriminated against as a result of differential enforcement regimes in different countries those thanks will have a hollow ring.

I urge the Government to come back to us as soon as there are more effective arrangements for the enforcement of total allowable catches and quotas so that all fishermen sailing from ports in these islands will know that they are being treated fairly and equally compared with their fellow fishermen from Belgium, Holland, France and Germany. At present, our fishermen still do not believe that that is the case. However much the House welcomes what has been achieved—I certainly would not wish to do other than assist the removal of the parliamentary reserve that the Minister properly put on—in another sense there must still be a parliamentary reserve in that we enforce the common policies whereas many of our colleagues do not—and that rankles throughout our fishing industry.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): There have been too many statesmanlike speeches from the Front Benches. The only point of comparison between my speech and those is that mine will be shorter.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister on what has been achieved in establishing total allowable catches and quotas. Congratulations should go to the entire Council of Ministers, but there is no doubt that the contribution of those who are loosely described as the United Kingdom Fisheries Ministers has been substantial, and I was glad that the Opposition spokesman fully acknowleged that. The fact that the agreement has been reached in time for the start of the year is an achievement in itself.

All this bodes well for the future development of the common fisheries policy. I heard the president of the Scottish Fishermen's Federation, hot-foot from Brussels after the agreement was reached, speaking at a substantial function for fishermen in Fife. He certainly recognised what had been achieved, and I am glad to see from the federation's brief that in the sober light of a January day it still supports the conclusions expressed by Willie Hay in Fife in December.

The anxiety that I heard among the fishermen in my constituency was not about quotas or total allowable catches. Their present anxiety is because they are experiencing difficulty in finding the fish. This gives me a slight shiver of anxiety in that I do hope that the scientists are right in their estimates of what are appropriate total allowable catches. They have been wrong before and I hope that the catches being agreed are appropriate in the present situation with regard to conservation.

There is deep anxiety in the fishing community in the east of Scotland about the way in which the Community has allowed the bycatch on Norway pout fishing to grow from 10 to 18 per cent. It is a large percentage anyway, but it is a fishery which tends to be carried out, as industrial fishery is, in pretty large tonnages. The amount of good fish that can be picked up in that kind of bycatch is bound to have some significant effect in the overall determination of what is an appropriate amount of fish to be caught over any particular period.

I understand that the Scottish Fishermen's Federation is planning an experimental voyage to prove its point that that amount of bycatch is too great. If that voyage proves the Federation's point, as it believes it will, I hope that my right hon. Friend will return to the question vigorously in due course in the Council of Ministers.

Dr. Godman: May I ask the hon. Gentleman how effective he thinks inspection is of these catches of, say, Norway pout, and how effective the inspectors can be in determining the level of the bycatch?

Mr. Henderson: The hon. Gentleman raises a good question which I would be happy to leave as a rhetorical one for the moment, but I accept the point which he appears to make.

I wish next to draw to my right hon. Friend's attention the importance of achieving a sensible agreement between the European Community and Norway on a long-term share of the catches of herring. I was glad to hear him emphasise in opening the debate that we remain strongly of the view that what Norway was suggesting earlier is unacceptable, but I think it is important in the long term that agreement be reached. It is not sensible to have two separate ways of handling these matters. It is a common resource and I hope that with goodwill between Europe and Norway for the future we will have a better arrangement for the management of this fishery.

Lastly, on the question of the on-shore processing and distribution of fish, I think that much needs to be done. If I may make a constituency point, something needs to be done about Pitten Weem harbour where Fife regional council, which owns it, has blown hot and cold for some time about necessary improvements to the harbour and developments of it. Having stripped out its budget provision for the work, it has now reinstated the provision, and I hope that the Scottish Office will encourage it to continue to pursue such improvements. It is necessary for safety and it is necessary if East Nuek is to continue to play its historic role in contributing to the effectiveness of the fishing industry on the east coast of Scotland. I hope that, among other things, the Scottish Office will discuss with the council the appropriateness of promoting a provisional order so that when harbour works are agreed they can be embarked upon speedily.

It is in the way in which we distribute and sell fish ultimately that we ensure a prosperous fishing industry, and the arrangements which have been made in Brussels recently give more encouragement for the future than has existed for some time.

8.54 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): It is rare for those of us who usually gather on these Benches to praise Ministers rather than to bury them. I do not want to be quite as lavish in my praise as was my hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham (Mr. Hughes) because his lavish praise makes my somewhat cooler offerings seem churlish by comparison, but I think that a certain amount of cool praise is appropriate in the situation in which we find ourselves with regard to these documents. This is the first debate in my recollection in which I do not feel totally justified in adopting a wholly hostile reaction to EEC documents. This is for two prime reasons.

As was pointed out by the hon. Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson), this is an agreement for the year ahead which was settled in December of the previous year. That in itself is an achievement. It would seem that Irish logic applied to the EEC produces sense, and that is what we have in an agreement made in advance. These catches and our share of them hold out a better prospect for the industry in the year ahead. It is therefore right to give credit for that to Ministers. Too much praise might go to their heads too quickly and it is such an unusual event that we do not want to repeat it. However, in my view, it has been particularly difficult for the present incumbents in the Department to follow their predecessors whose team was essentially a public relations act rather than an act of real achievement — Ministers who got the glory and then moved on, leaving the present incumbents to tidy up the situation and to clear up the undoubted difficulties which in this instance I think have been successfully cleared up. I do not want to go further because the praise would go to their heads, so I will praise with faint damns from this point onwards.

We have to recognise that this is an improvement from a very bad position, and a particularly bad position in Grimsby where the fishing industry and its catches reached depths last year that we do not wish to plumb again this year. That is why it is so important to have these documents presented to us. The industry has been hanging on by its fingertips and the improvement has been achieved from a very bad position.

These are quotas that we would have regarded and rejected as inadequate three to four years ago in the negotiations then taking place for what we thought, and still think, are Britain's rights. They are certainly far smaller than we would have achieved had we been in the stronger position of being able to control our own destinies and our own fishing grounds. They must be viewed in that context. Improvement is not a compensation for the harm that has been done to the industry over the past few years. However, the improvement is welcome. The improvement in the cod quota is particularly welcome for Grimsby because we are a cod port. It is particularly welcome for the British United Trawlers vessels in Grimsby and for the pair of fishers whose cod catches are much bigger than the rest and are crucial to our port. Our catches were substantially down last year and the British United Trawlers vessels were laid up for six weeks and resumed fishing only when they had a new allocation from the sectoral quota. They will be hard pushed, even now, not to catch what they are allocated but to catch economically at these levels. The improvement is still welcome for all that.

But even this improvement in the quotas other than for cod is achieved at some cost. The cod quota increase and the total allowable catch increase seem, on the evidence, justified, as there is undoubtedly a greater stock abundance. There was a good year class in 1979 and the new catches seem realistic. But the others are more doubtful. In the EEC, where everything is politicised and where it becomes a game of trying to increase the catches to keep everybody happy, I wonder whether the scientists are not being put under some pressure as a result, and whether political fish are not being created in order to satisfy the demands put on the stocks.

In particular, I wonder whether the increase in plaice is due to Dutch pressure to be allowed to take legally what they have been taking illegally until now in excess of their allowances. I also wonder whether the whiting improvement is a way of sweetening a disastrous decision to increase the Danish bycatches. The increase in bycatches was cut from 20 per cent. to 18 per cent. and the Minister may think that he fought a good fight, but I believe that we should have refused to accept any increase. The increase from 10 per cent. to 18 per cent. in bycatches was wrong on whatever terms, and is generally regarded as such. It was a straightforward political decision, and it means that an inviolate part of an agreed collective package has been unravelled for the convenience of one member state.

Dr. Godman: Am I not right in thinking that this derogation concerning the increase in the bycatch allowed to Danish fishermen fishing for Norway pout ends on 31 May 1985? Perhaps we should be seeking an assurance from the Minister that that increase will not be continued.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is right and has taken the words out of my mouth. Even though the increase has been reduced from 20 per cent. to 18 per cent., we want an assurance from the Minister that it will not be maintained. It is a question of British national interest not to allow that increase in Danish bycatches. Even if we overruled and it was deemed not to be a question of national interest, our moral position in refusing to accept an increase from 10 per cent. is strong. The Danish case is opportunitistic to say the least. If the increase is sustained, the Danes will get away with it once again. That is the essence of what has happened.

While I am talking about the iniquities of Denmark, perhaps I can seek an assurance from the Minister. His predecessor assured us that the 2,000 tonnes of cod that the Danes were deliberately given over their total allowable catch for three years only would cease at the end of next year. Will the hon. Gentleman repeat that assurance?

Welcome as it is, there are problems with the settlement. The first problem is that of political fish. The second is that the policing system is still not adequate. The long-delayed log books are at last coming into being, although to some ridicule from the industry, which says that 1 April is an appropriate date. But it must realise that the log books are an essential part of any policing system. However, they must be combined with an adequate Common Market force for policing and an adequate system for penalising those who catch more than their allocations. What has happened with the Germans and the North sea saithe—it was their over-fishing that led to the closure of the joint stocks, to the fury of the French —shows the need for some sanction to stop that going on. The same thing has happened with the Dutch and the mackerel. There has not been, and there does not seem to be, an effective punishment.

If the system is to operate properly and the allocations are to be respected, and if we, who are not necessarily the most law-abiding but are the best policed fishing industry in the Common Market, are to have faith in the system, we must have an assurance that transgressions will be penalised.

The negotiations with Spain are hanging over the industry. Spain has a massive fishing fleet that would be introduced to the Common Market and would compete with the fishing effort which is already too large for the available stocks. That represents a danger from which no transitional arrangements can adequately protect Britain in particular and Common Market fishing in general.

It seems that there may be an eight-year derogation with negotiations for a further two years, and the possibility of a further five-year derogation, if those negotiations do not succeed. In other words, the Spanish fleet may be held back for 15 years. At the end of that period the principle of access to the common fisheries stocks, which was developed essentially by other member states to get their fishing vessels into British fishing grounds, will be used by the Spanish against the entire Common Market, especially against France.

Fifteen years is a short time in fishing, especially when one considers that stocks are already threatened by the massive fishing effort. At the end of that period there will be a threat to both the United Kingdom and the entire EC fishing effort. However, there is a more immediate problem. Will the Minister tell the House what is proposed in respect of disguised or flag of convenience fishing? The Spaniards have already begun to use that. When Spain joins the EEC, we shall no longer have the protection of the requirement for 70 per cent. of crews in Spanish vessels which register in Britain to be EEC members because Spain will be an EEC member. That requirement is not being adequately enforced now, and when Spain joins the EEC it will be eliminated totally.

Because of unemployment in the fishing industry, a large number of skippers and crew members who know our grounds will be only too anxious to take jobs on Spanish vessels which will be free to register under a flag of convenience and to take advantage of British quotas by registering as British vessels. Therefore, what transitional arrangements will apply in respect of Spanish vessels registering in Britain when the 70 per cent. EEC requirement is no longer valid? What safeguards does the Minister propose?

The Spanish negotiations are being handled almost entirely by the Foreign Office. What input has MAFF into those negotiations? It seems that the Foreign Office is handling the negotiations in a closed and secretive fashion. As a representative of a fishing port and as someone who is not 100 per cent. enthusiastic about the Common Market, I am always suspicious of the Foreign Office handling negotiations that affect a vital national interest, which it can discount because of its Euro-enthusiasm, as, indeed, it discounted British fishing interests in the original entry negotiations.

To what extent is MAFF being consulted, and to what extent is the industry being consulted? What recognition is given to the industry's views in the negotiations? If the negotiations are handled by the Foreign Office without effective consultations with the industry, we have a formula for a further betrayal of our fishing industry.

In those circumstances, I am not prepared to welcome Spain to the joys of EEC membership — it has had ruinous consequences for Britain. We should use these negotiations to maintain an intransigent position to achieve better concessions and a firmer and more tolerable deal for our fishermen in the face of the threat from that massive fishing fleet.

My final point concerns only Grimsby. The fishing industry there has had a difficult and dangerous year, as I am sure the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) would agree. It has hung on by its fingertips. It is crucial to keep the industry going, and I believe that we have achieved that. The danger of the landing company collapsing has been averted, although I should have preferred the landing company to have been run by a co-operative of merchants, owners, lumpers and the town, so that all interests were integrated. However, we can still work towards that development. The important thing is that the landing company is still in operation and there is no danger of the port being closed.

The danger was averted by carrying out some drastic surgery. The lumper landing force, which used to be 123, has been reduced to 60. The remaining men have made a magnificent effort and have worked extremely hard to make the new system work. No vessel has been turned away, and there are far better prospects for the port, but the costs at Grimsby are still high. Associated British Ports has a major role to play in helping to reduce those costs. Grimsby dock charges represent 5 per cent. of grossings, whereas in Peterhead the figure is only 2 per cent. Grimsby's landing costs represent 9 per cent. of grossings, whereas at Cuxhaven the figure is about 4 per cent.

[Mr. Mitchell]

The integrated developments operations study which has just become available to Humberside Members was commissioned by the county council from Graham Moss Associates. It states:

"The National Dock Labour Board scheme is one reason for these high costs, but cost allocation by Associated British Ports is one of equal if not more importance."

It adds that Associated British Ports is somewhat removed from the industry, and suggests that the company could write off all or part of the outstanding loan repayments presently levied on the port as a means of reducing the costs and helping to sustain the port's efforts to fight back.

The real threat to Grimsby lies in the problem of the British United Trawlers CAT class vessels. Although rather elderly, they are the last big, year-round vessels in Grimsby, and their catches are essential to keep the port going in winter and to provide the bulk catch which the seiner fleet cannot provide. These vessels were fishing profitably at the end of 1984, but their financial position is difficult and their fate is continually under review. It is being reviewed by the main board in London, but its perspectives are different from those in Grimsby. In London, the interests of a fishing port and the industry may not be as important as they are in Grimsby. Our nightmare, which is repeated month by month, if not week by week, is that that company will accept decommissioning grants for those vessels. It may take them out of fishing or lay them up. Lay-up would be a serious problem—almost a disaster—for Grimsby.

This matter is urgent because the terms of EEC aid to the fishing industry mean that those vessels do not qualify for FEOGA help for replacement or renewal. The cut-off point is 33 m, which is just more than 100 ft. Those vessels are 130 ft long—too big to qualify for FEOGA grants for the reconstruction or renovation that would allow them to continue fishing. They qualify for the 25 per cent. White Fish Authority grant, but they cannot obtain the further 25 per cent. FEOGA grant either for rebuilding or for refurbishment and modernisation. Unless some special inducement is held out to the firm to persuade it to rebuild those vessels, the decision will be taken on the strictly economic grounds of what will benefit the shareholders. That being so, the vessels are likely to be decommissioned while grants last—or taken off fishing. They would be difficult to replace even if they qualified for the FEOGA grant as well as the White Fish Authority grant. The vessels would cost £1·3 million to £1·5 million to replace. They are hugely expensive. However, fishing needs all-purpose vessels—CAT class or smaller—to enable us to fish all year round and to provide the basic cash to sustain the market and to pay the charges to keep the port going.

Without help additional to that currently provided, it is difficult to see how those vessels can be kept going or replaced. They are the linchpin of fishing in Grimsby, and they are threatened. The Minister should consider that problem. It is crucially important to concentrate the industry at focal points such as Grimsby where there is a concentration of facilities—not only the market but the ice, the engineering and the tradition of going to sea. To maintain that concentration, we need vessels such as the CAT class vessels. Yet the present financial arrangements do not permit us either to extend the life of those vessels or to replace them if they are decommissioned. That cannot be done because the EEC grant is not available. The only alternative is some national supplement to the White Fish Authority grant.

The problem is urgent. The fate of the industry is decided from week to week and from month to month. Without a solution to this problem, all the Minister's efforts to win for us improved quotas and catches will be in vain in Grimsby. Without those vessels, the industry in Grimsby will fall back into the old trap of escalating costs pressing on a shrinking fleet. That is a formula for economic disaster, but it may well become a reality if the flagships of the fleet are knocked out.

When strict economics and the needs of fishing pull in different directions, as in this case, it is crucial that we remember that this is an interim period. The long-term prospects for fishing are good. Investment decisions will look very different in three, four or five years time, when catches and market returns are better. It is crucial that we should be enabled to survive until decisions can be taken in a more optimistic climate. Survival means help for the maintenance of the CAT class vessels in Grimsby until they can inherit better times. Without them, we shall hardly have a viable fishing industry to inherit those better times. That is the quandary of Grimsby. To a lesser extent, it is the quandary of fishing in general. The Minister has a responsibility not only to offer us better quotas—as he has done—but to help us to survive to inherit the better times that I hope lie ahead.

9.18 pm

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): I am grateful for your kindness, Mr. Speaker, in calling me twice today. I realise that I am pushing my luck. I do so on the grounds that, just as milk production is of vital importance to my constituency, fishing is still a major industry there, too, especially in the port of Newlyn.

I welcome the optimism with which the House looks forward to the future of the industry. I wish that I could share it. I fully appreciate the achievements that have been made on the administrative side, especially in the Commission and the Council of Ministers. I also congratulate my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Minister of State, who has played a major part in that.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) reminded us, there is an absence of fish in many areas. My right hon. Friend referred to sole, especially in the Bristol channel. The shrinkage of the stock there is deeply worrying. My right hon. Friend also referred to the beam trawling activities of the Brixham fleet. I have watched the build-up of the Brixham beaming fleet with some anxiety. I wonder whether it has something to do with our old friend the flag of convenience. I wonder how many of the beamers that proudly sail from Brixham are in sole British ownership. That brings me to what is known as quota fishing—member states finding more ways in which to transfer shipping to other nations in the Community so that they gain access to that country's quotas.

In regard to flags of convenience, I fully share the apprehension of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) about Spain. It has recently developed the practice of flags of convenience, which practice has been swept out to sea by the legislation to which the hon. Gentleman referred, which lays down manning requirements. As he said, that legislation's effects will be swept away when Spain joins the European Community. People in Cornwall are worried that the Government might have had second thoughts about amending the requirements on the registration of fishing boats as a means of tightening up the law to stop flag of convenience fishing. I urge my right hon. Friend to examine this matter carefully with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport with a view to the provisions of the merchant shipping Bill which is to be presented to the House.

My main worry is about Spain and its accession to the Community. As the hon. Member for Great Grimsby said, that poses an enourmous threat to our fishing fleet, nowhere greater than in my part of the world as I represent the constituency that is nearest to Spain. One has only to go off Lands End or around the Isles of Scilly to see Spanish boats fishing unlicensed. My right hon. Friend referred to the continuation of the interim agreement with Spain which allows that. I remember, however, an incident at the end of last year when a Spanish trawler which was fishing illegally off the Irish coast was sunk. We all know that Spanish vessels, whether licensed or unlicensed chance their arms and go in for illegal fishing. My plea to my right hon. Friend is to ensure that our vigilance in regard to illegal fishing is not lessened. I draw his attention to the vital importance of the Nimrod flights which monitor the activities of the Spanish fleet and try to weed out the boats which are fishing illegally.

Enforcement has been referred to by many hon. Members. Like them I am far from satisfied by the international community effort of the inspectorate. It made a good start. There have been gratifying results of its activities certainly in regard to Dutch overfishing. I thoroughly applaud what it is doing. As has been said on many occasions in the past in the House, that force is woefully inadequate in numbers to carry out the task which has been put on it by the Council of Ministers. The number of Community inspectors must be increased. Until there is a genuine attempt to apply the conservation measures there will be not just dissatisfaction but real anger among our fishermen.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I am glad to have the opportunity to debate these Community documents on fishery development and the common fisheries policy. I particularly welcome the fact that in a debate on 10 January we are able to discuss the total allowable catches which have already been agreed for 1985. They have been widely acknowledged as favourable for the industry. Therefore, it would be churlish of me not to give credit to the Minister, to his junior Minister, Lord Gray in the Scottish Office and to their European colleagues for having managed to get the TACs in place in time.

We should not go overboard in our praise for getting the common fisheries policy to work, as it was always intended that it should work. If possible, at the beginning of the fishing year the industry should know where it stands. It is a mark of the uncertainties that have dogged the industry over many years that it is with a sense of disbelief that we find that the policy works. That is why it is an occasion for mutual backslapping. Nevertheless, the industry is grateful for the work that has been done. That has been acknowledged and I join in the acknowledgment.

As the Minister said, not everything has yet been settled. Perhaps most importantly, there remains the vexed question of agreement between the Community and Norway about the share-out of North Sea herring. There was great relief throughout the industry that no concession was made to the excessive Norwegian demands during the latter part of 1984. The industry has made well known its outright opposition to Norway's demands. The industry and Opposition Members are grateful for the fact that the Government have taken a firm stand. As the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Hughes) said, they led the way in taking a firm stand. We would encourage them to continue doing so if Norway persists in making extravagant claims.

Equally, the interim arrangements form no basis for a long-term solution. The fear must be that Norway will take out of its own sector a substantial amount of fish which, when taken with what comes out of the Community sector, will not be in the best long-term interests of conservation of the species. It was recognised in the record of the meeting on 13 December, which is attached to the explanatory memorandum of 21 December, that the parties would have to agree to discuss the matter further in 1985. The Minister has said fairly that the parties are far apart. My request would be that the discussions take place at the earliest possible date and that the matter is not left until the tail end of the year without agreement. There was some surprise within the industry that Norway did not use the bargaining counters which many people thought she would use with regard to the other species on which agreement had to be reached. We may speculate about why that was not done in 1984. However, an early start to the discussions on a long-term agreement for the herring share-out is important lest at the tail end of the year when a further agreement on other white fish species has to be reached, that bargaining counter is again put in Norway's hands.

Mr. Jopling: I should like to pin the hon. Gentleman down on what he has just said. Does he not agree that no agreement was better than a bad agreement?

Mr. Wallace: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman did not hear me, but I said at the beginning of my remarks that we are relieved that there was no agreement rather than a bad agreement. It is accepted on all sides that at some stage there must be an agreement, and the sooner we discuss the terms, the better. I do not dispute the fact that no agreement on the terms proposed by Norway was better than proceeding on that basis.

The Minister could not give an assurance that there would be no premature stoppage in the future when some countries had not fished their full quota. That will cause great concern within the industry. As the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said, enforcement is one way of tackling that problem. If it can be proved that some countries have offended, unless there are penalties which can be enforced, there will be a danger that the whole common fisheries policy agreement will become unstitched. What will happen if it is established that a country has overfished a particular species, thereby depriving another country of fishing its full quota? The Minister did not say whether in the following year there would be a reallocation to deal with such a misdemeanour. Perhaps the Under-Secretary will say something about that in his reply.

In relation to TACs, I wish specifically to refer to the sprat fishery and the closures proposed on the Firth of [Mr. Wallace]

Forth and the Moray firth. These matters are important to the communities affected. When this was raised in an amendment tabled by my hon. Friends in a similar debate on 7 December 1983—we proposed that there should be an exemption from the prohibition for boats under 40 ft in length—the Minister said that he would consider that proposal in the ensuing year in the light of scientific advice. What scientific advice was made available to him?

The Government have been properly congratulated on getting TACs in place, but it is a matter of regret that we did not discuss what happened at the Council of Ministers in September. The hon. Members for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) and for Great Grimsby have already referred to the increase in the bycatch of fish for human consumption within the Norway pout fishery from 10 per cent. to 18 per cent. That caused great resentment throughout the industry. Although the four months that have passed have allowed passions to cool, it is important to put on record the outrage and sense of betrayal which was marked by a dignified walk-out on the Minister of State by the representatives of the fishing industry who attended the Council meeting in Brussels.

Many of them felt that when the common fisheries policy was negotiated in January 1983, it contained many compromises and concessions. It was accepted by the industry, although one could scarcely say that it was welcomed. Indeed, many fishermen in my own constituency did not accept it. The agreement on the size of the pout box and bycatch was an important and significant aspect of the final deal. When it appeared that the Danes had sought to unstitch that particular and important aspect of the common fisheries policy and had succeeded in doing so, it was not surprising that there was such an outcry from the industry.

In my own constituency there is particular anger and fear that, because one of the more attractive areas for the Norway pout fishery is to the north-east of Unst the increased bycatch will, within a very short space of time, have an adverse effect upon the white fish stocks in an important fishing ground for the Shetland fleet. It has already been said with regard to the herring fishery that above all else we should be considering fishing for human consumption. It is important to note that we are putting in danger fishing for human consumption in order to promote industrial fishing by the Danes.

I am grateful to the Minister for the correspondence he has had with me. As has already been said, the percentage increase will apply only until 31 May. Tonight I should like to have an assurance from the Treasury bench that the Government will resist any extension of that increase beyond 31 May. It has already been said by the hon. Member for Fife, North-East that between now and the expiry of the experiment Scottish fishermen will be monitoring the situation. As well as scientific advice, I am sure that they will take into account the results of the monitoring exercise to be carried out by the Scottish Fishermen's Federation.

I should also like to know whether the Minister believes, as has already been mentioned by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby that this is a matter of national importance to an important industry. Would the Minister be prepared to invoke the Luxembourg compromise? Indeed, is he able to say whether he can invoke it? In the briefing note from the Scottish Fishermen's Federation to which reference has already been made, concern is expressed by the federation, based upon an interpretation of the Luxembourg compromise which it received from the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries in Scotland, that this is an area where the Luxembourg compromise may not be able to be invoked. We should welcome the Minister's clarification of this point.

With regard to beam trawling and the regulations which are before us, I share the views of those hon. Members who have already said that beam trawling is unacceptable. It ruins the seabed and disrupts the food chain. We note that the Government are not entirely satisfied about the efficiency of the proposals and that they will seek to improve them. I recall that beam trawling was the subject of discussion when the inshore fisheries legislation relating to Scotland was before the House during the last session. Under that legislation the Government have the power to ban beam trawling within six miles of the Scottish coast. As the Minister who is to reply is a Scottish Office Minister, he may be able to indicate whether the Government intend at an early stage to ban beam trawling within six miles of the Scottish coast.

On Spanish entry, I do not wish to add to the pertinent points that have been made by the hon. Members for Great Grimsby and for St. Ives (Mr. Harris). I shall look forward to the Minister's answers to those points. It is important that we should extend the Community and underpin democracy in Spain. However, we must not neglect the important fisheries aspect. That aspect was neglected when the United Kingdom entered the Community in 1973. We shall wish to give the closest attention to the particular arrangements which are made for the fishing industry.

Finally, I turn to a constituency point with regard to a possible amendment of the common fisheries policy. The preamble to the common fisheries policy, dated 25 January 1983, referred to the need to "safeguard the particular needs of regions where local populations are especially dependent on fisheries and related industries."

Article VII of that agreement set up the Orkney and Shetland or north of Scotland box to carry out the hope expressed in the preamble to safeguard the particular needs of that area.

There is restrictive licensing on vessels over 26 m in length which are fishing commercial species. France has allocated 52 licences, the United Kingdom 62, Germany 12 and Belgium 2. In a recent reply that I received, the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay) said that in the six months from April to October last year the total number of vessels from France was 57, from the United Kingdom 31, and from Belgium 2.

Quite apart from not controlling vessels under 26 m in length it has been maintained by the fishermen in Orkney and Shetland that, as a measure to give protection to a sensitive region, the number of licences was too high. That opinion, expressed at the time when the common fisheries policy was agreed, seems to have been borne out by the fact that we find that what the scheme allows is in excess of the actual level of fishing. Therefore, what is meant to be a protective licensing scheme in fact permits a greater level of fishing than has been taking place. Will the Government consider that matter again in the light of their experience and see what steps can be taken to reduce the number of licences in that area?

The fishing industry, often in peripheral parts of the country, provides an important part of the economic structure or backbone of the Community. Therefore, it is in all our interests that the fishing industry should thrive. We welcome the steps that have been taken to get certainty in the industry through the increase in TACs and through their being in place. However, several points still cause great concern and we should appreciate the Government's attention to them.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): It is a great pleasure to speak in a debate where there is a virtual unanimity of view. I, too, want to pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and to my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the tremendous work that they have done to bring before the House the excellent TACs.

I do not want to speak at great length or in great detail. Obviously, the health and welfare of the fishing industry of Great Grimsby has a great impact on my constituency. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) has a far more detailed knowledge of the fishing industry in his constituency than I have, but I thought that he was a tiny bit churlish in what he had to say earlier. I know that he is deeply concerned about the tremendous problems, which I acknowledge exist in his constituency. I would be the first to recognise that the past year has been difficult for the fishing industry in his constituency. But my right hon. Friend is entitled to three unequivocal cheers for the TACs. Although the hon. Gentleman was unable to give my right hon. Friend those three cheers, his local paper was. It said:

"Grimsby welcomes deal. Bumper fishing catch!"

There is no doubt about the view of the local people in our area.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman may not have recognised the strangled cry that emitted from my lips at the beginning of my speech. It was one cheer.

Mr. Brown: In that case, the hon. Gentleman is not representing clearly the view of his constituents that appears in that headline. However, I take the point that he makes.

The fact is, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned, that the new quota arrangements will be beneficial to the BUT fleet, which I know has been anxious over the past two or three years about the long-term future. Mr. Nigel Atkins, the representative of the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations based in Grimsby said:

"This is certainly a favourable deal . . . Quotas are high enough to cause us no problems."

It should be placed on record that the representative of Grimsby's seine fleet has also said that the deal gives owners a much greater freedom to operate their fleets.

Therefore, it is important for us to recognise what has been achieved. I, like the hon. Member for Grimsby, am no friend of the EEC and I was sceptical about what the common fisheries policy could achieve. I submit that it is not necessarily the common fisheries policy which is responsible for the excellent arrangements that are being placed before us for consideration today, but that that has much more to do with the negotiating skill of my right hon. and hon. Friends. It also has to do with a desire to reach a consensus on the part of the Council of Ministers, and, indeed, the European Commission. It is not very often that one finds the desire to obtain an agreement. It does not have much to do with the common fisheries policy. It has much more to do with the desire and the will to make an arrangement that meets the approval of the fishing industry, not only in this country but in other countries in the Community.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby spoke of other problems that beset the fishing industry in south Humberside. He referred to the problem of high port charges. I appreciate that that falls outside the responsibility of Ministers in this debate. I mention it only because we have constantly pressed the Government on the issue, particularly in regard to the lumper force. I place on record the tremendous co-operation that came from the lumpers when the Grimsby fishing industry had to take a difficult decision over the landing company there. I am the second in the House tonight to acknowledge that the lumpers have co-operated tremendously in trying to ensure that there is a company so that fish can be landed in the port of Grimsby.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) spoke in an intervention about the role of the Sea Fish Industry Authority in the long term. I was privileged to attend a presentation by the authority shortly before Christmas and was greatly encouraged by the way in which it recognises that it has a responsibility to ensure that the marketing side of its operations are taken fully into account.

In that connection, I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. Member for the City of Durham (Mr. Hughes), who said that it was important to have a campaign to ensure that the British housewife consumes more fish, and he was referring particularly to herring. I have great respect for the Sea Fish Industry Authority, which acknowledges that it has much to do on the marketing side.

Some difficult decisions will have to be taken by ports such as Grimsby in relation to modernisation. The Sea Fish Industry Authority is concerned to ensure that we in Britain have the same port facilities as exist on the other side of the North sea. About a year ago the hon. Member for Great Grimsby and I were privileged to visit the ports of Esbjerg and Thyboron in Denmark, where we were impressed by and envious of the investment that has taken place in the infrastructure there. We should like to see such developments taking place in our ports, and I am sure that the Sea Fish Industry Authority is aware of the need to encourage port modernisation.

Viewing the situation facing Great Grimsby from the perspective of Cleethorpes — or perhaps I should say from the pier at Cleethorpes—I am far more optimistic about the future than I was a year ago. That is due in large measure to the skill and patience of my right hon. and hon. Friends, to whom I pay tribute for what they have done to give 1985 a good start for the south Humberside fishing industry. Despite other problems, we look to the future with some optimism. Optimism breeds confidence and confidence breeds success. The TACs that have been negotiated can breed the confidence for the future for which we have been looking.

9.49 pm

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I am delighted to take part in the debate, because it will give me the opportunity of putting to the House some of the problems that the fishing industry in Hull faces, and to discuss the effect that these new quotas will have on the fishing industry in Hull.

A number of hon. Members have complimented the Minister on arriving at the TACs early on, and that is a good thing; so I, too, compliment the Minister. It must be good for the industry to know where it stands in terms of its catches, as that enables the industry to plan its future with more certainty. Tomorrow, I shall be having a meeting in Hull, and I shall visit the Hull docks. The people down there will ask me what this will mean to Hull in terms of jobs in the port and of retaining the processing and distribution industry in Hull, and the answer is that I do not know.

The morass of detail of these reports is quite impossible to interpret at a glance. I stand back from this, as I am rather bemused by the detail, and am therefore unaware what the effect will be. However, a report has come out, which I received a few minutes before coming into the Chamber. I hope that this report will provide the turning point for the port of Hull to go from the tremendous decline of the past 10 or 15 years to regeneration.

The decline of the port has emanated from the loss of fishing opportunity in the Icelandic waters, through the cod war, and from the common fisheries policy. We now have a male unemployment rate of over 20 per cent., which is a serious problem. The catching industry has been devastated, although the processing and distribution industry is strong and thriving.

I can give some figures to show the scale of the devastation. In 1970 we used to land about 140,000 tonnes in Hull, and that is now down to 8,000 tonnes, much of which is Icelandic container traffic, which brings in a lot of the fish. To bring in the 140,000 tonnes, we had about 120 large vessels, freezers and large trawlers; and that figure is down to 3. It is the effect of having all one's eggs in one basket, and when the Icelandic problems arose and the common fisheries policy started to evolve, we had the wrong kind of capacity to exploit the existing opportunities. Therefore, the quotas are crucial, as are vessel licences.

We have reached the trough in this decline. I fervently hope and, although I am not over-optimistic, believe, that we are at the point from which the port of Hull can start to revive. The formation of the Hull Fishing Landing Company recently is a great example of the way in which local authorities, the industry and the workers can get together to preserve their industry, in this case fish catching. In addition to the loss of much of the catching fleet, we have lost the Torry research station and there have been substantial cuts in the college of higher education courses in fishing. There has been a serious decline.

In Hull, people feel bitter about the way in which the owners of the vessels have received compensation for the loss of fishing opportunity, whereas the people who work in the industry have, to all intents and purposes, received nothing. Since I have been in the House, my attempts to persuade Ministers in both the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Department of Employment to get something done to give these men, who have served the industry and their country so well, both in the last war and in the Falklands conflict, something for what they have done, have got nowhere.

I sent the Under-Secretary of State for Employment —the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley)—a list of the members of the British Fishermen's Association. The hon. Gentleman commented in the letter he sent back to me on the length of service of those men. The list showed that men who have spent 30, 40 or 45 years in the industry have not received any compensation. Is that the way to treat people who have worked in the industry for so long? I hope that the Minister will take an initiative and will press the Community to devise a financial scheme of income guarantees for redundant fishermen. That should not be done by adding levies per tonne of fish landed, because that would be the wrong way to go about it. Will the Minister get together with his colleagues in other Departments on this initiative?

Will the Minister investigate the possibility of providing a common state retirement pension policy for all fishermen at the age of 55? Fishing is one of the most dangerous industries in which to work. It is far more dangerous than the mining industry in terms of deaths and serious accidents. It is wrong to force men at the age of 55 to go to sea. Essentially, I am asking for the people who worked in this industry for so long to receive levels of compensation similar to those received by those who have worked in, for example, the steel industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), who is no longer in the Chamber, said in a speech on European Community budgets:

> "A brother of mine was given the princely sum of £385 by his firm after 19 years of service with it. The firm received £400 per gross registered tonne for each vessel that it decommissioned." —[Official Report, 11 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 978.]

It seems that the Minister, the Government and the European Community believe that one gross registered tonne is more important than a man who has served the industry for 19 years. Many hon. Members, especially Opposition Members, have pressed the Government to introduce some form of compensation. My hon. Friends the Members for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) have introduced private Member's Bills on this subject. While I am a Member I shall press the Government continually to come up with some compensation for these men. They deserve compensation, and I believe that it is reasonable to demand it. At the moment those men are thrown on the scrap heap in the most despicable way. I am resentful of the Government for dealing with the matter in this fashion.

I congratulate the Humberside county council and the Hull city council in particular on the way in which they have taken the initiative to regenerate the industry in Hull and to ensure that the Hull and Humberside integration development operation study was commissioned. The study attempts to regenerate the regional economy and to create jobs. In brief, it proposes that there should be some additional catching capacity and a middle-water fleet, although not a large one—it will clearly never be so great as that which we had in the heyday of deep sea fishing from Hull — to support the processing and distribution industries in the area.

In addition, the study refers to the development of the dock area. Only a few months ago, Associated British Ports threatened to close the dock area, claiming that it was losing about £500,000 per annum, but negotiations between that organisation and the city and county councils now seem to be bearing fruit. It is perhaps too early to be wisure, but we hope to come up with a fundable proposition. We envisage that the area will also be used for tourism and for industrial and housing development, all of which will provide a total revenue stream to make the dock area viable as we can no longer rely on big fishing catches to fund the port as we did in the old days.

If the Minister has seen the report, does he intend to back it; and how many jobs and what catching capacity are likely to ensue? If he has not yet seen the report, perhaps he will answer those questions in writing.

Mr. Henderson: It would be interesting to know who commissioned the report.

Mr. Randall: It was funded by the EEC and carried out by consultants, Graham Moss Associates. The aim was to see how we could tap into the the various EEC funds. As the hon. Gentleman will know, the European funding systems are extremely difficult to understand — that is why the report was needed — but we now have a blueprint on which we hope to build in the near future.

A study of that kind needs money. I understand that the Community has allocated £21 million for regional budgets for compensation for loss of fishing industries, of which about £8 million has been allocated to the Hull area. The Euro-Member for Humberside is on record in the local press as saying that that £8 million has now been allocated. Perhaps the Minister will tell us whether that is true and exactly what the position is.

The accession of Spain is a source of considerable worry in view of the practices of Spanish vessels in our waters, especially the illegal fishing reported to me by our fishermen and the appalling conditions on board the Spanish vessels. It is not just a matter of crews going to sea without food or toilet facilities — we are talking about vessels without logs or safety equipment and utterly unacceptable conditions.

I will not add to the other points that my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby and the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) made. Nevertheless, the Spanish influence worries me. I greatly hope that the Government will take that up and that they will ensure that such practices cease. I also hope that we will provide reasonable conditions in which our seamen can work.

10.4 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): As we have come to expect on such occasions, this has been a most interesting and, I might say, wide-ranging debate on the various Community documents relating to fishing being considered by the House tonight. The knowledgeable contributions made by hon. Members amply reflect the importance of the fishing industry to the many parts of the country that they represent.

Mr. Mark Hughes: Who is the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. MacKay: I think that my constituency probably has many more fish swimming round it than that of the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Hughes). I say that in reply to his sedentary intervention.

It is particularly gratifying to be able to take part in a debate on the fishing industry during which there has been such broad recognition of the highly satisfactory nature of the arrangements that we have been able to negotiate for 1985. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) spoke almost glowingly about our efforts, but I thought that his speech was to a certain extent dwarfed by some of the remarks of Opposition Members. I refer, in particular, to the hon. Members for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall). I even noted that towards the end of his speech the hon. Member for Great Grimsby appealed to British United Trawlers to look at the long term. He said that the long-term prospects for fishing were good. I think that there has been a fair measure of agreement about that tonight. There has certainly been a fair measure of agreement about the fact that that situation has been brought about by the successful negotiations carried out in the Community by my right hon. and hon. Friends, not only this year but during the past few years.

The arrangements have been warmly welcomed not only by the House but by the industry. I have said before when concluding fishery debates that our task now is to keep the common fisheries policy in good shape, so that fishermen may plan ahead with some confidence. Of course, improvements can always be made, and I hope that in 1985 we can consolidate the progress already made and concentrate on ensuring that the industry makes the most of its fishing opportunities.

In particular, I should like to highlight the useful experience gained in 1984 in developing quota management arrangements. Unlike certain other parties, our philosophy is that business men know best how to run their own affairs. More than most industries, the fishing industry has to learn to live with the consequences of actions taken by the European Commission and by the Council of Ministers.

We regularly consult the industry before decisions are taken on quota arrangements. At a domestic level it is right that the industry should play a greater role in organising its fishing patterns so as to meet market demands. The better prospects for the major stocks have allowed us to negotiate quotas that should facilitate the broader introduction of sectoral quotas, which allow the fishing organisations to assume day-to-day responsibility for the management of their members' quotas. In that way the industry can be given the best chance to meet the needs of the market and of the fishermen.

The hon. Member for City of Durham mentioned a number of points on the same theme when he expressed the hope that, in particular, the extra herring that we caught would find a ready market among consumers. I am sure that the whole House agrees with that. I just hope that we can perhaps pass on a message to my hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving) that he should put herring on the menu in the various cafeterias in the House — [Interruption.] Perhaps he could ensure that it appears on the menu even more often than at present, although it appears pleasantly often. I recommend that my right hon. and hon. Friends sample it.

Among others, my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes mentioned the Sea Fish Industry Authority. We have to look to that authority to encourage the British housewife to eat more fish, particularly herring. On 17 December the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South (Mr. MacGregor), announced that the European Commission had given its approval to more than three quarters of the authority's development programme. This has enabled the authority to press ahead with its campaign to improve the marketing of fish in the United Kingdom for which the Government have pledged £7·9 million towards the authority's proposed spending of over £14 million in the first three years. The authority is well aware of the problems of herring and is putting a special emphasis on marketing herring so that the housewife will go back to making herring part of the British diet.

It is difficult to be logical in a wind-up speech covering the wide range of issues that were raised and I will apologise in advance for the fact that on this occasion, to the surprise of all Opposition Members, I will be less logical than I usually am.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby, my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) and the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West all mentioned the problems of Spanish accession. We are very conscious of the size of the Spanish fleet and the potential impact that the uncontrolled upsurge of Spanish efforts after accession could have on the fishing industry in the United Kingdom. That is why we have pressed hard and long for satisfactory arrangements to be secured in the current enlargement negotiations. The agreed Community position endorsed by Heads of Government at the European Council meeting on 3 and 4 December 1984 was very satisfactory from our point of view. Negotiations are proceeding with speed. For obvious reasons, I cannot be too explicit with the House about the details of the Community position, but I can assure hon. Members that it fully safeguards the interests of the United Kingdom.

I deal next with another question which exercised a number of hon. Members—the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives, my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) and the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), the question of Norway pout. I am well aware of the industry's concern over the decision to increase the bycatch limit for whiting in the Norway pout fishery in the North sea, but I hope that hon. Members will not get this out of perspective. The increases in the availability of the main white fish species in the North sea this year hardly suggest that the industrial fishing is damaging the stocks.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State, who represents Norfolk, South, informed the House in opening a debate on 3 July that he would use every available argument against the Commission's proposals. We did that. But every other member state was prepared to agree the proposals and, as the increased total allowable catches for 1985 indicate, the scientific arguments against the proposals were not conclusive. In these circumstances we had no alternative but to negotiate. As a result of the firm line that we took, we secured major improvements in the proposals. Instead of a permanent change as proposed by the Commission, the Council agreed a temporary derogation expiring on 31 May 1985. I think that answers one point that I was asked.

The bycatch limit for whiting went up from 10 per cent. to 18 per cent., not 20 per cent. as originally proposed, while the limit for other species was of course reduced to 8 per cent. as proposed.

We also secured the introduction of new monitoring arrangements which will ensure that for the first time we shall know what effect the bycatch provision is having. In addition, we got the Commission to introduce a permanent regulation on the procedure for sampling the white fish bycatch in all small net fisheries.

The Department in Scotland has intensified its surveillance of the Norway pout fishery and stepped up the level of inspection, and 45 vessels have been boarded since 1 October last year. In most cases so far the bycatch percentage has been under, or close to, the original 10 per cent. limit. The original 10 per cent. limit will come back into effect as from 1 June 1985 unless the Council, on a proposal by the Commission, decides otherwise. The Government will clearly be very reluctant to see any extension of the increased limit, but we shall have to consider the facts of the matter as they are revealed by the results of the monitoring exercise and the up-to-date scientific advice when it comes forward at that time.

I have just touched on the amount of inspection that we have been giving the Norway pout fishing. That takes me on to the whole question of the enforcement of the quotas, which were mentioned by the hon. Member for City of Durham and other hon. Members. The House knows that the Government in every negotiation have been very keen on insisting that the quotas are properly enforced. As we know that we do this, we expect our European partners to enforce the quotas in the same way.

The industry and the House can be assured that we shall continue to impress upon the Commission the need to ensure that the rules of the CFP are properly enforced by all member states. Largely as a result of our efforts, the Commission set up its own fishery inspectorate to investigate how the rules are enforced by the Administrations of each member state. We saw a good deal of progress in 1984. The inspectorate carried out a programme of more than 50 visits to member states, during which many irregularities were uncovered,

At the Council of Fisheries Ministers on 4 December my right hon. Friend asked the Commission to produce a report on the first year's operation of the inspectorate. He also made it clear that we should look to the Commission to propose suitable penalties for systematic overfishing of quotas which is substantiated. Further improvements in the quota observance should result from the introduction of standard logbooks and landing returns which are now expected to be enforced in the Community by 1 April.

The hon. Member for City of Durham asked me about the policing and control of the Manx fisheries. We are satisfied with the control of the Manx herring fishery, which is largely prosecuted by Northern Irish vessels. We maintain a fishery protection vessel on station in that fishery, and the minimum landing sizes enforced on the Isle of Man are the same as for elsewhere.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby asked about the 2,000 tonnes of cod for Denmark which were granted outside the total allowable catch. I confirm that the council agreed the 2,000 tonnes of cod for Denmark outside the TAC on the basis that this was the third year of an agreement reached in 1983. My right hon. Friend made it clear that we did not want to see that repeated next year.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby and my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives asked about Spanish vessels using the United Kingdom flag. Perhaps I should have mentioned that when I spoke about the Spanish accession problem. The legislation we introduced in 1983 has largely solved the problem of ex-Spanish vessels for the time being, but we are aware that the solution will not apply when Spain is a member of the Community. We are actively pursuing alternative solutions in our discussion with the Commission and other member states. We are mindful of the problem that could occur when Spain joins the Community.

I was asked about the west Greenland cod. It was suggested that that was an imaginary fish, but we caught a small quantity of cod in west Greenland in 1984—about 10 tonnes. Fishing conditions were poor and are likely to be so again this year.

A small but important issue for my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, North-East is the question of Pittenweem harbour. If and when the harbour board introduces a proposal for development, it will be carefully considered by my right hon. Friend. All major expenditure on harbour work has to pass the test of investment appraisal as part of that consideration. My hon. Friend will welcome the news just given that the firm, M. Stewart and Sons Ltd., fish processors in Pittenweem, has just received a grant of £11,000 from the EC under the second round.

Many hon. Members touched on the difficult question of beam trawling. It was suggested that those hon. Members who opposed it should try airing their opposition in Brixham, but they did not all rush from the Chamber to do so.

Mr. Mark Hughes: We were waiting to listen to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary's reply.

Mr. MacKay: How nice! The current regulations prohibit beam trawling for sole or plaice within 12 miles of the coast by vessels over 70 gross registered tonnes or 300 brake horsepower. The need to protect inshore fishing grounds on which smaller fishermen are dependent from the impact of large beam trawlers is widely recognised, but the precise terms of the regulations present problems, especially for enforcement. The 300 bhp restriction is difficult to enforce, because in many cases the engine power of a vessel is not known and is not easy to measure. The practice of derating engines also presents a problem. The Commission's latest proposal attempts to define engine power in terms which it will be possible to apply at least to the range of engines in common use, and it provides that derating can be recognised only if it is carried out and certified by a competent authority. That might go some, but not all of the way to solving the enforcement problems.

The Commission has proposed deleting the tonnage criterion, since methods of establishing registered tonnage are not uniform among member states. That has given rise to legal problems. It proposes replacing the tonnage by a new formula of overall length of the vessel multiplied by the maximum beam, but that would be impossible to measure with great safety at sea, unless it was a calm day, and it is not clear that existing measurements of length of beam are always recorded on the certificates normally carried on board and that they would be the same measurements for each member state. That also poses a problem.

The fairest and most readily enforceable way of restricting the effective fishing power of beam trawlers within the 12-mile belt would be to return to the rule which Britain applied before 25 January 1983—a restriction on the overall length of fishing beams. There is widespread industry support for that, and we shall continue to press it, but I must tell the House that there is opposition within the Community, especially from the Netherlands.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland asked me whether I intended to introduce a ban on beam trawling, as I was urged to do during the Committee stage of the Inshore Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1984. The Government are considering the various propositions before them for action under the Act, but we believe that there is not enough scientific evidence for such a blanket prohibition, and I am sceptical of the need for such a measure. I hope that the revised proposals for inshore legislation will soon be issued to the industry for comment. Those who wish to comment on the presence or absence of anything about beam trawling will have the opportunity to do so.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland also asked me about Norway. He was worried—I understand his anxiety—that the Norwegians may take an excessive amount of herring from their portion of the North sea. All that I can say by way of reassurance is that Norway has given an undertaking to take account of the available biological advice in managing that fishery. Of course, we want negotiations with Norway to start as soon as possible, but as my right hon. Friend the Minister said, we must be sure that the negotiations are conducted on a proper basis and that the result is satisfactory to the British Government and to the fishing industry.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, with other hon. Members, asked me whether fisheries would be closed if the total allowable catches were met but some member country—he was especially worried about the United Kingdom—had some quota left. My right hon. Friend the Minister responded to that point, but perhaps I can repeat that we are aware of the anxiety in the industry about this possibility, and we have made the Commission aware that we are worried about it. It is unfair that in circumstances where Britain had tried to apportion its fishing catch throughout the year to give its fishing industry a year's work, we should discover towards the end of that year, when we had some quota remaining, that other countries had overfished, the total allowable catch had been exceeded, and the fishery was closed. We are discussing that matter with the Community.

Mr. Henderson: Does my hon. Friend accept the point made by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) that the countries which suffered from that clampdown did not include Britain? I believe that France and Belgium suffered. To that extent, it would show our good faith if anxiety was expressed on the general principle, which is all the more reason why the Commission should regard our proposal in a reasonable way.

Mr. MacKay: Yes, we told the Commission that we thought it wrong that the French, who still had some quota to take up, had suffered the ban as well as the countries that had exceeded their quota.

I was asked about the sprat boxes. The closure of the various boxes—areas off Denmark and off the coasts of Scotland and England — will be reviewed by the Commission in the coming months with appropriate scientific advice. Sometimes scientific advice is welcome to our fishermen, and sometimes it is not. We must take it into consideration at all times, and not just when it suits us. The scientific advice will play an important part in our decision on the matter.

Our records of sightings of foreign vessels in the north of Scotland box last year suggest that fishing activity was at about the same level as in previous years.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland considers that the common fisheries policy should be amenable to renegotiation in the case of the north of Scotland box. However, with reference to the Norwegian pout, the hon. Gentleman told us that certain other aspects of the CFP are not amenable to renegotiation.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West referred to the question of redundancy for fishermen. Perhaps I should also point out that the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), who made one or two interventions, had also intended to speak, but he had to go home because he has a back problem that was beginning to play him up. I know that the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow is also interested in this question.

Fisheries debates tend to be attended by a sub-group of the House of Commons. Almost every hon. Member who is here has attended such debates in the past, and knows that these matters have been fully discussed. There was an Adjournment debate on 13 April. The Secretary of State for Employment, who is responsible under the 1978 Act for statutory redundancy and who therefore deals with employment matters in all sectors of industry, replied to that debate. Also, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food explained in a written answer on 2 March that the fisheries Ministers had concluded that it would not be appropriate to introduce a special redundancy scheme for the fishing industry at this late stage in the process of change which the industry has undergone under successive Governments. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West will not be surprised by that answer, though he will be disappointed.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: A manifest injustice faces those made redundant in the past who see people made redundant by Hamlings, for instance, who, although their conditions of work and length of service had been similar, are now receiving compensation because the law is being interpreted differently. That is a serious anomaly.

Secondly, I wonder whether Ministers are urging within the EEC that Europe has a responsibility? An organisation that compensates owners for decommissioning or laying up vessels should also compensate the fishermen made redundant in that process.

Mr. MacKay: If we were to change anything now, we would be doing so at the end of a long period of time in which many people have had to leave the industry. Those people would feel that they had been unfairly treated if some new measure were introduced at the tail end of such major changes.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby was not present when I alluded to his statement that the long-term prospects for the industry are good. I can even pray the hon. Gentleman himself in aid.

Mr. Randall: Is it not illogical to compensate the owners of the vessels that have lost the opportunity to fish and yet to give nothing to the deck hands and others who have worked in the industry?

Mr. MacKay: First, it was the owners who had made the investment. Secondly, we were attempting to slim the industry to a size that we thought would match the catching capacity.

Mr. Randall: What about the investment of labour?

Mr. MacKay: Opposition Members are entitled to have a go at me, but I must remind them that the Labour Government did not accept the arguments that were advanced either. If we changed our view now, we should be doing so at the tail end of the process. We have no intention of doing that.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby would not think it fair of me if I did not make some passing comment on a major part of his speech about Grimsby and British United Trawlers. I shall not comment, but I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister listened carefully to what he said. I am pretty certain from my hearing of the hon. Member that he would not have expected me to say anything other than that. With regard to Grimsby and Humberside, perhaps I might draw attention to the fact that my right hon. Friend is to meet the Humberside authorities on Monday 28 January to discuss the report that has been mentioned. Rather than enter into correspondence before the meeting, I assure the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West that probably more issues than he could have pursued will be dealt with at that meeting.

The debate has been a useful opportunity to hear the House's views on these matters and others that go wider of the documents but which are still concerned with the fishing industry. As my right hon. Friend has explained, circumstances prevented the House from being able to consider these documents before the Fisheries Council met on 19 December. Nevertheless, I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House agree that the negotiations conducted by my right hon. Friends and my hon. Friend have led to a satisfactory conclusion for the United Kingdom fishing industry.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 10171/84 and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's unnumbered explanatory memorandum on 1985 total allowable catches and quotas; of the unnumbered explanatory memorandum on 1985 catch quotas in Greenland waters, and of the unnumbered explanatory memoranda on the fisheries agreements for 1985 between the European Community and Norway, the European Community and the Faroe Islands and the European Community and Spain; of European Community Documents Nos. 10697/84 on technical conservation measures and 10264/84 on 1985 fish guide prices; and welcomes and approves the provisional agreement reached on these arrangements for 1985 with the improvements obtained for the United Kingdom fishing industry.

Ethiopia (United Kingdom Aid)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd]

10.31 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I am grateful for the opportunity to bring the House back to discussing United Kingdom aid to Ethiopia.

The horrors of the famine in Ethiopia have been in world headlines for three months. The response of the people of Britain in raising money for aid and of the charities to use that money effectively has been remarkable. The United Kingdom Government and many others have mounted a massive campaign to get short-term aid to Ethiopia. I believe that the Ethiopian Government, its people and other groups in Tigre and Eritrea have also made tremendous efforts to tackle the problems of the famine; but in Tigré and Wollo in Ethiopia, people are still dying at about the same rate as in October. There are more people in relief camps in Ethiopia and the Sudan and, if anything, the need for aid is growing rather than diminishing. Increasing numbers of people are being driven from their homes and villages in Ethiopia by the famine. Sadly, the massive effort has not resulted in the matter getting better. We can only claim that it has not got worse much more quickly.

The horrors that were reported on television in October, which I and other hon. Members and the Minister saw in November, are the result largely of the failure of the 1983 harvest. We now face the problems of the 1984 harvest. If we are able to get only 90,000 tonnes of food into Ethiopia through the port of Assab each month from now until October, we shall only hold the crisis at bay. If we can get only 20,000 tonnes of food into Ethiopia each month through the Sudan, we shall also only be holding the crisis at bay. All we are doing is preventing a horrific position from getting worse. It is against that background that I want to put specific questions to the Minister on what the Government are doing to try to improve conditions.

I hope that the Minister will be able to give the House up-to-date information about the pledges on food grain. Can he go back to his answer of 4 December and update the table on pledges for food grain and supplementary food for Ethiopia? What are the expected dates of arrival of those pledges in the port of Assab? Is he satisfied that enough has been promised for the next nine months to ensure that at least the present standard of aid can be continued?

Can the Minister explain to the House and to the country why the United Nations and the world food programme denied in November that there would be a shortage of grain in the port of Assab in December whereas, as I understand it, for almost three weeks there was insufficient grain in the port to keep the relief operation going at full force? What steps are the Government taking to try to sort out what appears to be a great deal of complacency and incompentence in the United Nations and the world food programme? Is he satisfied that the United Nations has got its co-ordination working?

Is it true that there is still insuffiicent food promised for delivery in April and May? What are the Government doing to ensure that sufficient food will be provided? Can the Minister tell us how much of the EC aid promised at the Dublin summit has been committed to Ethiopia and how far that has got into a programme for delivery from specific countries? Can he assure us that that aid earmarked for Ethiopia will get there at specific times?

Is the Minister satisfied that a steady supply of aid is planned to arrive at the port of Assab in the months from April to October? Is he satisfied that sufficient food has been promised for delivery through the Sudan to Western Tigré and Eritrea? Is he satisfied that there are sufficient vehicles to transport it on that route?

I am sure the Minister will agree that the RAF played a major role in moving the grain from Assab during November. It is still fulfilling that role. Can he tell us if the Government will ensure that the RAF remains there beyond the end of this month? I think that the initial promise was that it would be there for three months. Many people said from the start that it would be needed for much longer. I hope that the Government can promise now that the Hercules planes and the RAF will remain in Ethiopia for at least a further five or six months.

What steps have been taken to improve the handling capacity at the port of Assab? How many vehicles have our Government supplied; and are we in a position to increase the handling capacity of that port? Are we able to speed up the transport of grain by road into Wollo and Tigré?

Can the Minister tell us about increased supplies of supplementary food? When one talks to the relief agencies one finds that there is considerable concern that there are not facilities in some of the relief camps to mill grain and that some of the grain is not put to the best use because it is difficult for young children to eat it in the form in which it arrives. Can the Government say anything about the possibility of increasing supplementary food and helping the Ethiopian Government to process food if it does not arrive in a suitable form for young children.

Can the Minister tell us what is being done to improve accommodation in the camps, particularly if the small rains come in late January and February, to ensure that people are not out in he open?

This brings me on to medium-term aid. What are the Government doing to try to ensure that the people in the affected areas of Ethiopia will be able to return to their villages and plant crops in June, July, August and September if the 1985 rains come? What are we doing to help with the supply of seed and draught animals for ploughing? Are we able to give any short-term aid to ensure that the water is effectively trapped, to reduce the amount of soil erosion that results from some of the storms, and to help improve cultivation? What aims do we have to try to get sufficient food into the relief camps so that people can take three months supply of food back to their villages when they return to cultivate the land?

Can the Minister say more about the Government's attempts to negotiate long-term aid schemes with the Ethiopian Government? I am sure that on his visit he realised that it was not sufficient to provide only short-term aid and that we must look to long-term aid.

I am tremendously impressed by the efforts of the British people, be they school children or others, to raise money for Ethiopia. It is clear that my constituents and the people of this country want the starving to be fed now, and many feel strongly that this situation should not occur again. As I have said before, many people died in the affected areas of Ethiopia in 1965, they died in large numbers in 1973, and they are dying now. Now that the Minister and other hon. Members have been to see for themselves, we have an absolute responsibility to ensure that this does not happen again. The only way we can do so is by turning to long-term aid.

I hope that the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) will catch the eye of the Chair, after which I look forward to the Minister's reply.

10.42 pm

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) for allowing me time to participate in this debate. I support the general thrust of his arguments.

I wish to concentrate on one or two brief points. Since the House debated this matter just before Christmas, there have been increasing allegations that the Ethiopian Government have been using food aid to feed their troops and that food aid donated by the West and other agencies is going astray.

This is not the first time that such allegations have been made. On each and every occasion that they have been investigated, the allegations have been found to be without substance. In July 1981, a European Parliament delegation visited Ethiopia and reported that the country was making responsible and effective use of the food and other aid provided by the European Community and that there was no evidence to suggest that food was going astray. Again, in June 1983, another delegation from the European Parliament visited Ethiopia and satisfied itself that food aid was being properly used and, contrary to allegations, had not been diverted from its intended purpose. That was confirmed by a later report of the Commission of the European Community.

Neither Save the Children Fund nor Oxfam, which have teams in the Government-controlled areas of Ethiopia, have seen any evidence of relief supplies being diverted to the Ethiopian army, and the relief agency teams monitoring their own relief programmes have been able to confirm that money donated by the British public and others reaches its intended target. I have no doubt that the present Ethiopian Government have many faults, but I do not believe that the abuse of food aid is one of them.

It is a sad fact that, added to the continuing tragedy of famine in Ethiopia, there are now allegations of food aid going astray, based on propaganda arising out of the consequences of civil war. I fear that these allegations will only reduce the amount of food aid which Ethiopia as a whole receives.

As a consequence of these allegations, it has been requested that there should be a new international commission to supervise and control the relief offered. Already a number of the United Nations agencies have been involved. For example, the Food and Agriculture Organisation, the world food programme, to which reference has been made, and the United Nations High Commission for Refugees are already involved.

What we need is not a new commission but better co-ordination of the existing international agencies. I understand that the United Nations Secretary-General specifically appointed an Assistant Secretary-General, Kurt Jansson, to supervise the relief operation and to co-ordinate information from donor countries and agencies as to the food relief being sent. I should like to ask my right hon. Friend whether the British Government are satisfied that Kurt Jansson and the United Nations and its various agencies have now got a grip on the situation in order to ensure that relief aid is being distributed through their agencies to all parts of Ethiopia.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): The House is indebted to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) for raising the subject of British aid to Ethiopia and also to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry). Both the hon. Member and my hon. Friend have followed the course of events in Ethiopia very steadily and persistently over the last year or two. We know of their very great concern about the subject. It is valuable that once again they should have come back to the topic. We know that the situation in Ethiopia is still very grave. The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish was right to stress this point. I hope he will forgive me if I do not answer every single one of the string of pertinent questions which he put, but I shall try to answer by correspondence those that I am unable to tackle this evening. However, the hon. Member, as has my hon. Friend, reminded the House that there are very many important points which we have to keep closely in mind. I agree with what the hon. Member had to say about public opinion. Clearly public opinion has been aroused by this tragedy and will not suddenly forget all about the problem. It is deeply engraved in the minds of very many people.

It is sometimes implied that until last autumn we had done nothing about Ethiopia. Some people had never thought about Ethiopia and assumed that nobody else had thought about it, either. In fact, during the last two years our assistance to Ethiopia had been stepped up, and on a dozen or so occasions we had responded to appeals from international organisations and voluntary agencies for help in the worsening situation. In the period up to October 1984 the help given has cost the aid programme £15·5 million, half being our share of help provided through the European Community, in support of six separate actions.

On the long-term side, to which both the hon. Member and my hon. Friend referred, we have also been able to take the first steps towards restoring normal aid relations with Ethiopia. Twelve months ago we were happy to agree to provide support for postgraduate medical training at Addis Ababa which the Ethiopian Government saw as their highest priority. In addition, one of my educational advisers visited Ethiopia three months ago to assess training needs. We are currently considering her recommendations.

In July 1984, following the settlement of compensation for Mitchell Cotts, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), paid the first visit to Ethiopia by a British Minister for many years. While he was there he offered the Ethiopian Government the cancellation of repayments on outstanding aid loans, worth about £2·5 million. In recent months we have also agreed to fund a resumption of volunteer activities in Ethiopia.

So even before the intensification of interest in Ethiopia over the last few weeks we had in fact seen some building up of what I might call the normal development programme. But obviously in the last three months our efforts have necessarily been concentrated on providing emergency assistance for victims of the famine. As the scale of the human tragedy became more apparent, not least through the harrowing scenes shown on our television screens, the Government have increased the help that they are giving, which now totals a further £14 million. In doing so, we have taken particular care to listen to the British agencies active in Ethiopia and to the views of our ambassador to ensure that our assistance is spent on equipment and supplies which quickly and directly help the relief operations.

To that end, as well as providing new Land-Rovers and dumper trucks, we have provided spare parts to get other vehicles back on the road, and mobile workshops to help keep them there so that supplies can be kept moving.

Through the voluntary agencies, we have provided two drilling rigs along with trucks and associated equipment; four Land-Rovers, five 30-tonne trucks; grain mills, tents, blankets, seeds, tools, polythene sheets and either the chartering of planes or the cost of airfreight for some of these and other items supplied by the agencies.

Our relief supplies have included 50 km of cable and rope and 500 tarpaulins. We have also provided grain conveyors and other items to help improve the handling facilities at the port of Assab—a question which has just been raised. As I saw for myself during my visit at the end of November, the operations there are now much more efficient, for which credit must go to the Relief and Rehabilitation Commission and the Marine Transport Authority of the Ethiopian Government.

During that visit, as I think the House knows, I went to the feeding centres at Korem and Mekele. They are as desolate as one would expect, but even the most starved-looking children can usually recover with food and care. Those visits brought home to me vividly the need for tents, blankets and medical supplies and, at my request on my return to this country, my officials sent further supplies of these items.

I should emphasise that we have been able to respond quickly in conjunction with the voluntary agencies. That was demonstrated again early in December when, following unexpected heavy rains at Alamata, we provided more tents and polythene sheeting within a very few days.

As the hon. Gentleman said, a particularly significant element of British assistance has been the detachment of two RAF Hercules together with a support team. These aircraft have been helping to move large quantities of relief supplies from Addis Ababa and the port of Assab to the areas of greatest immediate need. As well as food, they have transported medical supplies, clothing, blankets and vehicles. To date, they have moved over 4,000 tonnes working seven days a week including Christmas day.

In keeping with the best tradition of the service, the RAF responded to the request for help quickly—indeed, ours was the first foreign Government to set up an airborne famine relief operation—and the efficiency, friendly co-operation and professionalism with which it operates has won widespread praise from the relief agencies and the Ethiopian Government. That was made clear to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces and also to me when each of us visited Addis Ababa.

I have been asked how long the airlift will continue. The initial commitment was for three months, but we are considering whether to extend that, taking into account the latest assessment of needs provided by the Ethiopian Government and the intentions of other donors. We must consider how we can best use the available resources and whether it is best to continue with the air operation or to concentrate on other things.

The individual items that I have described are important, but the greatest need is for food, particularly grain. In recent weeks, we have agreed to provide a further 21,500 tonnes of grain, and the first shipment of 6,500 tonnes arrived at the port of Massawa just after Christmas. However, the scale of the human disaster in Ethiopia clearly requires relief supplies, especially food, to be provided on a massive scale over a prolonged period.

That is why, at the end of October, we took the initiative in urging our partners in the European Community to make a significant response to the needs of Ethiopia and other drought-stricken countries in Africa. In the year to the end of October 1984, the Community had already made available 125,000 tonnes of grain and other food for Ethiopia. It then agreed on 6 November a further special programme of food aid and transport assistance, costing £35 million, for drought-affected countries in Africa. Ethiopia will be receiving 45,000 tonnes of cereals and about £8 million in other emergency relief from that programme.

In addition, as the hon. Gentleman has reminded us, the European Council, which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister attended in Dublin, agreed on 4 December that the Community and its member states will provide 1·2 million tonnes of grain to drought-affected countries in Africa, including Ethiopia, during 1985.

The Community has since agreed to allocate £47 million from the emergency provision of the Lomé convention, and to transfer £53 million to the emergency provision of the 1984 Budget to finance the first 500,000 tonnes.

Such has been the reaction of the international community in recent weeks that more than 20 countries are now contributing to the relief efforts in Ethiopia, and the role of the United Nations co-ordinator, Mr. Jansson, is, therefore, of particular importance. He has already started to pull things together, in collaboration with the Ethiopian authorities and donors, and held a useful meeting in New York on 18 December.

We see one of Mr. Jansson's tasks, perhaps his most important task, as establishing the needs of Ethiopia in the next 12 months, and we hope that progress on this will be made in the next few weeks. It is clear that his task is difficult. Until now, the authorities have not really known what is due to arrive when. There have been instances when supplies have been overestimated and others when they have been underestimated. It is crucially important that the United Nations representative should have a full grasp of what is happening, and to do that he must have accurate and effective information from donor countries.

I was asked to give an assessment of needs, particularly after the month of March. I must in honesty say that it is difficult to say exactly what the flow will be after March. We have seen figures for the immediate period, for the first three months of this year, and they show that a substantial quantity of grain is on the way. In addition, substantial pledges have been made. There has been the generous response by way of promises from the Community, the United States and other countries.

It is important that not only should food come in in enormous quantities but that the pipeline should be properly managed, and that is a matter in which we shall take a close interest, although the responsibility for that lies with Mr. Jansson, with the world food programme and so on. It is extremely important that there should be co-ordination. I am concerned by recent reports which have suggested that more food may arrive at the Ethiopian ports in the next two months than they have the capacity to handle, even though the capacity has been much improved.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: It is important to keep the airlift there, because it played a crucial part in November in speeding up the handling of grain through the ports. If there is any surplus of grain, it is important that the airlift is kept going so that the supplies may be moved on as quickly as possible to the places where they are needed.

Mr. Raison: That is obviously a factor, but unloading is also a factor. I believe that the supplies to be allocated in the coming immediate period should be enough. They are substantial quantities which should be sufficient—and, if anything, too much — for the time being. Difficulties will be imposed if there is too much grain in the ports, not merely because of the handling difficulties but because of problems with storing it. The lesson to be learnt, therefore, is that while it is better to have too much than too little, we want a properly planned, steady, flow of grain in the period to come.

It is essential to ensure that relief supplies reach victims of the famine wherever they may be. As I told the House on 18 December, we have urged the Ethiopian Government to ensure that food and relief supplies reach all those areas, including Eritrea and Tigré, where it is needed and to ensure that military operations do not interfere with the movement of food and civilians. We believe that the best way to get the food there is to work through the voluntary agencies and the international committee of the Red Cross.

There is a peculiarly difficult situation, including the movement of refugees into the Sudan for which, as the House knows, I have in recent weeks announced further assistance totalling £1·85 million. We have made it clear that food must go where it is most needed. However, we firmly recognise Ethiopia's international frontiers, and we cannot support secession as part of the whole imbroglio. The organisations which have taken up arms against the Ethiopian Government cannot escape the fact that they have also contributed to the difficulties which exist in getting food where it is most needed.

Of course, if there were less fighting, if the Ethiopian Government did not devote their energies and foreign exchange to the purchase of arms and if there were more resources, more energy would be available for the country's development. We are bound to ask whether the Ethiopian Government could not do more to secure the willing consent of all the peoples of Ethiopia to their rule. All those interested in the welfare of Ethiopia are bound to observe that Ethiopia's internal difficulties inevitably hinder relief and development for the region as a whole

On the question whether food is failing to get through — a point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury — it is fair to say that, although there are difficulties and although there have been reports of supplies being misappropriated, I believe that it would be quite wrong for the public to reach the conclusion that the money that they subscribe on food aid is a waste of money. The overwhelming bulk of the money both from the people of this counry and from the Government is reaching the right destination, and will continue to do so. I hope that no one is put off by the scare stories, although I accept that we have to watch the position carefully.

I should have liked to have said a little more about the longer-term because that, ultimately, is the answer to finding ways to prevent the recurrence of the famines. However, time does not permit that. I conclude by thanking both hon. Members for raising this topic. I hope that they will continue with their interest in it, because that is what the country expects.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute past Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 11 January 1985

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

A132 (Runwell)

9.35 am

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): I have the honour to present a petition from the residents of the Rochford constituency. It is addressed

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

It draws attention to the dangerous nature of the A132 road through Runwell due to its twisty nature and the high speed of a great deal of traffic, including many heavy goods vehicles. The petition states:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the Honourable Members of the House of Commons, the relevant Minister and government department, will take appropriate action to ensure the safety of users of the A132 road at Runwell, and particularly pedestrians by

1. Constructing a bypass and/or
2. Establishing a pedestrian crossing near the church, and
3. Extending the 30 mile per hour limit to Rettendon Turnpike, and fourthly, by adjusting the sign on the turn to Wickford on the A127 road so that traffic wishing to go to South Woodham Ferrers on the A130 is no longer persuaded to use the A132.

The petition is signed by the vicar of Runwell church and associated with it are more than 1,000 petitioners. I wish to associate myself with this petition and present it to this House.

To lie upon the Table.

Human Embryos

9.37 am

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I have the honour to present a petition on the matters contained within the Warnock report that deals with the status of the human embryo. It is signed by some 3,000 residents of Leeds, West and neighbouring constituencies. It reads:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

The views of the petitioners are deeply and sincerely held. It is a legitimate point of view that I am sure will be considered by all right hon. and hon. Members of this House. I have the honour to present the petition on behalf of the petitioners.

To lie upon the Table.

9.38 am

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): I have the honour to present a petition concerning the protection of the human embryo and following the report of the Warnock committee. This is another petition that I present today; it contains more than 310 signatures of York constituents, and reads:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

This petition endorses the deeply held view of many York people. The work of some misguided scientists has not been natural and cannot be God's way. I know of the concern of the Church and all who look to Parliament to uphold high, moral and ethical standards in society. Do let us accept the spirit of this and similar petitions, embrace such safeguards in our legislation and protect and foster natural life.

To lie upon the Table.

BILL PRESENTED

EDUCATION (CORPORAL PUNISHMENT)

Secretary Sir Keith Joseph, supported by Mr. Secretary Brittan, Mr. Secretary Younger, Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. Secretary Fowler, Mr. Secretary Hurd, Mr. Peter Brooke and Mr. Bob Dunn, presented a Bill to make provision in respect of the corporal punishment of pupils: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Monday next and to be printed. [Bill 57.]

Acid Rain

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

9.39 am

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): I welcome this opportunity to debate the report on acid rain of the Select Committee on the Environment, and with it the Government's reply to the report. I am particularly grateful to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House for having kept his promise to find time for the debate. Select Committee reports are not frequently discussed on the Floor of the House. Indeed, not a single Environment Committee report was debated in the House for the whole of the 1979-83 Parliament. This is the third debate accorded to the present Committee since it was appointed to the House a little over 12 months ago, so we are indeed fortunate. Having said that, I must add, without, I hope, appearing a little churlish, that I would have preferred a better time for the debate than a Friday immediately following the end of a curtailed recess. We are discussing a subject of growing importance, when public awareness is heightening, and I know that many colleagues would have wished to be present had they been able to alter their arrangements. However, I recognise the Government's preference for a low-key parliamentary occasion on this subject, so I must be grateful for small mercies.

This is an all-party report of a Committee composed of seven Conservative Members, three Labour Members and one Liberal Member. It is a unanimous report. I wish to thank my colleagues on the Committee for all the hard work that they put in over three months to produce it in record time. Therefore, this is a House of Commons occasion, when the Back Benches seek to give some guidance to Ministers, having carried out in-depth research into matters that we know their administrative duties deny them the time to investigate in the same depth. I trust, therefore, that the debate will not be diminished by party-political posturing.

I say that directly to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) because I heard him on the radio this morning welcoming the report because it was "straight Labour party policy". Until the report was published, I do not recall any great concern about the matter by the Labour party, certainly not in the general election campaigns of 1979 and 1983. Moreover, when I raised the problem of sulphur emissions when I was on the Opposition Front Bench during the Second Reading of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, I did not receive a very forthcoming reply from the Labour Minister of the day. Therefore, I find it hard to see a Labour policy, but I recognise opportunism when I see it.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The Labour party would reciprocate the spirit in which the hon. Gentleman started his speech, but he has now introduced the dimension that he sought to avoid. Does he not agree that we could close this point by saying that those who insist on and enthuse about the magic of the market must watch it carefully when we deal with national and international matters of environmental pollution?

Sir Hugh Rossi: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for showing that he agrees that this should be a House of Commons matter, and should not be diminished by party political posturing. I thought it only right, having heard the hon. Member for South Shields on the radio this morning, to respond to him, because it was the only opportunity for me so to do.

I now turn to the report. The term "acid rain" is a convenient and graphic description of the problems that we consider in it. The term is not used in its strictest sense. Not all that is covered by it is rain. We are equally concerned with dry depositions and so-called "occult" depositions, or mists, as we are with acidified rain water. Not all that is covered by the term is acid. We take into account the problems attributed to man-made ozone. However, there is a consistent common denominator. All with which the report is concerned are the products of the combustion of fossil fuels emitted into the atmosphere, which on return to ground level, either singly or in combination with one another or some other elements, cause damage to the physical environment. Therefore, acid rain is a result of burning coal or oil, whether in power stations, industrial plant, domestic boilers and grates or motor car engines, which corrodes buildings, destroys water life, damages forests, trees and plant life, and might be detrimental to human health.

The Committee commenced its inquiry with a completely open mind, and came to the unanimous conclusion that action needed to be put in hand without delay to combat the effects of acid rain. The reasoning that led to our conclusions is set out in detail in the report. Our conclusions were reached after taking and evaluating evidence both here and abroad, much of it of a technical and scientific nature, in which we were assisted by our specialist advisers, Professor Alan Williams of Leeds university and Dr. Nigel Bell of Imperial college, London, to whom we are indebted for all their help and advice.

The first matter that impressed us was the concern and anxiety over acid rain that we found on our visits to West Germany, where extensive tree and forest damage has been experienced, and to Scandinavia, where severe fish losses have been suffered through acidification of lakes and rivers. In those countries there is little doubt as to the cause, although some scientists have differed on how the effects have come about. In those countries, where damage is so extensive and obvious, there is a high level of public awareness and political pressure on Governments to act.

By contrast, in the United Kingdom, there is no such awareness and, indeed, comparatively little scientific monitoring and investigation taking place. The reasons for that are several. First, because of our climatic conditions, prevailing winds and infrequent periods of summer anti-cyclones, we have so far escaped the obvious effects experienced in West Germany and Scandinavia. Secondly, the Clean Air Act 1956 and the tremendous benefits brought about by smoke-free zones have lulled us into a false sense of security. The London smog that killed some 4,000 people in December 1952 has been banished, and we enjoy 70 per cent. more winter sunshine in central London than in those years, and many species of birds and plants have returned to the area which, previously, could not survive there. That legislation was far in advance of that achieved by any other country. By getting rid of the visible atmospheric pollution, the grit and the soot, we believed as a nation that the problem had been solved.

Thirdly, to that was added the tall chimney policy, as a result of which industrial smoke is sent high into the atmosphere and its contents carried by the prevailing winds many miles from source. In consequence, public anxiety subsided and scientific investigation was reduced to a very low level.

There are large areas of the United Kingdom in which no monitoring of air quality has been taking place. The recording of acid deposition is patchy and primitive. Precious little has been done to study the corrosion of buildings for almost two decades. Inquiry into damage to trees and waterways has been unco-ordinated and on a minute scale. Meanwhile, vast quantities of invisible sulphur dioxide and various oxides of nitrogen have continued to be poured out into the atmosphere from the burning of coal and oil.

Today, the United Kingdom is the largest single emitter of sulphur dioxide in Europe outside the Soviet Union with something in the order of 5 million tonnes per annum. A similar picture emerges for nitrogen oxide where only western Germany produces more than we do.

No one challenges the scientific fact that when sulphur dioxide is deposited on sandstone or limestone a chemical reaction takes place which reduces to powder the surface of the buildings with which they are made. The Committee had to talk to the architect for Cologne cathedral to discover that.

When the Committee returned to the United Kingdom, it found that the Building Research Establishment had done no work on that for two decades; the CEGB had started investigating the problem some two years ago only; and the PSA had kept no central records. However, inquiries of the curators of several historical buildings revealed extensive and widespread damage extremely costly to repair.

The Committee was also told in western Germany that the modern reinforced concrete structures suffer. The acid penetrates to the metal rods, causing them to corrode, rust and expand, fracturing the concrete fabric by internal pressure. No one, but no one, has been able to confirm that to the Committee in the United Kingdom because of a complete lack of study.

When the Committee came to consider the effects upon water life, it found the scientific picture to be more complex. The extent to which water life is affected by depositions of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxide depends upon the geology of the catchment area of the waters. There is no doubt that increased acidity of water kills vulnerable eggs and fry especially after snow melts when there can be a sudden surge of acidity. High levels of acidity leach toxic metals into the water which kill adult fish.

The acid effect can be buffered in areas where there is calcium in the subsoil, so fish there suffer less than in areas where a comparable degree of acid deposition falls upon granite.

In Sweden, 18,000 out of 20,000 lakes are acidified and some 4,000 have entirely lost their fish stocks. In Norway a survey of 2,840 lakes showed that 1,711 had lost their fish due to acidification. In the United Kingdom, the Committee found that fish loss is now being experienced in Scotland. A fish farmer in Dumfriesshire suffered serious unexplained losses until scientific research commissioned by him from Stirling university revealed that it was due to acidification of a burn from which he drew his water. Although the Committee does not have evidence, it understands that Wales is now expressing anxiety.

Liming is recommended by some British sources as an antidote. There is no doubt that artificial additions of calcium can neutralise acidity. However, the Swedes consider that to be a temporary measure at best, and the Norwegians say that it is useless in fast-running waters. It cannot combat the acid surges from snow melt at breeding time. They argue that the remedy is to stop the emission of the acid at source and not to attempt to combat it when it has been deposited.

The Committee found the effects on acid rain on trees and forests more difficult to investigate. That was mainly due to the fact that original observations in western Germany had again blamed sulphur dioxide as being the main culprit. It was suggested by some of their scientists that that released toxic metals in the soils, damaging fibre roots.

More recent studies have shown that ozone produced as the result of a reaction between nitrogen oxide and hydrocarbons in sunlight is a significant cause of needle burn and loss to pine trees. It now seems to be generally accepted in western Germany and Scandanavia and by some scientists in this country that ozone is the principal factor in tree damage in western Germany and Scandanavia. In western Germany, the Committee found that some 50 per cent. of the forests are affected.

However, it must be remembered that, whether sulphur dioxide or nitrogen oxide and hydrocarbons combining into ozone are the main culprits, all are the result of burning fossil fuels. The distinction lies in the source, as evidence shows that the motor car engine is equally culpable in the production of nitrogen and hydrocarbons whereas sulphur dioxide comes mainly from industry and power stations.

So far, the United Kingdom can rejoice in that it seems to have escaped the serious effects that acid rain has had on water life and forests in other countries. Whether we are simply some years behind other countries in feeling the cumulative effects of acid deposition because we have been protected by our climatic conditions is impossible to say. That requires monitoring and research, which has not been taking place.

Hence the several recommendations that the Committee makes for such programmes, which I am pleased to note that the Government have accepted, including those for the development of new combustion technology in industry, power stations and motor car engines for the reduction of emissions.

I must express the Committee's gratitude for the fact that 19 of its 21 recommendations have been accepted by the Government and are to be acted upon. However, we are disappointed that the Government are not prepared to recognise the need for urgent action to reduce emissions. The experience of other countries suggests that, while damage may be slow in coming, it spreads rapidly when it does come, and the first signs have already appeared in this country.

The Committee feels also that we have a responsibility to our neighbours. Whilst our tall chimneys and prevailing winds enable us to export 70 per cent. of our sulphur dioxide production, saving ourselves from its worst effects, there is no doubt that we are causing severe damage in neighbouring countries.

Good international relations are important, as the Government recognise in many other aspects of their policy. It is therefore inexplicable that the Government should refuse to accept the Committee's recommendation to join the "30 per cent. club" to which some 20 countries already belong. The commitment would be to reduce sulphur emissions by 30 per cent. by 1993, taking 1980 as the base year. This country has already achieved a 20 per cent. reduction in four years, leaving only the remaining 10 per cent. to be attained over the next nine years. Instead, the Government offer in their reply to attain that 10 per cent. over 16 years — by the end of the 1990s. The principle is accepted but the time scale is extended for what is, in the Committee's view, a dangerously long time. This cannot begin to be an exercise in international co-operation. Surely it is not necessary to be so excessively timid. It shows a regrettable lack of good neighbourliness.

Curious about this aspect of the Government's reply is the fact that, although they assert in paragraph 1.3 that they aim to achieve the 30 per cent. reduction by the 1990s, they do not say how they intend to achieve it. On the contrary. They go on to say that expenditure in curtailing flue gas desulphurisation in existing power stations cannot be justified.

If this solution is rejected and it is known that new combustion technologies will not be available for several years, let alone installed and operating, will the Minister please explain the precise Government programme for the 30 per cent. reduction and how it is intended to be achieved? The reply is totally silent on that.

The Committee also recommends that the Government embark, with our European partners, on a much more ambitious course than the 30 per cent. reduction; namely, the adoption of the EEC draft directive requiring a 60 per cent. reduction in sulphur dioxide emissions by 1995, again taking 1980 as the base year.

The power stations in Britain are by far the largest emitters both of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxide. The targets could be reached by the adaptation of some of the larger power stations and by requiring industry to install new technology as and when new factories are built.

The cost to the electricity generating industry would be substantial — approximately £1·5 billion, or the equivalent of a rise of 5 per cent. in electricity charges. All this cost, however, would be spread over a 10-year period.

It is perhaps understandable that the Government should have baulked at undertaking such a large expenditure, especially when their main preoccupation at present is to find every possible means of reducing public expenditure. It is even more understandable that the Government should have been reluctant when they have been receiving advice from not disinterested sources to the effect that it is by no means sure that the expenditure proposed would solve the problem.

In our report, we have collated evidence from a variety of outside sources from which information has not been collated before; evidence which has not previously been considered by Government advisers and Ministers. We believe that all the evidence leads inexorably to the conclusions that we have reached and that sooner or later the Government will be obliged to recognise the validity of our conclusions.

I can only express the hope that a more careful study will be made by the Government of the evidence that we have found and that they will then be moved to take urgent action before irrevocable damage is suffered, damage which in the long term will cost far more to mitigate than the sums posited in our report.

10.4 am

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I wish at the outset to congratulate the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) on his exposition today and on his excellent Select Committee report. Indeed, the House and the country should congratulate him and his fellow Committee members on what they have done.

I need hardly say that I take exception to some of his earlier comments. We are discussing not only the Select Committee report but the Government's response to it in Cmnd. 9397. While I have no quarrel with the Conservative members of that Committee, I quarrel with the Government because, like the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green, we are disappointed with their response to the two cardinal points of the report. It may be an inconvenient fact for the Government, but it happens that the Select Committee report follows Labour party policy as enunciated on many occasions from this Dispatch Box. I will not labour that point today, but, in view of the hon. Gentleman's comments, it is right that I should mention it.

I also associate myself with the hon. Gentleman's comments about having this debate today. We usually discuss non-contentious business on Fridays, whereas the Minister knows that a deep divide exists on this issue between the two sides of the House.

We claim that the Government are indifferent to this whole problem, and proof of that is to be found in Cmnd. 9397, for that response is contradictory, evasive, procrastinating, repetitive and, more important, completely wrong in its conclusions. The Government have so little to say in their puny response that they resort to mere repetition. For example, they say in paragraph 1.4:

"The United Kingdom has a proud record of achievement in tackling the massive legacy of pollution inherited from the past and the Government firmly intends to sustain that record."

That is obviously the opinion of the Government because they say in paragraph 2.28:

"The United Kingdom has a pround record of achievement in tackling the massive legacy of pollution inherited from the past and the Government firmly intends to sustain that record."

Methinks that they protest a little too much in their repetition, though perhaps we should give them full marks for consistency.

The tragedy is that that repeated statement shows the Government's failure to understand the problem of acid rain. To imply that the problem has been "inherited from the past" is basically false. The industrial revolution introduced the problem into the nation, but relatively recent developments by the CEGB, with its high-stack policy, have compounded the problem. It is a problem basically of modern dimensions which should and could be tackled today.

Inconsistencies in the Government's response occur again in paragraph 2.21, in which they allege, when talking about the reduction in acidic emissions:

"The nature of these reductions is such that resumed industrial growth is unlikely to reverse them."

In paragraph 3.62 they moderate their position and assert:

"It is reasonable to assume that much of this reduction will not be reversed as a consequence of continued industrial growth."

However, in the next paragraph, 3.63, they change their position again and say:

"stronger growth in electricity demand could reverse these trends."

Thus, in three paragraphs we have a complete change of position, though the third gives the game away. Much of our success in reducing acidic emissions has been as a result of the industrial recession into which the Government have led us deeper than any other Government in Europe, and, despite the recession, we are still the greatest polluter among the free nations of Europe. What the Government claim in apparent innocence in paragraph 3.62 about the 1980 date for the base mark in relation to emission reductions overlooks the fact that other countries have also reduced emissions. The Government are acting shamefully and their response highlights the shameful manner of their approach.

When I am asked to name the best resumé of the acid rain problem in the United Kingdom — there is a plethora of reports — I refer always to the Select Committee's report, which I hold in esteem. As the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green has said, the members of the Committee began their consideration of the problem with an open mind. They spent a great deal of time examining the issue. They went to Germany, Norway, Sweden, Cumbria, Galloway and other areas of Britain to study the problem. They produced an admirably well-thought-out and well-researched document and its conclusions should have the full support of the House. The conclusions are balanced, objective and realistic and it is sad that the Government cannot accept the principal ones. I hope that Conservative Back Benchers will get that message across to the Government. They will have our full support in their efforts to do so.

I acknowledge that the Government have accepted 19 of the 21 recommendations and I recognise that those recommendations are important. I take the Government's point about research and the collection of data, but I endorse the argument of the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green that we can do all the research in the world but if we fail to take action quickly the damage will be irreparable and the cost even more prohibitive. Unless we accept that we shall threaten our own environment and that of our European neighbours. We shall risk also losing millions of pounds worth of exports and thousands of jobs.

The report that we are discussing is one of many to have appeared in the past 12 months. Acid rain is now much in vogue. However, I first came across the problem in the late 1960s when I was involved in a feasibility study of afforestation in the south Pennines. The project turned out to be impractical because the acidic emissions from the power stations in south-east Lancashire made tree growth extremely poor in the south Pennines. Accordingly, the scheme fell through. The Central Electricity Generating Board told us that we should not worry as it was only a matter of time before the effect of its high-stack policy would reverse the problem in the Pennines. It was right. Trees will now grow in the south Pennines. The acidic emissions have been reduced in that area. However, the same emissions are carried across to our Scandinavian neighbours.

That experience of the late 1960s made me sceptical about the CEGB's position. If acid rain was damaging trees in the south Pennines in the late 1960s, why does the CEGB deny that it is damaging the environment in Scandinavia now? That is a question which the board cannot answer. Indeed, there is no answer to it. However, it would be wrong to give the impression that acid rain no longer has any effect on the United Kingdom. It has a great effect and the problem is worsening quickly.

It must be acknowledged that we are still the largest producer of acidic emissions in the free western world. Much of the emission falls on the United Kingdom, which costs us dearly. A recent estimate of the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology — it is the Government's advisory body — is that £200 million worth of agriculture and horticulture production has been lost because of acidic emissions. Furthermore, as the Select Committee outlines, there is costly damage to many of our historic buildings such as Westminster abbey, York minster and this Palace. The cost is immense.

The damage to the rural environment is perhaps even greater. The tenth report of the Royal Commission drew our attention to the problems of the waters in central Wales. It highlighted the Llyn Brianne area, which is fishless. This is due largely to acid rain. The North-West water authority has carried out a major study in the south-west of Cumbria and the English Lake District and its conclusions are disturbing. It has found evidence to suggest that surface waters in south-west Cumbria are affected by acid rain. It reports:

"In the Esk and the Duddon catchments, fishery surveys have shown that there are a number of fishless or very near fishless sites in upland regions. These sites had a geometric mean pH of 5·6 or less, and the correlation between fish stock density and pH has now been demonstrated."

The North-West water authority had no particular interest in drawing to the attention of the world the damage that has been inflicted on its water supplies, but that is what it did.

The Friends of the Earth in Scotland brought across a German forestry expert. He examined some trees which I have seen in the Lake District and other areas. Mr. Puhe came to this conclusion:

"If we had observed these signs in Germany we would have classified them as being caused by air pollution."

I could give many further examples to show that our lakes and waterways are being poisoned and our tress killed. Much of the damage is being caused to sensitive areas of our country. However, our problems are small compared with those of Norway, Sweden and Germany.

The Germans are concerned about the extent of the damage, but the key factor is the speed at which it is occurring. The hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green said that 50 per cent. of German forests were found to be damaged in 1984 whereas only 8 per cent. were damaged in 1982. In 1983, 34 per cent. of forests were damaged. The speed of the damage is of a geometric proportion, and that is why the German Government are pressing so vigorously in the EEC for action. They are introducing and implementing stiff domestic legislative measures to try to tackle the problem.

The damage has been immense in Scandinavia. The hon. Member for Wood Green and Hornsey and I have visited the Tordval area of Norway. Anyone who has been there and to certain areas of Sweden cannot fail to be impressed by the damage which has been caused and the great efforts and large sums of money which the Norwegian and Swedish Governments are making and spending to try to tackle the problem.

One result of the damage has been a demand for international action. It is clear that this is a transboundary problem. I believe passionately in the United Kingdom, but I find it offensive that in Europe only my country is refusing to play its full part in the international scene. The good name of our country is being besmirched by the Government's inaction. This is bound to have an effect on our trading position and lead to job losses. Intense anger is directed against this country in West Germany, Norway and Sweden because of the problems and the damage that is being caused by acid rain. Acid rain may be an esoteric subject in Britain, but it is almost inculcated into the culture of Scandinavia, especially in Norway.

Instead of being the laggards in pollution control, Britain should be in the van. Pollution control technology could offer many opportunities for British engineering firms such as NEI, Babcock and the Howden group. If only we took up the entrepreneurial spirit we could find a great market in this area of technology. Filtering technology is available and should be used at a number of our power stations. If five or six of our major power stations were retrofitted, they would, as the Select Committee report states, be able to meet the obligations of the 30 per cent. reduction. That would save much environmental pollution and provide jobs and export opportunities. It would provide jobs in that particular technology and in the British coal industry.

I hope that the majority of us in this place consider that the coal industry has a future and will be one of our major suppliers of energy. I regret that coal is regarded as a dirty energy production option by many countries.

If research into the fluidised bed combustion system were to be speeded up, the markets for that technology and the export of coal would be immense and would be opened up. About £25 million is going into that at the moment. That would be particularly important for coal from those threatened areas of Scotland and Wales which are relatively sulphur free or have a low level of sulphur.

That was impressed on me last September when I was taken to the district heating plant at Södertalje in Sweden. That was the first modern coal-burning station to be built in Sweden for many years. It was impressive to see much of that coal coming from Britain, being ground up with British technology and then filtered, and meeting all the stringent requirements of the Swedish Government's emission controls. There is much potential for the export of British coal if we can also provide the technology for sulphur-free coal.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): The Select Committee also visited the power station in Sweden about which my hon. Friend is talking and two significant matters came to light. One was that the air emitted from the power station was cleaner than the air around the power station that was taken into the power station and the other was that the people there claimed — and we have no reason to disbelieve them—that that power station, using British coal to provide district heating, produced cheaper energy than their hydro-electricity.

Dr. Clark: Once again, I find myself in agreement with a member of the Select Committee.

Mr. T. H. H. Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): The hon. Gentleman talks as though he favours the coal industry, but he also refers to fluidised bed combustion which is not yet available for power stations and is not likely to be available until the year 2000. But he wishes to sell coal in great quantities.

Dr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman and I have crossed swords on a number of occasions and I expect that we shall continue to do so. My main point was that if research into the fluidised bed combustion system were speeded up it would be available sooner than the hon. Gentleman suggests. I do not accept his time scale because he is generally a pessimist in such matters.

The scrubbing and filtering technologies already exist. The Select Committee has shown that, and it has suggested that they should be retrofitted. That is a worthwhile suggestion.

There is international concern about Britain's isolationist position. It is all very well for the Government to issue statements of good intent, but we want a little more from them. If they have that good intent, why will they not agree to sign the 30 per cent. reduction as 18 other countries have? We should do so as well.

As the Select Committee said, we should be actively supporting the EEC directive for a 60 per cent. reduction of SO_2 and a 40 per cent. reduction of nitrogen oxide. We should be retrofitting some of our generating stations—perhaps five or six—which would allow us to achieve a 30 per cent. reduction if we were to agree to that. All that would not only provide much needed jobs but — I emphasise this — would provide us with a springboard for export potential into the developing technology of pollution control.

In rejecting the Select Committee's report, the Government are acting in a wantonly irresponsible manner which threatens our countryside, that of our neighbours, and, indeed, many jobs. In essence, they are—I choose my words carefully—waging chemical warfare not only on our neighbours but on our country.

We oppose the Government's policy and support the Select Committee's report. I hope that hon. Members from both sides of the House will feel able to tell the Government that they are wrong and that the Select Committee is right.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): One of the signs of the seriousness with which the Government take the Select Committee's report is the presence today of my hon. Friends the Members for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram), representing Scotland, which has an important interest in this matter, for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt), representing the Department of Energy, and for the City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke), representing Britain's research input.

The Government take not only the subject but the report with great seriousness. I pay tribute, as the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) has done, to the work of the Select Committee and to the persuasive advocacy of its report which we have heard from the Chairman today. It was a considerable achievement to produce such a report in such a short time. Although, as is well known, there are some aspects of it with which the Government do not agree, we immediately accepted a considerable range of its recommendations, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) said.

We accept, as any Government must, that the report has identified some of the gaps in research and monitoring which need to be filled, as indeed did the Warren Spring report earlier, and we are moving to fill those gaps. We accept that more needs to be done and that more must be done in those areas.

My hon. Friend was right to pay tribute to Britain's air pollution record. I am sorry if we irritated the hon. Member for South Shields by saying that twice, but it is true that Britain has had a good record in air pollution over the years, and we do not intend to diminish it.

The hon. Gentleman accused us of inconsistency, but I detected some rather more fundamental inconsistencies in his speech. The Select Committee's recommendations are coherent, but I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman's were. He talked of five or six retrofits to meet the 30 per cent. cut—a rather pessimistic view of what would be needed — but he also said that he accepted the EEC large plants directive in toto. That means at least retrofitting all of them. The hon. Gentleman may like to consider those two contradictory recommendations.

It would not be using the time of the House sensibly for me to repeat the Government's published response today. Instead, I want to comment on some of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green, to develop the debate a little further if possible, to explain the different emphases where they differ, what we support and why we do so, and what we propose should happen next.

There is a case which the United Kingdom must answer on the acidification of ground waters in southern Scandinavia. The case is rather different from that of forest damage. The more we learn about those subjects the more those two aspects are separating themselves, and they need to be treated with some care and differently.

The work referred to by the hon. Member for South Shields by the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology and by my hon. Friend's Department at Pitlochry shows the beginnings of evidence of some kind of linear relationship between depositions and emissions. We have, from the ITE work, clear evidence of declining depositions in the Lake District, which runs just about in parallel with the decline which we have had in our sulphur emissions over the same period. Therefore, despite the complexities of the atmospheric chemistry involved, we are beginning to establish some kind of relationship between emissions and depositions. It sounds common sense to say that what goes up must come down, but, as those members of the Select Committee who studied the matter know, it is more complicated. The atmospheric chemistry is complex and it is worth studying properly. However, we are beginning to establish a relationship.

There is not much doubt in my mind that, with an essentially vulnerable granitic geology — an acid soil with thin buffering and no limestone about — the addition of further acid is liable to cause trouble. That seems to be common sense. It is not a matter of simply seeking to hide behind further work or to obfuscate the science, but we have yet to establish a model of what gains are obtained for improvements in the depositions.

The major fall of 40 per cent. in Britain's sulphur emissions—20 per cent. of it since 1980—is not to be sneezed at. Gains are now being seen in this country and should soon be measurable in Norway and southern Sweden. Those of us who followed in the path of the Select Committee and were shown great courtesy and hospitality by Norwegian friends and others are aware that those areas seem to have experienced a worsening of the problem at the very time when one would have expected some improvement due to the sharp fall in the acid deposition contribution of this country and one or two others. More work is therefore needed.

When one is spending other people's money, in this case electricity consumers' money, it is always easy for Ministers to push for crash programmes, but we are still ignorant about an essential part of the problem in terms of a genuine cost benefit analysis: not so much in terms of money, but in terms of the environmental gain to be achieved from reductions in deposition. I have seen some of the work being carried out in Norway, some of it jointly financed by this country and Scandinavia. Work is also being undertaken in Wales, Scotland and the Lake District and more will be undertaken in response to the Select Committee's report. That being so, I believe that it is right to wait to see what we are likely to get for our money.

A minor criticism of the Select Committee discussion of ground water acidification problems is that it may have underestimated the land use change aspect. The hon. Member for South Shields has considerable expertise in this. I suspect that forestry methods, including methods of cropping trees—what is left and what is not—may make a considerable difference. Changes of practice in recent years, leaving bark and brushwood in situ, have had a beneficial effect on the soil. I agree with the Select Committee that liming may be useful in certain lakes and lochs with a relatively low water turnover, but it is no solution to the problems of the thousands of small lakes in Norway. It may help as a stop-gap while depositions decline, but it is no overall answer to the problem.

The problem of acidification of ground water in vulnerable areas due to long-distance transportation of acid deposition is a serious problem. We must establish the crucial link between the gains to be expected from further diminutions in deposition. A massive experiment is under way, in that we have already produced a 40 per cent. fall in depositions, so we should be able to start measuring the gains from that.

The problem is quite separate from that of motor car emissions and nitrogen oxide emissions. I am not sure whether the report mentioned nitrogen oxide emissions, but the Select Committee certainly understands the subject. These emissions appear not to cause any damage in Norway, because the vegetation fixes the nitrogen so that there is no contribution to water acidification. In this context, there are some interesting dogs which do not bark in the night. There seems not to be widespread forest damage of the German type in southern Scandinavia, although some damaged stands of trees have been discovered. This is a reminder that forest damage is not simply a matter of acidification of the atmosphere. The hon. Member for South Shields referred to his own work in the Pennines, which showed that acid caused tree damage of the kind experienced in Germany. This direct damage is like that caused by old-fashioned smog. Similar damage is caused in some parts of southern Germany by intense low-level mist. There is damage to trees, but it is a different type of problem.

Dr. David Clark: When the Minister visited Scandinavia he was not able to see the problem in Sweden. Forest damage in Norway is small, but in the southern part of Sweden it is extensive and growing. That should be put on record.

Mr. Waldegrave: My point is that the situation in southern Norway shows that extensive acidification does not necessarily cause tree damage. If there is tree damage in Sweden, which I do not deny, resulting from the same kind of pollutant soup as causes damage in Germany, there must be differences between Norway and Sweden in this respect.

Mr. Allan Roberts: The Minister makes some very interesting points, but neither the Select Committee nor any of the scientists or ecologists whom we met in Scandanavia would claim that acid rain alone causes the damage. It is a contributory factor, causing damage in some circumstances, but not in others.

Mr. Waldegrave: I entirely agree, and I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support. It will not have escaped his attention, however, that in some simplifications in the popular press the view is taken that more acid necessarily means more damage, and vice versa.

Mr. Spearing: That is not in the Select Committee's report.

Mr. Waldegrave: I make no criticism of the Select Committee. Indeed, I have made it clear that I agree with the Select Committee on this. The acidification of ground water is a sulphur dioxide problem and is not related to the nitrogen oxide problem, whereas the damage to trees in Germany probably is.

Sir Hugh Rossi: We seem to be falling into the trap of using the term "acid rain" in two senses. There is the strict sense relating to the formation of mild suphuric acid through the combination of sulphur and water. There is then the wider sense referring to the result of burning fossil fuels ultimately producing ozone. The Select Committee found that it was the combination of sulphur and ozone which caused the problem. One scientist referred to the combination as a "poison cocktail", which is a good description of what is causing tree damage.

Mr. Waldegrave: There are certainly difficulties of terminology. In a way, it might be better to abandon the term "acid rain" altogether and to refer to the various pollutants in their separate manifestations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green has provided an accurate resumé on the subject of forest damage. Britain's contribution to this and the general problem of long-range transboundary sulphur transmission causing forest damage in Germany is a different problem from that of ground water acidification in Scandinavia.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green said, there is a sort of cocktail or soup. It is becoming increasingly agreed—my scientific advisers take the same view as the Select Committee on this point — that although there may be some background acidification of various kinds—and, as carbon dioxide dissolves in rain, rainfall is slightly acid naturally—the principal problem is caused by a reaction between the hydrocarbon and nitrogen oxide elements of the soup and sunlight, which produces ozone. That explains why there is more tree damage at high levels, where there is more ozone.

Research is understandably being done in desperate haste in the central European countries, and there is by no means unanimous agreement yet. However, there seems to be the beginning of the formation of a consensus among some of the best scientists on this theory. Many other factors must also be involved. Stresses on the trees must be viewed as a whole. Years of drought, or particularly harsh winters, will also have their effect. There may be soil problems, too. The trees become susceptible to damage from a number of sources, and anything that adds to the stress should be avoided.

The British Government and all other European Governments should try to help the central European countries to find a solution to their pressing and dramatic problem. It would be wrong to think that the British Government do not understand that a real crisis faces the Germans and a number of other central European peoples. Tragic things are happening on the eastern side of the iron curtain, where public debates such as this do not take place and where public opinion cannot respond as it can in the free countries. Terrible damage is occurring to parts of the Bohemian forests which will be very difficult to reverse.

We must try to establish a regime of pollution control in Europe which allows the Germans and others to do what is necessary. We agree entirely with the Select Committee about the principal limb of such a regime: there should be another forward push on motor car pollution. In terms of contributions to nitrogen oxide and hydrocarbons — which are probably the crucial ingredients of the unpleasant cocktail—the motor car is the main polluter.

There is a debating point here which is hard to resist, especially as it is a real point too. It would help us all if the Germans tackled the problem of their speed limits. Their own scientists state that if that were done they could cut nitrogen oxide emissions by 18 per cent. straightaway. In any case, the European Community must seek to evolve a motor car pollution control regime that will enable each country to take action without falling foul of Community law. We are trying to negotiate such a regime.

It is no secret that the Germans want to make more rapid progress than most of the other countries of the Community, but we must remember the severe dangers of allowing the European market in motor cars to break up. No one would gain from that except the Japanese. Commissioner Davignon, having heard people urge the instant fitting of three-way catalysts to all cars, said that he had never before heard a proposal put forward in the Community for the direct subsidy of the Japanese car industry. We must pay attention to the need to maintain the internal market. However, I hope that the Community will reach broad agreement on the matter. With luck, that should have a massive effect on forest damage.

There is another point which may have been made in the Select Committee's report, although I did not see it there. Lean burn by itself does nothing about hydrocarbons. It does something about nitrogen oxide which, with the sunlight and the hydrocarbons, produces the ozone, but it may be necessary to do something specifically about the unburnt hydrocarbons in exhaust fumes. The oxidation catalyst might be worth considering, at least for some cars, as a way of tackling the problem. It would be simpler and cheaper than the three-way catalyst.

It is no secret that the part of the report with which, in scientific terms, the Government had most difficulty was the passage on building damage. The information and measurements given to us suggest a somewhat different cause for the damage that is still taking place to medieval buildings at a dramatic rate.

I know Wells cathedral very well. It is built of limestone. The magnificent west front has rightly been called the greatest collection of medieval sculpture north of the Alps. That stone has been terribly damaged. We believe that the evidence shows that the damage is the result of dry deposition—local deposition—that took place some years ago. The process—which the Select Committee rightly described as the crystallisation of salt within the pores of the stone, which then cracks the stone—continues for a very long time.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): The generality of what my hon. Friend says may be right, but will he concede our point at least in some very important cases, such as Lincoln cathederal, which is in the plume path of the Trentside power stations, and York minster, with its relatively soft limestone? The surveyors of the fabric of York minster left us in no doubt about the fact that acid deposition is the major cause of the corrosion of the stonework.

Mr. Waldegrave: I do not disagree with the idea that the damage has been caused by acid deposition. However, it is likely that the damage is being caused by local deposition which took place some time ago. It may be that, as the Select Committee said, there has not been enough monitoring on a national scale. However, urban monitoring has shown dramatic declines in urban sulphur dioxide pollution over 20 years, and yet the crumbling of the stonework has continued. I fear that, whatever we did now, the damage would continue to occur for a considerable time.

Sir Hugh Rossi: The Select Committee entirely accepted the view that damage was far heavier in the past when the concentrations of sulphur dioxide in the atmosphere were much greater. There is no doubt that there has been a diminution.

Nevertheless, the evidence that we receive from architects who examine the buildings regularly is that the damage is continuing today. By far the greatest emitters of sulphur dioxide today—responsible for 66 per cent. of the total emission in the United Kingdom—are our power stations. The Central Electricity Generating Board may well be advising the Minister to consider past and local pollution before he turns to the power stations, but there is no escaping the truth.

Mr. Waldegrave: Clearly, this is an area of scientific disagreement between the Government and the Select Committee. I assure my hon. Friend that I am not being advised by the CEGB on the matter. The CEGB does not advise my Department.

The damage is certainly continuing. I am advised that the crystallisation of the salt goes on remorselessly year after year. One cannot argue the question both ways. One cannot say both that the high-stack policy has moved the stuff, and that it has remained where it used to be.

I think that the first thing that I said on arriving at the Department was, "What about the medieval cathedrals?" They have the same cultural importance in this country, perhaps, as the forests have in Germany, and any damage to them must be of great public interest. I have been advised that the argument may not be as powerful as it may have appeared to the Select Committee to be. However, the Select Committee will have many advocates here today.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Leaving aside medieval cathedrals, Liverpool cathedral has been built this century—work began just after 1906 and was finished relatively recently—and yet the roof covering is having to be replaced because of the effects of acid rain. Will the Minister deal with that issue? Moreover, will he say who is to bear the cost of the work, as many great buildings throughout the country are suffering and we can hardly go to the European Community to ask for money as we have rejected the relevant EC draft directive?

Mr. Waldegrave: The peak year for urban sulphur was as late as 1961. It took some time to implement the clean air legislation. We are now down to about 30 per cent. of that peak in urban concentrations of sulphur. That is a dramatic improvement. The hon. Gentleman's point about Liverpool cathedral does not therefore contradict what I have said.

Mr. Allan Roberts: How does the Minister square that with our seeing that recent restoration work at Cologne cathedral to replace stone which had been damaged by acid rain is now itself being damaged by acid rain?

Mr. Waldegrave: Low-level pollution in Germany will have declined even more recently than in Britain, because that country did not have clean air Acts. Moreover, there has been no decline in nitrogen oxide, which derives especially from motor cars in urban areas. There is not necessarily a contradiction. The Select Committee makes a broad case, without having to rely on this aspect of the matter so heavily.

We accept the Select Committee's suggestion that it is essential to monitor potential health dangers. The Select Committee on Social Services is a little like the tabloids used to be about the private lives of prominent people in public life when they said, "The rumours were denied." We have no evidence of health risks which are derived from acid rain. We have known about the dangers in Scotland arising from plumbo-solvency in water supplies. By far the greatest contributory factor to that is peat water. The contribution of acidic deposition is extremely small.

The Government agree with the Select Committee on a range of issues concerning research and monitoring. We agree about the importance of the cocktail or soup of nitrogen oxide, hydrocarbons and sunlight in forest damage. Lean burn is a sensible route to achieve energy savings and reduced pollution. The Government agree with the Select Committee about the importance of work being done on the benign technologies such as pressurised fluid bed combustion. We shall all be happy if such things can be got on stream and made economically viable. However, the engineers still have to solve considerable technological problems. We agree that it is sensible to take a precautionary view and try further to diminish the output of nitrogen oxide and sulphur dioxide.

As to our committing ourselves to a further reduction without a detailed programme, I must observe that we have taken what we believe is a realistic assessment of industrial trends, the shape of industry in the future, further gains in energy conservation and the additional contribution of nuclear energy, which many hon. Members want. It is reasonable to assume that further reductions will be possible without retrofitting flue gas desulphurisation. Unlike other countries, we have not signed up for the so-called 30 per cent. club. We believe that it will be achieved, but we are not sure that it will occur without FGD and do not think that the economics of FGD are sensible.

The Government have no argument with the Select Committee's sums in regard to the cost of meeting the large plants directive. There is not much argument about it costing £1·5 billion. We have not made that large commitment because we believe, on the basis of the evidence, which I hope I have set out reasonably impartially and to which the Select Committee's report has been a major contribution, that no Government would be responsible if they charged into an enormous crash programme now. We have achieved our 40 per cent. improvement. It would be easy to go on increasing the price of electricity and to add further problems to the burning of coal. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard) is normally an Opposition spokesman on ecological matters, but, speaking to the national executive committee at the 1984 Labour party conference, she said that the problem of acid rain might have been played up in recent months merely to knock the coal industry during the miners' strike. That is one of the voices of the Labour party.

Dr. David Clark: Might I add that, during that debate, the Labour party conference gave an overwhelming mandate to the type of policy that I have advocated today?

Mr. Waldegrave: If I may say so without embarrassing the hon. Member for South Shields, I prefer him to the hon. Member for Brightside as the Labour party's ecological spokesman.

There is no escaping the fact that the economics of coal burn must get worse, in spite of possible gains in employment for the exporters of technology. We must examine the process industries. Their margins are so narrow that any unnecessary increase in the price of electricity would be crucial. We must also consider all other consumers of electricity and jobs in the round. We have concluded, as we have said in our report, that to rush into a crash programme that would cost between £1·5 billion and £2 billion is not right.

Once again I pay tribute to the Chairman of the Select Committee and his team for producing a useful and stimulating report.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): I shall not dwell on the mechanics of acid precipitation and its effects, because they have been dealt with. I too am grateful to the Select Committeee for its thorough investigations and recommendations. The House owes it a debt.

I shall concentrate on some specific issues and emphasise what the Government should do to deal with the problem effectively. In south-west Scotland and the west central Highlands, the problem is especially worrying. Many lochs and streams have become acidified and therefore fishless. It is now clear that 57 Scottish lochs are affected in that way not because those areas receive more acidic rain than other parts of the United Kingdom but because of the volume of rainfall and the low buffering capacity of the underlying rocks. Forests do not seem to have suffered to the same extent so far. I was interested to note the Government's response on page 8 of their reply which says:

"a new form of damage to trees has recently been observed in North and West Britain".

I take it that "North and West Britain" means Scotland. Perhaps the Minister will give further details.

As for the more general circumstances in the northern hemisphere, 90 per cent. of sulphur dioxide in industrialised regions is man-made. The Government's response to the Select Committee report states that rain has been made much more acid by man. There is no doubt about that. The United Kingdom is the largest emitter of sulphur dioxide in western Europe — 80 per cent. of sulphur deposited in Britain is produced by us. In the United Kingdom, the sources of most of the pollution are tin England. The Central Electricity Generating Board produces 63 per cent. of all sulphur dioxide pollution and 46 per cent. of all nitrous oxide pollution.

Apart from the pollution that orginates from motor vehicle exhausts, coal and oil-fired power stations and the large industrial plants are primarily responsible for our pollution. In Scotland we have only two coal-fired power stations normally on stream — at Longannet and Cockenzie. They produce only 2 per cent. of the total United Kingdom sulphur dioxide emissions and are not largely responsible for the effects from which Scotland suffers.

Evidence exists that the most acidic episodes of precipitations in the Scottish Highlands occur when the south-east winds prevail. On 20 February 1984, a deep layer of sooty snow was deposited in the Cairngorms. It was brought by air currents which had passed over the English midlands and south Yorkshire—that is, over the areas that have concentrations of coal-fired power stations. The black snow undoubtedly led to fish kills in west Highland waters shortly afterwards.

Because of such events, it is possible for us to understand what the people of Norway and Sweden feel about pollution. On a parliamentary visit to Norway about 10 years ago, the attention of the parliamentary group was drawn to the fact that many of the lakes could no longer produce trout. Our hosts explained it by emissions from factories in the Soviet Union. It was either diplomatic or charitable of them to say that to a delegation from the United Kingdom, but some of us with knowledge of the prevailing winds in Norway were doubtful. Nowadays they are not in any doubt about laying the responsibility where it should lie.

I now turn to the remedies of these unhappy circumstances. Four types of action can help to reduce pollution. The first is electricity conservation. That should be of interest to any Government, apart from the question of acid rain. The other three are using coal with a low sulphur content, using the fluidised bed conversion method and using desulphurisation methods after combustion.

If I may plug the Scottish coalfield, it happens, as the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) said, that its coal has the lowest sulphur content in the United Kingdom. It would make good sense to use that coal and it makes nonsense of any plans which the Government and the National Coal Board may have to contract operations in the Scottish coalfield. Apart from other considerations, such actions are environmentally unsound.

Both the Royal Commission on the Environment and the Select Committee on the Environment recently dealt with and made firm recommendations on combustion and desulphurisation. The option is flue gas desulphurisation.

If the United Kingdom is to meet the EC directives on SO_2 and nitrogen oxide emissions from large plants, it will be necessary to go ahead with flue gas desulphurisation at the largest power stations. I welcome both the directive and the commitment of those countries which have joined the so-called 30 per cent. club. It is a pity that the Government are dragging their heels on those developments.

The cost to CEGB consumers of meeting the cost of flue gas desulphurisation would be about 6 per cent. on electricity bills over 10 years, which is considerably less than that which the Government tried a year or two ago to force on the same consumers. It is a small price to pay for a clean environment and the good neighbourliness to which the Government document refers and which the Government claim to support.

The Minister repudiated the charge that the Government were unaware of the problem. The serious charge is that the Government are well aware of it and are being extremely dilatory in taking the necessary action to cure it.

11.3 am

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I am extremely grateful to be called to make a short contribution as a member of the Select Committee on the Environment. I began by praising the Government for arranging the debate. It is characteristically a little ungenerous of hon. Members to complain that it is being held on a Friday. We had 22 days' notice. More important, the pens of the commentators will be no more blunted by the debate taking place on a Friday than will the print of Hansard be faded. What is important is the Government's approach to our Committee's report.

I assure my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary that the Committee began its long inquiry with a completely open mind. He may be consoled by the fact that at least seven of the 11 members started with the assumption that we were not likely to encourage unnecessarily an increase in public expenditure or in the public sector borrowing requirement, if we could possibly help it. We were backed by considerable specialist advice. I join our Chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), in paying tribute to Professor Williams of Leeds university and Dr. Nigel Bell of Imperial college for the tremendous specialist advice that they gave us.

Mr. Skeet: If the Government were to accept the proposals outlined in paragraph 196 of the report—that is, the 60:40:40 ratio—what would that mean in terms of the cost to the CEGB and to the public who would be the consumers of electricity?

Mr. Chapman: My hon. Friend shows great foresight in anticipating the subjects with which I shall deal shortly.

We amassed a considerable amount of evidence and closely questioned many scientists and specialists about acid deposition in this and many European countries. The evidence was compelling, even if—my hon. Friends accepted this from the outset—it was not absolutely conclusive in scientific terms.

We reached two inescapable main conclusions. First, there is an urgent need for much more research and monitoring. I am reassured by the Government's response in that respect. Secondly, there is a need for urgent action by the United Kingdom Government, pending further evidence from other countries' experience, that delay will very probably make remedial action too late because the damage caused by acid deposition can spread at an alarmingly rapid rate.

Whatever else we may be, we are not ecological nutcases looking for every possible avenue to promote every environmental cause to salvage our political consciences in other areas. We are considering areas where damage, if it takes place, will cause a great deal of environmental loss and amass a considerable amount of financial cost to our nation. It is important that that is said explicitly by some of my hon. Friends.

The problem with political awareness of acid deposition, unlike smog, is that it is invisible. The political problem in Britain is that there are few outwardly visible examples of damage caused by acid deposition, although the number is increasing. We are, happily, more fortunate than are most European countries because of our geographical position, surrounded as we are by seas, and because of our geology. Norway and Sweden are especially vulnerable not only because of geography—they lie in the wake of much of the exported United Kingdom pollution — but because of their geology. Sparse soil on top of an especially hard substratum of rock, mostly granite, makes their problem especially great. There is much more acidification in their waters because the acid cannot permeate the substratum so easily, and it runs off into their rivers and lakes.

The Committee was appalled to discover that 18,000 of the 20,000 lakes in southern Sweden have been damaged, and that 4,000 of them are now fishless. The result is that many of the lakes have become, to quote the words of Keith Spence writing in Country Life on 15 November last year,

"nothing more than beautiful dead mirrors."

The ecological consequences are extremely serious.

Sulphur dioxide is only one of the pollutants about which we should be worried. Britain is a main offender in emitting sulphur dioxide. It is the largest European exporter to other countries of SO_2 with the exception of West Germany, and I am told that last year Britain emitted 3·72 million tonnes of sulphur dioxide——

Mr. Skeet: A big drop.

Mr. Chapman: Yes, it is a big drop, and I shall come to that point in a moment.

Not only does Britain export more to other countries than does almost any other European country, but much of it falls on our friends in Norway and Sweden. Although there has been a dramatic reduction during the past 15 years, the emissions from power stations, which are the worst offenders, and which contribute more than half of the total emissions, have increased since 1960 and are at about the same level as they were in 1970. There has been no dramatic reduction in emissions from power stations, and I hope that I can say that without initiating a bitter attack on the National Coal Board, the National Union of Mineworkers or the Central Electricity Generating Board.

The cost of taking action must be at the back of the Government's mind. If we accepted the membership, if that is the right phrase, of the 30 per cent. club, and if we accepted the EC draft directive—I am using the figures of the CEGB and trying to respond as openly as I can—it is estimated that coal-fired electricity generating costs would increase by 9 per cent. to 10 per cent. Since about half of our electricity is produced by coal-fired power stations, that would increase electricity prices by 5 per cent. to 6 per cent. Many people believe that the increase will be smaller, but I shall accept the CEGB figures. Of course, the increase would be over at least 10 years.

If our 12 major power stations were retrofitted during the next 10 years, at a cost of £1,432 million at 1983 prices —we would therefore probably have to pay more than £1·5 billion at today's prices—we would achieve the 60 per cent. reduction on 1980 levels by 1995, as requested in the EC draft directive. That is a great deal of money, but I hope that the cost can be put into perspective. If I were sitting on the Opposition Benches, I might ask the Minister to say, as a guide, by how much electricity prices have increased during the past 10 years. That might put the 5 per cent. increase in a more meaningful light.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The hon. Gentleman is correct to draw this matter to the attention of the House. On the credit side, does he accept that the resulting good will and the economic opportunities that would develop in Scandinavia in appreciation of that exercise might make it a profitable venture?

Mr. Chapman: Indeed, and I hope to refer to that later.

I shall say a few words about the alleged damage to buildings, and I presume to do so as a member of the Royal Institute of British Architects. I shall focus my remarks especially on those buildings which, by any definition, are part of our marvellous architectural heritage. There is little doubt—again I choose my words carefully—that acid deposition increases the corrosion of stonework, but, of course, it is only one factor; I have no doubt that the older the building the less it is a factor in the total corrosion of its stonework to date. I also accept that the geographical position of the building is a major factor. It must be obvious, even to non-scientific minds, that corrosion from acid deposition is likely to be greater if a building stands in the plume path of a series of power stations than if it is sited on hills facing the Atlantic.

Nevertheless, corrosion represents an expensive problem in some buildings. The Select Committee visited Cologne cathedral. In paying tribute to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), who is Chairman of the Committee, may I say that I was fascinated to hear him talk about our meeting the architect of Cologne cathedral—I had not realised that he was so old. On reflection, my hon. Friend was probably right to say that, because we were watching the replacement of a replica of a replica. It could be argued that much of Cologne cathedral, at least the part that is outwardly visible, is relatively new.

Lincoln cathedral has a great problem in this respect. The surveyor of the fabric of York minster had no doubt that acid deposition was the main cause of the corrosion of the magnesian limestone, which is relatively soft—many of our buildings, including the Palace of Westminster, are built from relatively soft stone, not granite—and, in at least some buildings, meant that increasing acid deposition was a costly item in conserving our architectural heritage. Therefore, I especially welcome the Government's response to the recommendations in paragraphs 36 and 37 of our report, and the fact that increased research and monitoring will take place at some of our cathedrals, including Lincoln.

The Select Committee did not visit Poland, but there is much evidence that acid deposition has put the fine 13th century gothic buildings of Cracow under great threat.

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is entirely right about the severe problem in Poland, but once again it is the old problem of low-level intensive smog that is causing the disaster there.

Mr. Chapman: I accept entirely my hon. Friend's point, but in the wider generality of my argument I am sure he will accept my views as being equally valid.

As hon. Members have said, we have a fundamental obligation to our neighbours in Europe. Yes, the costs will be large, but the opportunities are there. Surely it is not beyond the wit and diplomatic skill of any United Kingdom Government to see that, if we are to invest hugely, to the tune of £1·5 billion to £2 billion, there will be a beneficial spin-off in the sale and development of technology, a point aptly touched on by the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). I nearly said "my hon. Friend" because we have an agreeable pairing arrangement with each other. [HON. MEMBERS: "Shh."] I apologise to the hon. Member. We share environmental interests. I am sure that the Whips get their own back because whenever we appear in the Chamber together there is never a vote. I hope that there will not be an exception today.

There would be beneficial spin-offs from such investment. We have the skill to do it properly and we must screw more money out of the European Community. Already my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has directed the debate towards ensuring that conservation becomes part of the Community agricultural budget and should be partially paid for out of it. Here we have a heaven-sent opportunity to try to press for the reorganisation of the European Community budget. There are opportunities as well as great financial liabilities.

It is possible, over a 10-year rolling programme, to achieve what the 20 countries of the 30 per cent. club have set out to do and accept the EC draft directive, which aims to reduce sulphur dioxide emission by 60 per cent. My hon. Friend the Minister was honest in his approach. He said that we did not choose to join the 30 per cent. club because we could not guarantee that we could deliver the reductions in emissions. However, at least some of those 20 countries are in exactly the same position, but have committed themselves. Could not the Government join the 30 per cent. club, adding that rider and saying that it is a rider that we are sure all the other 20 members of the club have at the back of their minds? Could not the Government think earnestly about agreeing to the EC draft directive?

Let me just set out the possible chronological scenario. In 18 months, we should be in a position of having set up the considerable increase in research programmes that is necessary, and we should have set up the extra monitoring stations in the recommended parts of the country. By 1989, we should know more certainly, from the extra research that has taken place into pressurised fluidised bed combustion development whether the necessary technology can be produced more cheaply or more effectively in order to retrofit some or all of the power stations, so that we might not be involved in such a great expense as hitherto we have imagined. Therefore, it should be possible to meet the European deadline of 1995.

I hope that the Government will have second thoughts about this, even if they have to add that diplomatic rider.

I hope that they will subscribe to the 30 per cent. club, accept the EC draft directive and show the positive commitment that they have done in their programme to eliminate lead from petrol — a commitment that I applaud.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I agree with the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman). I hope that I should take even less time than he did, because many hon. Members wish to speak, as they recognise that this is a vital issue. I shall not complain about this debate being on a Friday, as we are supposed to be full-time Members of Parliament.

The Government may have advanced a little from the position that they maintained in our last debate on environmental matters. I was extremely critical of the Minister's approach then, as he may recall. At least we may now congratulate him on having accepted the support for research. He accepted that for nitrate pollution in Question Time on Wednesday and we now have ample evidence that the Government are prepared to engage in research on these matters, although we need a rather more marked commitment. Embarking on costly development expenditure research alone will no longer suffice. We hope that the two principal failures of the Government in regard to the Select Committee's report will be amended.

The Minister's comments about Norway reminded me of the position that I was in about five or six years ago when, in the Council of Europe, I was seeking to persuade the Norwegians not to press their complaints about the United Kingdom. I said then that the forestry practices in the Tordval valley meant that the marginal nature of the soil and the granite condition of the area created the problem rather than atmospheric emissions from the United Kingdom. I was advised by those interested in the matter that fish deaths in the Tordval valley in the 19th century, before our large chimneys were erected, showed that those practices were responsible. I went along with that approach, until I realised that the thousands of lakes and rivers in Scandinavia where forestry practices cannot be a problem and where fish deaths in the 19th century appear not to have occurred suggested that we were making excuses. We were also seen to be so doing. A great deal of animosity between Scandinavia and ourselves has arisen because four or five years ago we seemed to be trying to evade the issue.

Since then, the problem has become worse. We have to show our good faith and accept that we cannot go on poisoning our neighbours. The cost of our poisoning is serious for our Scandinavian neighbours. Many Conservative Members, and perhaps a few Labour Members, are not concerned about causing problems for our neighbours, although that is no way for any civilised and trading country — I hope that we shall remain a trading country — to operate. However I point out to those who maintain such a cynical attitude that the problems of the past 20 or 30 years in Scandinavia are now occurring here.

Those who are not interested in the ecology of our islands may be able to take a fairly placid view of the problem. However, in a couple of weeks, thousands of people will be reading an article in a magazine called Birds, which some hon. Members may have received yesterday, which talks about the decline of the dipper. It is an attractive, fairly widely distributed little bird, whose numbers are now rapidly diminishing. This problem is occurring because of the acidification of our water courses, which has killed off the food on which the birds depend.

I am reminded of the fact, as the coal industry is relevant to this issue, that until relatively recently miners took canaries down collieries with them, not to hear them sing but because the canary died before the man did. The dipper can serve as a similar indicator for our civilisation. If a fairly tough little bird is being wiped out from the areas in our islands that it has long inhabited, that could show that we are polluting our planet, and doing so with a far too easy-going an approach. The Government should embark on the necessary expenditure. It will be only a tiny part of the expenditure that they have incurred through increased electricity costs as a consequence of the miners' strike. The extra cost of the oil burn will not be as much as the cost of cleaning up our sulphur emissions from power stations.

We must consider fluidised bed combustion. I recognise that the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) is exceedingly pessimistic about that. I do not know the source of his information——

Mr. Skeet rose——

Mr. Hardy: I shall not give way on this occasion; the hon. Gentleman will no doubt contribute later in the debate.

It is already possible for the fluidised bed to be developed. We can show our neighbours that we take their problems as well as our problems seriously. During 1983, and recognising the retreat that had developed in the mining industry, I twice in this House called upon the chairman of the National Coal Board and Ministers in the Department of Energy to take an optimistic and positive step on the fluidised bed. If they had done so, they would have encouraged the mining industry, which might have had a dramatic effect last year.

We cannot afford to neglect that magnifient opportunity. It would take our burning of fossil fuels out of the 19th century and into the 21st century. We have been too dependent upon 19th century combustion technology for coal. We need to take that leap forward, for both economic and commercial reasons. It would serve the cause of the environment and also coalfield economies —something that is desperately needed.

Above all, the Government must spend money. They should devote a small proportion of the £50,000 million from our offshore industries to put Britain in good order and bring about a system within Europe that would command respect rather than hatred for Britain.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): I am grateful for the opportunity to make a short contribution to the debate. In response to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), I cannot resist saying that his argument about the effects of fossil fuels would be more convincing if he would embrace the argument that one way of reducing acid rain emissions is to accelerate the speed with which we are commissioning and building nuclear power stations. I find it astonishing that among those who have jumped on the acid rain bandwagon with such haste are those who are quick to attack nuclear power.

I declare something of an interest, because one of the Scottish lochs which is badly affected by high acid levels and has been the subject of much scrutiny and research is Loch Ard, which is in the middle of my constituency and quite literally on my doorstep.

Although much of the debate, both inside and outside the House, has centred on the effects of sulphur and nitrogen oxides produced by industry and power stations, and recently the interaction between the gases and products from the internal combustion engine, I want to leave the debate on those matters to the members of the Committee. Far be it from me, as someone who was neither a member of the Committee nor has any claim to great expertise in the subject, to embark upon that highly technical debate. It would be difficult for me to make any meaningful comment.

I wish briefly to refer to the question of how far the impact of atmospheric pollution is exacerbated by the activities of commercial forestry, especially in Scotland. While the Committee did not go into that matter in any great depth, several witnesses were questioned—notably the Forestry Commission, the Natural Environment Research Council and Department of the Environment officials.

The NERC made a significant reference to the problem, which is not a new one. I recall reading an article in The Observer last September which said that it had somehow obtained unpublished official documents from the Welsh water authority, which had found that "the rivers, streams and lakes surrounded by coniferous forests are much more deadly than identical ones in open moorland."

I do not know whether the Welsh water authority referred to that in its evidence to the Committee. The evidence was not published in the final report.

As part of the NERC evidence, there is a note on the work of Macaulay Institute for Soil Research at Aberdeen, and many of the experiments were carried out in my constituency. The institute looked at stands of Sitka spruce to examine their throughput of acid rain. Subsequent research extended that to examine the effects on other types of trees. That research appears to show that certain types of trees, especially pines, create very acid soil.

While that higher than normal acidity in the soil did not usually appear to affect the acidity of streams, after draining the areas concerned a period of high rainfall appeared to result in a marked rise in the acidity of the streams. The significance of that is that improved drainage is often a feature of new forestry activity and planting, and the easier run-off of rain water seems likely to increase the amount of acidity entering streams, rivers and lakes.

For those in Scotland who are especially concerned about the impact of acid rain on the fish population, there is a further factor which has nothing to do with the acidity arising from the drainage problem. It is that the quicker run-off destroys salmon beds and other spawning grounds and thereby reduces the embryo population of fish. That is not unique to this country. Indeed, there was an interesting article recently in a magazine about research in the United States. Although generally everyone seems to blame power stations for the problem, in America they blame Smokey Bear, which is the symbol used to prevent people from throwing away matches and starting forest fires. A theory has been advanced that, even though there are natural coniferous forests, the acid rain problem has been increased because below the trees on the floor of the forest there is a build-up of pine needles and acid humus which greatly increases the acidity of water passing through it. In the natural state of things forest fires would occur which would burn up that carpet and create an alkaline neutralising influence, but because of the impact of commercial forestry taking away the trees, and because of the management that prevents forest fires, the balance has been shifted towards acidity.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Select Committee received considerable evidence when it was in Norway that, although there is some scientific evidence that the existence of coniferous trees increases the acidity in the soil around the trees, it is also clear that in Norway the lakes and trees above the tree line are affected by acid to an even greater extent than those below the tree line? That, therefore, cannot be the cause of the increased acidity.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. As I said earlier, I do not want to become involved in the detail of the argument that concerned the Committee. I accept the hon. Gentleman's point. I apologise for my parochialism in talking exclusively about the Scottish problem.

Loch Ard has been affected comparatively recently by high acid levels and, regrettably, by a substantial reduction in the trout population, if not the perch population. The fact that that has coincided with the ringing of Loch Ard by coniferous forests is a coincidence which should be studied.

The research carried out by the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology at Loch Ard shows high acid levels in the water, but above the tree line on Ben Lomond there is no acid problem at all. The Norwegian problem may be that the acid is coming from the deposition of water on the area, but that is not the case in Loch Ard. Ben Lomond receives the same rain and, indeed, provides the head water to the Forth.

Those who are jumping up and down in my consitutency and elsewhere in Scotland telling me that the fish are dying because my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland is not prepared to join the 30 per cent. club must deal with that problem. They should address their remarks to the activities of the Forestry Commission and look at the evidence of forestry as a means of creating acidity if they are concerned about acid levels in the water supply. I accept the point made by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), which is that if we are discussing the deposition of acid, we must look to the power stations, and so on.

I am sorry that, having identified the problem of ground water acidity arising from forestry activities in paragraph 52 of its report, the Committee went on to minimise its importance and made no recommendation for action. That was disappointing. I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister for the fact that I shall not be here when he winds up the debate, but I have a long-standing commitment in my constituency. However, I should like him to give an assurance that the Government will not allow the Committee's neglect of the issue to lead to any reduction in the research into the highly complex relationship between alternative land uses and their impact on the acidity of our rivers, lakes and lochs. I am pleased to notice from the evidence of the NERC that it spent an estimated £500,000 last year on those and other related areas of research, and I welcome the fact that others are also working in the area.

Reducing the pollution of the atmosphere that creates acid rain is only one side of the coin. The other is to try to restore the natural way in which the soil and the plant life that it supports act to reduce the acidity before it enters our rivers and lochs. To do so, we require a greater understanding than we currently possess of the way in which the water interacts with the environment on its progress from raindrops to rivers. Our current lack of knowledge is shown in the report. It is interesting to compare the evidence of the Macaulay institute research, which showed clear differences between the acidity of water passing through different types of trees, with the answer given by the Forestry Commission to question 477, when it was claimed that

"whether there were conifers or broad leaves, the same drain, the same imbalance occurs."

Both cannot be correct. As new Forestry Commission and private forestry developments, with subsidies, are continually taking place, and mature forests are being regularly felled and replaced in Scotland and elsewhere in the United Kingdom, it is essential that the implications of current methods of forestry are understood and that where they can be seen to be potentially damaging to the environment and the rural economy of many areas of Britain, particularly Scotland, they are changed, or the developments abandoned. If, as seems to be the case, in some areas we are in danger of creating a few jobs in forestry at the cost of destroying many jobs in tourism —the former all too often being subsidised, while the latter is profitable and taxed—an examination of current policies is imperative. I leave aside the incalculable cost in terms of damage to the environment.

I have no wish to detract from the main thrust of the Committee's report or to quarrel with the Government's response, but my concern is to look at the initial causes of acidic pollution of the atmosphere and at what further steps can and should be taken to reduce them even more than we have over the past 30 years. We do not forget that other factors are at work that make a serious and significant contribution to the end consequences of pollution.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): There is no doubt that in the past decade or so there has been a rapidly increasing public interest in the effects of pollution of one kind or another on our environment and our health. I should like to make one or two points about Scotland before I embark on more general matters.

First, I should like to refer to the composition of the Committee. It is interesting and regrettable that there is not one Scottish Member on it from either side of the House, yet the debate is being wound up by two Front Bench spokesmen from Scotland, my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) and the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland. I have no complaint about that, but it is important to the House to recognise that it is a United Kingdom Committee and a United Kingdom problem. The various parts of the United Kingdom should be represented on such Committees.

It is also a pity that the Scottish Office was not asked, nor did it offer, to give any evidence to the Committee, yet the Scottish problem excited a great deal of interest among the Scottish people. I shall address some points specifically to the Minister, which I believe are important. Before I do so, I should like to refer to matters that have not been referred to hitherto. One is the effect of acid rain —I use the term in the general sense that the Committee used — on human health. In Sweden, the Committee found evidence that acid rain is an increasing threat. There is evidence in Sweden that acid rain increases the corrosion of copper pipes. The leaching of copper and lead from water supply pipes by increasingly acidic water and the leaching from soil of heavy metals such as cadmium and mercury into water can have serious implications for human health. Those are not trivial matters. Evidence was cited of copper leaching having caused diarrhoea in small babies, and that was confirmed by United Nations organisations and supported by evidence from the United States.

Those points were put to the chief scientist at the Department of the Environment, Dr. Holdgate, and he did not know anything about them. He said that "limited work" had been done on lead and copper piping. I should like to know—I think that the House and the country would also like to know — exactly what that limited work is on lead and copper piping. Research in West Germany and the United States suggested that serious health effects arose from sulphate particles in the atmosphere. The number suffering from asthma, allergy, hay fever, bronchitis and so on was rising. Evidence from both the United States and Sweden was that, if sulphur dioxide levels could be cut by 30 per cent. from the 1978 levels, annual deaths from United States pollutant emissions could be reduced by 10,000. That is a substantial problem. The British people have a right to ask what our Government are doing about those frightening facts. They are literally matters of life and death.

The Chairman of the Committee, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), reiterated a fact that shines through the whole report. There is virtually a complete absence of research in many of those areas. The Committee recommended that there should be research into consequent on acidic rain. There was no attempt to respond to that recommendation. If the matter was not so serious, the Government's responses would be laughable. All that they did was refer to the fact that the smog in London has virtually disappeared. I remember it vividly. I lost my way walking in London in that terrible smog in 1952. I did not know where I was—[HON. MEMBERS: "You still don't know."] Perhaps. That was a terrifying experience, and we are all glad that the smog has disappeared—I hope, for ever.

"all aspects of risk to human health"

I wish to return to the subject of our water supply. I discount the one third or one quarter of the water which leaks away through our ever-decaying pipes. When the water reaches our taps, there is a disturbing increase in the rising levels of poisonous metal concentrates in our water. That is a matter of considerable anxiety, but, according to the Government's response, it does not worry them too much. In their reply the Government said:

"the capacity of acid waters to dissolve lead from plumbing has been known for many years and has led to preventive action, especially in Scotland."

The Government say that this problem has been or is being dealt with "especially in Scotland". I gave notice to the Minister that I wanted to ask him questions about water piping in Scotland. What is happening about the replacement of lead piping in houses, hotels, hospitals and other public buildings? What has happened during the past few years to inspire that reference to Scotland in the Government's reply? What additional cash has been allocated to the local authorities to replace those lead pipes? The problem must be identified, emphasised and returned to until the matter is put right, because it is literally a matter of life and death. What is the scale of the problem? Are any statistics available? For instance, how many houses, schools, universities and hospitals are still supplied through lead pipes?

[Mr. Willie W. Hamilton]

Other problems have been referred to which are not as important as that one, but they are important. I need not expand on the effect of acid rain on fish life, because the Minister is well aware of the problem. In Galloway, evidence was given of the deleterious effects of acid rain on fish life there and elsewhere, but there has been little study of this problem and still less of the solution.

The bulk of the problem is caused by the burning of coal in power stations and of oil in refineries, petrochemical complexes and motor cars. The CEGB seems to take the view that that pinpoints the need to expedite the development and replacement of coal-fired stations by nuclear-powered stations. There is not much support for that proposition from the Opposition. It would create a hell of a lot more problems than it would solve. The Minister talked about the cost of converting the power stations. He accepted this morning that the figure of £1·5 billion was about right, give or take £500 million. It could be £2 billion, but it would be spread over 10 years.

With little evidence of having done much homework on the matter, the CBI said—it would, wouldn't it?—that industry could not afford an increase of about 5 or 6 per cent. in the cost of energy over 10 years. That is nonsense, when we remember how electricity prices have been increased over the past three or four years.

The sum of £1·5 billion is nonsense. It is all very well for the Minister to say, as the Government did in their reply, that we must ensure that we have value for money. When I hear that I remember that it is just about the amount of cash that we will be spending in the Falkland Islands over the next three years. There is no question of the Government saying that we must ensure that we have value for money when we are dealing with 1,200 folk 8,000 miles away. We pour about £2 billion into the Falkland Islands, but when it comes to spending £1·5 billion over 10 years the Government say that they are not convinced that we will get value for money. What value are we getting for our money in the Falkland Islands? It is a matter of priority in public expenditure.

If the will were there to solve the pollution problem, it could be solved. Moreover, the more reluctant we are to deal with it, as has been pointed out time and time again on both sides of the House, the more soured become our relations with Scandinavia and other parts of Europe, because they are much more conscious of the problem and are at the receiving end of our filth and of the belching out of dangerous materials due to the prevailing winds and the rest.

For all those reasons—my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) talked about the prospects for exporting advanced technologies to solve the problems which is an extremely important consideration — this subject calls for a much more imaginative reply from the Government.

The Opposition hope that we will return to these matters, if not precisely to this report, within the next two or three years because they are vital. The Government's record on such matters is deplorable, as is their response to the report. If the debate had taken place on any day other than a Friday the Opposition would certainly have voted on it.

11.57 am

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): There are lessons for the Government; there are lessons for the forest cultivators; there are lessons for the automotive engineers; and there are lessons for generators of electricity to be learnt on this subject. The Government have received a great deal of instruction this morning from these Benches, and perhaps the first lesson for them is that a reputation for enlightenment in matters of pollution and pollution control is one at which they have to work continuously if they wish to retain it.

British Governments in post-war years have rightly had attributed to them a good reputation for taking care in such matters, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) said, there is some way to go with the newly discovered dangers. We need to match the reputation that we rightly acquired with our pioneering work in clean air legislation and in cleaning rivers. There is hard work for the Government to do if they are to polish a hard-won reputation.

There are lessons for the forest cultivators to learn. Cultivated plantations of trees are a series of miniature chemical systems. That is especially true of conifers. As the conifer matures it begins to shed into its environment a degree of acidity as it renders itself more alkaline. It is interesting to note — perhaps it is obvious — that in natural circumstances that tree would in due course die and fall and return the alkalinity to the ground. But when the forest is a plantation made by man and when the timber is cut and taken away, the forest ground is steadily rendered more acidic. This process has contributed to damage in forest areas and the water systems of those areas and must be borne in mind as a contributory factor.

A conclusion to draw at this stage is that almost all environmental arguments, when we consider the best interests of the ecology of these islands, seem to converge on a preference for the broad leaf deciduous tree and not for the economically easier conifer tree. All the best interests of our countryside and wildlife—and, in this case, of toxicity and acidity—lead to the deciduous tree being the preferred tree in our natural environment.

The lessons for the automotive engineers are clear enough. Much publicity has recently been given to prototype electric cars. The simple fact is that until there is a vast breakthrough in the technology of electrical energy storage or portable energy storage we shall not have realistically in Britain the main automotive carriage of people and goods accomplished electrically. For the time being at any rate—until there is a step change in the technology of electricity storage — we shall have the internal combusion engine as our servant on the road.

Improvements in the oxides of nitrogen emissions from motor cars all seem to argue for the lean burn engine rather than for the much more complex and often less reliable chemistry of the catalysts, which are preferred by some but which I believe are not the better conclusion.

There are some important lessons for the generators of energy. I was surprised throughout the hearings which led to the report — I too had the privilege of being a member of the Select Committee—that the CEGB did not take an altogether neutral and detached attitude. The CEGB could have told the politicians, "Tell us by what extent, as you speak on behalf of society generally, you would like us to reduce SO_2 emissions, in particular from our coal burn. If you tell us by what amount you want us to reduce it, we will tell you how much it will cost and you can then decide whether you are prepared to pay". That would have been a cogent position for the CEGB to have taken and I remain surprised that it did not take it.

Whoever should learn lessons from the consideration of this subject and from the report—I have enumerated four—it is certain that those who will truly derive comfort and support from all the deliberations now going on are the adherents of those arguments that say that increasing priority should be given to generating electricity by nuclear means and that less priority will have to be given to generating electricity by burning an extremely valuable mineral, namely coal.

12.4 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I join the hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) in commending the development of lean burn engines rather than the catalyst as a method of reducing nitrogen oxide. I am sure that lean burn engines are the right way to proceed. I join the hon. Members for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) and for South Shields (Dr. Clark) in urging the need for the greater development of flue gas desulphurisation equipment because of both the beneficial impact on the environment of doing that and because of the opportunity for creating new jobs that would result.

The Minister said that there was little evidence about the destruction of tree life in Scandinavia. In paragraph 70*(b)* of the Select Committee report, we refer to the experience that the Select Committee had in Scandinavia:

"A survey of all 12 counties in south and central Sweden in the winter of 1983 reported 244 damaged stands of trees. A sample survey since has extrapolated a damage area of 17-18 per cent."

That evidence was further underlined by Professor Tamm, whom we met during our inquiries. He and his father before him have been involved in monitoring the effects of acidity on the soil and on forests since 1927. They have expressed deep concern about the mounting evidence of the effects of acid rain on trees in Scandinavia.

The Minister referred to the costs involved in tackling the problem and said that £1·5 billion was a lot of money. However, as hon. Members have pointed out, that would be spread over 10 years. When the British people were asked in a MORI survey two years ago about the cost of tackling pollution, 56 per cent. replied that they would be prepared to pay an extra penny in the pound on income tax if that would result in a reduction in pollution. We would be asking them to do much less than that. We are speaking of a small increase in electricity prices.

The Minister also made great play with the 40 per cent. fall in emissions and seemed to suggest that this and preceding Governments had done a great job in reducing emissions by that amount. In fact, the reduction has occurred mainly because of deindustrialisation, massive unemployment and the closure of factories and smelters —in other words, because of what has happened to our economy — rather than as the result of a positive programme on the part of Government.

While this debate has been in progress, a meeting has been held elsewhere in this building by Greenpeace, whose members have been expressing the need for a co-ordinated attack by the European countries on the problem of acid rain, and they have today presented a petition signed by parliamentarians from nine countries. My hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), who has now returned from that meeting to his place, tells me that many people there pointed out that unless urgent action was taken trees, lakes and buildings would be damaged beyond recall.

With my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who speaks for the Liberal party on environmental matters, I met the former Swedish Liberal Minister for the Environment. This was during our assembly this year in Bournemouth, at which we debated acid rain. He underlined to us the fears of his countrymen and pointed out the dangers to international relations, and in particular to Anglo-Scandinavian relations, if urgent action was not taken to deal with acid rain.

In my six years in this House I do not recall being involved in a more rewarding piece of work than this inquiry into acid rain. It was rewarding for several reasons. For example, not only was a thorough and intense report produced, but the inquiry was personally enlightening. The final report is well researched and competent. Much of the credit for that must go to our Chairman, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), who was a hard taskmaster, and to our scientific advisers, to whom reference has been made. I wish also to pay tribute to the work of the clerks, particularly Mr. Andre Gren, who is recovering from a serious road accident. His work made our task much easier.

As the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) said, all the members of the Select Committee approached the inquiry with their own views and sometimes their own prejudices. However, we were able to reach unanimous conclusions on what must be done to tackle the environmental catastrophe that is referred to, perhaps sometimes misleadingly, as acid rain. Such cross-party consensus and co-operation is rare in this place and when it occurs it is welcome and rewarding.

My only disappointment concerns the Government's cavalier response to the most important of the Select Committees' findings and proposals. It is not good enough for the Under-Secretary of State and others to talk about 17 of the 19 recommendations and proposals having been accepted, when the two most crucial recommendations were rejected out of hand. It is cold comfort to be told that many of our conclusions have been endorsed, when the central recommendations have been repudiated.

In a nutshell, the Select Committee asked itself what was the major cause of acid rain, who was the main culprit and what could be done to minimise the appalling damage that is being inflicted on our forests, lakes and buildings. The Committee put most of the blame at the door of the Central Electricity Generating Board. It identified its emissions of sulphur and nitrogen dioxide as a major factor. It recommended a series of measures designed to reduce emission and to clean up the atmosphere. It said that the Government should join immediately the 30 per cent. club of nations, which has already committed itself to reduce its emissions by one third. It asked for a commitment to the EC draft directive, which seeks a reduction in emissions of 60 per cent. by 1995.

These two recommendations were the guts of our conclusions and they are the two which the Government have rejected. In doing so, the Government have forgone the right to describe themselves as an Adminstration who are concerned about the environment or the quality of life. Instead, they will earn themselves a place in the history books as a Government of cushy complacency. Their decision to delay will lead to irreversible damage and they will be judged as lacking responsibility and wisdom. In the case of this Government, how true are the words of William Blake, who wrote:

"A fool sees not the same tree that a wise man sees."

A wise man or a wise Government would not have said complacently that he or they would await more research. Nor would they have relied on the specious argument of an interested party. A wise man would have invested in an insurance policy at the very least. Instead, the Government have allowed themselves to be wooed by Sir Walter Marshall and Peter Chester of the CEGB. The board's propaganda machine has been working at full capacity to disseminate disinformation. In the process, it has conned the Government.

That is to take a kind view. An unkinder view is that, as an appointee of the Prime Minister, Sir Walter was only too anxious to say the things that his mistress bid him say. Either way, the outcome amounts to much the same thing. The CEGB has been able to avoid the cost of tackling the problem of acid rain and the Government have been able to avoid a major public works programme. In the meantime, the environment continues to be poisoned.

In contrast with Her Majesty's Government and the CEGB, the members of the Select Committee, myself included, believed by the time that our inquiries and research had been completed that there was no doubt that introgen oxide and SO_2 lay at the heart of the problems. I recall vividly — perhaps this is the factor that convinced me more than anything else—the depressing walk that the members of the Committee took in Germany's Black forest. It was there that we saw evidence with our own eyes that convinced us that urgent action was needed. We saw that nearly every fir is diseased. Officials in the state of Baden-Wurtenberg told us that half the trees in the Black forest were diseased beyond recall. For any of us who had lingering doubts about the catastrophic effects of acid rain, the Black forest underlined the need for urgent and co-ordinated European action.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): How does the hon. Gentleman explain that the level of sulphuric acid fallout in the Black forest is lower than that in the Norwegian forests, which are thriving?

Mr. Alton: The hon. Gentleman has anticipated what I was about to say. He has given a good illustration of the complexity of the problem. Contributory factors, working together, cause acid rain, which is itself a generic term. Since the mid-1970s, the silver firs in the Black forest have been dying in their thousands. Since 1981, there has been a dramatic escalation, with spruce firs and deciduous trees also being affected. Even nursery saplings are withering.

Yet as long ago as 1972, at a specially convened conference in Stockholm, the impending disaster was predicted by scientists. However, Governments throughout Europe complacently stood by. Trees have died while the Government have recommended more research. Acid rain has been sweeping across central Europe's forests like a cyclone of death.

The psychological impact on a country such as Germany, where a third of the land is covered with woodland, is perhaps difficult for a Briton fully to appreciate. Sadly, only 8 per cent. of the United Kingdom remains as woodland. The forests are central to German culture and heritage, which makes the economic and ecological considerations even more mind-boggling. About 250,000 jobs in Baden-Wurtenberg alone depend upon forestry. In addition, the disappearance of trees will fundamentally alter the ecology of western Europe. The forests protect ground water and retain rainwater. They preserve the fertility of the soil and they provide protection against erosion. They purify the air and influence local climatic conditions. Wildlife depends on the forests for its survival.

It is obvious to even the most casual observer that for many of the trees it is already too late. A walk in the Black forest is like a walk in a graveyard. The skeletons of the trees that are already dead leave no room for scepticism about the seriousness of the situation.

The dangerous levels of European pollution are threatening our buildings as well as our trees. Here is a short tale of two cities. At the top of Cologne cathedral — Cologne is Liverpool's twin city — the chief stonemason described to the members of the Select Committee how 67 stonemasons are employed constantly in replacing corroded stone. He told us that some stone has been replaced four times in 20 years. That gives the lie to the view which others have proffered to the Minister that it is only medieval cathedrals or buildings that are being affected and that the effects are cumulative. Stone that has been in place for only 20 years is having to be replaced regularly in Cologne. The chief stonemason said that the cathedral will soon be a replica of a replica.

In Liverpool, the Anglican cathedral is facing a bill of hundreds of thousands of pounds to replace all the copper sheeting that covers the roof. The building of the cathedral started at the turn of the century and it has only recently been completed. The fact that the building is already in danger demonstrates how much of our heritage is at risk. Great buildings such as St. Paul's cathedral, the Palace of Westminster, Lincoln cathedral and York minster are being badly damaged as a result of acid rain. The dangers to our heritage are phenomenal.

A constituent of mine — Mr. John Hulton of Wavertree—put it well when he commented to me in a letter:

"Cleopatra's needle has suffered more erosion from London pollution in the past 80 years by the River Thames than in 3,000 by the Nile."

Connected with the problem of the effects of pollution is the question of cost. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State, or the Minister who is to reply, will say who is to meet the cost of putting right the damage, especially to our buildings. How can we go cap in hand to the European Community and claim to be good Europeans when we are turning our backs on its draft directive which asks for a 60 per cent. reduction in emissions?

Apart from the effects on trees and buildings, the members of the Select Committee saw horrifying evidence in Sweden that great damage is being done by acid rain to lakes and aquatic life. In southern Sweden, over 18,000 of 20,000 lakes have been acidified. According to the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, which has recently undertaken a study of the effects of acid rain and its implications for bird conservation,

"for the first time in Britain a connection has been shown between reduced bird populations and acidic run-off of water from certain upland areas."

The society's study was undertaken in Wales with the co-operation of the Welsh water authority. In its conclusions, which came too late to be submitted to the Select Committee, it states:

"The Government, in responding to the Select Committee, has so far only pledged to continue existing levels of research. This is quite inadequate."

Faced with all this evidence, the CEGB, aided and abetted by the Department of the Environment, has decided vaguely to aim for a reduction in emissions of 30 per cent. from 1980 levels by the end of the next decade. There will also be some more temporising research.

Faced with the same evidence as the CEGB, West Germany, by contrast, has plunged into a massive programme. Its Government have made available between 10 billion and 15 billion deutschmarks for filter equipment in power stations. The Japanese, as usual, have stolen a march on everybody else. Japan is the only country producing sophisticated environmental technology. However, German industry is now catching up fast. By 1988, German-made desulphurisation plants will be in position in three quarters of all German power stations, massively reducing emissions.

Preparations are now also in hand in Germany for the removal of nitrogen oxide. That work will involve planning, erection and construction, and, as the hon. Member for South Shields, (Dr. Clark) said, it will involve the creation of thousands of jobs. No doubt that is heresy in the view of this Government, but it would be spending to social advantage, not just digging holes and filling them up again, as is so often the case with the job creation programmes and youth training schemes, and the other irrelevances on which the Government spend money.

The German Government are also taking urgent action to introduce lead-free petrol. That will be compulsory by January 1986. We have simply announced our intention to travel the same road by the end of the decade. We are falling hopelessly behind. The Government are now showing all the hallmarks of an insular and xenophobic Government. It is all summed up in the attitude of some of the more hard-line Conservative Members who seem to believe in the philosophy of do unto others before they do you.

British scientists have been haggling and arguing about conflicting theories. Meanwhile, Germany has acted to reduce pollution regardless of whether it is the sole cause of forests dying. It is irrelevant whether it is all the fault of SO_2 or nitrogen oxide. The fact is that we should be tackling the problem of emissions now.

Unilateral action by Germany or any other country in tackling air pollution will never be enough. Only 50 per cent. of their pollution is home grown; the rest is imported from neighbouring states. Pollutants know no frontiers and observe no customs posts. The Black Forest receives more pollutants from foreign sources than from internally generated emissions — 32 per cent. from the German Federal Republic, 32 per cent. from France, and the rest from countries such as Czechoslovakia, the Netherlands and Britain. German scientists told us that pollution of the air in Czechoslovakia has become so bad that children had to be evacuated from one border area to a spa town for recuperation.

Clearly, a concerted European approach — East and West — to the problem is needed. Britain, as the largest emitter of SO_2, must take the problem particularly seriously. Britain also needs a Department of the Environment which has a commitment to safeguarding our heritage and environment. It should be separate from the rambling empire of the present Department, which is really only a Ministry for housing and local government — or should I say the abolition of local government? Such a Department should seek to champion an improvement in the quality of life, not become a defender of the status quo. In its present form, the Department is a willing accomplice and a fellow conspirator with those responsible for this calamity.

Acid rain is part of the environmental catastrophe facing the world. There are others. For instance, one in 10 of the estimated 250,000 different plant species are said to be rare or threatened; 320 species of mammal are in extreme danger of extinction, and so are 400 species of bird. Forests are disappearing from the humid tropics in Africa, Asia and Latin America at a rate of 11 million hectares a year. Great monuments such as the Acropolis are disintegrating through the effects of man-made pollutants.

Today the House should simply try to imagine a forest where half the trees are dead or dying, lakes that are so badly polluted that fish can no longer survive, or great buildings that have survived the pillage of sackings and war which are now crumbling from the effects of pollution. We should simply imagine all that and worse and then ask what kind of a country it is and what kind of values allow that kind of grisly fantasy to become a nightmare reality.

Mr. T. H. H. Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I have just heard an extremely alarmist speech and one that seems to believe in solving problems simply by throwing money at them in the hope that some will be solved. It may be that after money has been thrown at the problems none will be solved.

I must congratulate all the members of the Select Committee on the work that they put into their report and the conclusions that they drew. It is a good thing that at least 17 recommendations have been accepted. The recommendation that I quarrel with is probably that with which the Government quarrel, too, which is contained in paragraphs 196 and 197. It deals with the EEC proposal for a 60:40:40 ratio.

The EEC draft does not call for an overall national reduction of 60 per cent., but for a reduction from large combustion plants of 15 mW and over. Exactly what is the Committee referring to? Is it talking about an overall reduction, or is it calling on the CEGB virtually to reduce the lot? If so, it could be extremely costly for the CEGB over the years and extremely costly both for industrial and domestic purchasers of electricity in the United Kingdom.

It has been said, rightly, that the factors involved here are a combination of sulphur dioxide, nitrogen oxide, hydrocarbons, ozone and many others. The report rightly says that until further examinations have taken place the real cause will not be known and that much additional research will be required.

One of the conclusions that I have reached is that the Select Committee, in coming to its conclusions in paragraphs 196 and 197, has not taken into account the facts that have been adduced by the evidence before the

[Mr. T. H. H. Skeet]

Committee. For example, let me refer to the good work of my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman). In paragraph 585 he says:

"If that is right, and I know you have got to cover yourselves, am I right in saying that the problem that Germany faces with its trees, and Scandinavia, will not in any way be alleviated by de-sulphurisation programmes?"

Professor Last, speaking on behalf of the Natural Environment Research Council, said:

"I have to give a guarded answer in that I believe that the answer is probably no, it will not be helped".

That serves to answer the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) who talked about the state of forests in western Germany. It is not sulphur dioxide by itself which is the problem.

In paragraph 586 Dr. Miller said:

"if they were to remove sulphur from the atmosphere, the German trees would still die."

It is extraordinary that members of the Select Committee, who studied the evidence extremely carefully, did not come to the conclusion which was in evidence. I am referring to the evidence given by representatives of the NERC because the Select Committee says that that is independent evidence from people who have no axe to grind. Dr. Bowman also says:

"The major manifestation of damage to the forests occurred in Germany and we have said that we believe that it is mainly on ozone problems."

In paragraph 463, Dr. Binns of the Forestry Commission refers to that, saying that he did not see any great damage occurring in the United Kingdom as yet. It is an extremely complicated problem which must be properly worked out.

Mr. Chapman: I accept my hon. Friend's quotations, but he will find that we concluded that long-range sulphur dioxide was not the principal cause of damage and destruction to trees, although it was responsible for the destruction of fish in Scandinavia. We stressed that there were different forms of pollutant and that we believed that ozone was the principal cause of the 58 per cent. damage to trees in the Black Forest, some of which we saw. My hon. Friend has quoted Professor Last whom I know well and respect deeply, but we also took evidence from other distinguished scientists in this and other countries.

Mr. Skeet: I am obliged to my hon. Friend. Paragraph 84 of the report indeed refers to ozone. But if the Committee had considered this aspect carefully it would not have jumped to the conclusion in paragraphs 196 and 197 calling for a 60 per cent. reduction, which would be extremely onerous for the United Kingdom.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), who opened the debate with an extremely good speech, referred to the effect of sulphur dioxide on concrete. Paragraph 240 may have escaped my hon. Friend's attention. In that paragraph Dr. Everett stated:

"The damage done to concrete from the SO_2 levels in the environment is very little, because the SO_2 that gets into concrete is tied up very quickly to form a compound called Ettringite which is insoluble in concrete, and once it is formed the SO_2 plays no further part."

Many people in this country are concerned about our heritage, much of which is built with concrete or limestone. But limestone takes many forms. Sulphur dioxide has little effect on hard limestone but soft limestone may well be destroyed over the years. Despite the commissioning of the three Trentside power stations at High Marnham, West Burton and Cottam, sulphur dioxide levels in Lincoln have fallen steadily. The levels in Lincoln in 1970 were three times the levels around those stations, as Dr. Gerald Gibbs points out.

I am not saying that there has not been destruction by sulphur dioxide or acid rain. That may have started the damage, which may now be continuing because other plants are producing other corrosive substances. For instance, power generation in London has almost ceased. Sulphur dioxide emissions have fallen from 55,000 tonnes in 1975 to 3,000 tonnes in 1983 without any reduction in the rate of corrosion. It is extraordinary that, despite the abatement of sulphur dioxide emissions, corrosion has increased in some areas. We heard in an earlier debate that tall chimney stacks were adopted to reduce urban concentrations of pollutants, but that the emission of sulphur dioxide at great velocity into the higher atmosphere transported the pollution abroad. If there was so much damage in Scandinavia as a result, there should be less damage in the United Kingdom. Indeed, that was part of the tall-stack policy, to prevent urban concentrations.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Does not that account for the greatly increased acid rain damage in Scandinavia?

Mr. Skeet: Yes, but only 2·1 per cent. of the sulphur dioxide leaving the United Kingdom actually falls on Norway, to be added to the large amount of indigenous sulphur dioxide already there. We need to know what chemical changes take place in the atmosphere in transit between the United Kingdom and Norway. The sulphur dioxide may be transformed by ozone and hydrocarbons in such a way as to produce other effects. After careful thought, I have come to the conclusion that in coming years rather more research is required than the type of research now being carried out.

The problems of Scandinavia are of the greatest interest to us. There are two ways of approaching them. We could reduce our emission of sulphur dioxide. According to the Watt committee, to reduce sulphur deposited in Norway by one ton Britain would have to reduce its output by 46 tons but Norway would have to reduce its emissions by only two tons. Should we not therefore call upon Norway to make a bigger contribution than we do? Hon. Members have all talked about the comity of nations and about relations between the two countries, and I fully understand what has been said. However, we should try to measure the relative burdens of both countries.

My hon. Friend the Minister has told us that since 1970 the amount of sulphur dioxide emitted in the United Kingdom has fallen by 37 per cent. He did not say what the reasons were. However, if emissions have been reduced here, their effect on Norway must have been reduced too. In that case, how is it that the amount of corrosion there and the acidity of the lakes have increased? Other factors may be involved that we do not understand. The Government may be right to say that there should be broader research before we spring to conclusions and cast money in all directions.

We are endeavouring to find a cure for cancer, but many of the charities that exist in order to collect money for that purpose cannot find suitable projects to spend it on, because the leads are not available. Throwing money at a problem may not produce results. What is required is an effective lead.

I am no friend of sulphur dioxide or of nitrogen oxide. Something must be done. However, I am probably a better friend to the miners in Britain, who want us to use a little more coal, than some Opposition Members who are creating further difficulties for their brethren.

We must consider the possible consequences of pursuing the recommendations of the Select Committee. The major recommendation has wisely been rejected by the Government. It would affect the quantity and quality of coal burnt in the United Kingdom and ultimately have implications for the refiners of high sulphur crudes imported into the United Kingdom. It would involve the industry in the use of expensive technology immediately, at considerable cost to the consumers of electricity. The Liberals are quite prepared to forget the consumers, but I think that their views should be put forward in the House.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Skeet: Yes, in a moment.

There would also be further environmental problems connected with the disposal of waste products. Comparisons between the United Kingdom and the Continent are of dubious value. Trees on the Continent are subject to different stresses from those in the United Kingdom, because of different meteorological conditions. Furthermore, because of the long lead-time involved, it is not feasible to switch to the increased use of nuclear power.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that one can anticipate the environmental consequences of a policy by making sure that there is an assessment of environmental impact before rather than after the event? The assessment is then available for debate. It may be too late now to deal with problems that are the legacy of the fact that, in the past 20 years, Governments have paid inadequate attention to the environment.

Mr. Skeet: No, the hon. Gentleman is wrong. There has been a reduction of 37 per cent. since 1970, and we contemplate another 30 per cent. reduction in the coming years. Much of the destruction to which the hon. Gentleman refers is historic and dates from a time when conditions were extremely difficult.

The hon. Gentleman is unaware that there has been a considerable switch from coal and a restructuring of manufacturing industry which has retired some of the heavy and dirty users of coal. More nuclear-generated electricity is used—17 per cent. of the total—and more natural gas is used in the domestic sector. All of those factors are being overlooked. The hon. Gentleman is jumping to conclusions when the problem is imperfectly understood. The CEGB has brought in Northern Engineering Industries Ltd. to help it with some problems, much research is being undertaken and there have been many major reports. There have been countless reports, such as the Watt report, which I dare say the hon. Gentleman has read. If he had read them and the evidence in the Select Committee report, he would have come to a rather different conclusion.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I must have one more go at the hon. Gentleman. Is he trying to rewrite history and say that energy generation has been transferred to the nuclear sector for environmental reasons — that is clearly not true—or that the principal reason for the improvement in Britain is the decline in our industrial base, which started higher than anywhere else in Europe because of the industrial revolution? That is an accepted fact and does not result from the Government's awareness of environmental issues. The hon. Gentleman cannot adduce those developments as reasons for changes in our economic or energy circumstances.

Mr. Skeet: The hon. Gentleman is merely repeating himself and I have already answered him. I should be only too pleased to argue with him at full length outside the Chamber.

The production of sulphur dioxide is not proportionate to the deposition of sulphur. That was carefully shown by Dr. Holdgate in his evidence. Unless sulphur dioxide is attended by nitrogen oxide and hydrocarbons, there will not necessarily be the depositions, either wet or dry, which cause the destruction complained of.

I should like to consider two processes which have been referred to. The first is pressurised fluidised bed combustion. I am a great supporter of it. It is being operated by the National Coal Board at Selby and has been active in several manufacturing plants, but there are difficulties in scaling it up for a full power station. However, a new technology brings in further problems. A 2,000 mW pressurised fluidised bed combustion station consuming 5 million tonnes of coal at 2 per cent. sulphur content per annum would require between 1·09 million tonnes and 1·28 million tonnes of limestone per annum as compared with a gypsum flue gas desulphurisation project of only 320,000 tonnes to achieve a similar removal of sulphur dioxide.

It is clear, therefore, that there is an environmental problem of some magnitude in disposing of the waste. What are we to do with all of the calcium sulphate that cannot be used on the market? I have said that I do not expect to find a full sized fluidised bed combustion plant in operation before the year 2000 because the Grimethorpe reactor has erosion problems in its tube banks and is having difficulty with its turbine blades.

There is a considerable chlorine element in British coal which causes corrosion problems.

Mr. Hardy: There is an earlier opportunity for the fluidised bed as there is considerable and proper pressure on the Government for the development of combined heat and power for district heating. Many right hon. and hon. Members believe that such schemes should proceed urgently. There is no technological problem to their development on the basis of fluidised bed. Does the hon. Gentleman agree?

Mr. Skeet: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman raised that point. The Government are considering the number of schemes available, but until heat loads have built up the operators will probably start on an oil-fired operation and eventually transfer the system to a power station. One is looking years ahead, not for immediate solutions. I think that the schemes are good. They exist in Scandinavia, Germany and elsewhere, but we have few examples of them in the United Kingdom.

I turn to flue gas desulphurisation which takes place after combustion. Processes are available, such as the Wellman-Lord process. However, again we are faced with a high effluent. Limestone is used to a lesser extent than in the AD2000 programme. The sludge will have to be disposed of. Caustic soda is used, and sodium sulphate will have to be dumped. Calcium chloride will have to be disposed of in some way. Moreover, the consequential problems to the environment which are created by the new methods are not as easy to solve as some hon. Members suggest.

We have not solved the major problems that we face. The Minister is right to resist the proposal of the Select Committee that he should go ahead with an untargeted programme and reduce sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxide. It is perfectly right that he should accept all the other recommendations and go ahead with monitoring arrangements to find out the concentrations of SO_2 and nitrogen oxide and, through research, where the real causes lie. But he should not be panicked into spending billions of pounds now on something which may not be satisfactory over time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Before I call the next hon. Member to speak, I should draw attention to the fact that about 10 hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye. Unless speeches are briefer, one or two hon. Members will be disappointed.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): I shall take up some points raised by the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet), who sounded like the hon. Member for the Central Electricity Generating Board. As a Labour Member of the Select Committee, I add my voice to the tributes paid to our technical advisers, the Clerks who served our Committee, the way in which the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) chaired the Committee, and the way in which we managed to change a Committee of sceptics into an all-party Committee committed to action to reduce the problem of acid rain.

It was not a difficult task to reach a unanimous conclusion and not to be separated by party political barriers. The weight of evidence in Germany, Scandinavia and the United Kingdom was overwhelmingly that action was needed quickly if we were not to continue to pollute Scandinavia, West Germany and other parts of western Europe, and if we in the United Kingdom were not to suffer in the sort of crisis that has occurred in central Europe and Scandinavia. We should learn from what has happened there and take action before it is too late.

The hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North will regret many of his words when that area starts to suffer from pollution. The one argument which he, the Minister and the CEGB produced in favour of inaction was that further research was needed. They seek to throw money at the problem. I shall deal with cost shortly. They want conclusive proof provided scientifically. They want a linear correlation between a reduction in sulphur in one place and a reduction in damage by pollution in another. If they want that before they act, they will never act, because they will never get that evidence. It is impossible to produce such evidence.

The hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North, the Minister and the CEGB, including its scientist Mr. Peter Chester, purposely ignored the fact that such pollution is cumulative. It builds up over many years. Even if we reduced emissions today, pollution would continue tomorrow and would become worse by next year, because we would still be emitting sulphur and nitrogen which would be added to the pollutants already in the atmosphere.

In Scandinavia, pollutants emitted at a low level—they have been reduced—during an entire winter build up in the snow. When the snow melts, the accumulated acidity destroys the fish and eggs in lakes and rivers. In Germany, we saw the results of research which had been conducted on cross-sections of trees and on soils, which showed the cumulative build-up of acidification.

From what the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North said, one would believe that the sulphur emitted from our power stations does us good and that it is not really a problem. It used to pollute the atmosphere, vegetation and lakes, but we built the high stacks to take care of that. Why did we do that if the emissions are not harmful? We did it to disperse the emissions into the atmosphere. As a consequence of that policy, the sulphur is being exported to Germany and Scandinavia, but it is still landing in Britain, and it will remain a problem in Britain. As hon. Members said, Britain is fortunate in that few emissions from other countries fall on our land. We are responsible for our pollution, but as it increases—there are signs of it already in Cumbria, Scotland and other parts of the country—we shall face difficulties similar to those in other countries.

The arguments are similar to those used when we first discussed the possibility of smoking causing lung cancer. People said, "We want conclusive scientific evidence," but that has not been produced to this day. We still do not know what causes cancer, but we accept that cigarette smoking contributes significantly to the problem. That is exactly the sort of evidence, in terms of statistics, correlations and research, that we have about sulphur and nitrogen damaging the environment. If we do not take action now, it will be too late for the British environment. The smoking patient—our environment—will be dead.

No cost-benefit analysis can show conclusively that if we reduce sulphur emissions crop yields will increase. It would be extremely difficult, in the period during which research would be necessary, to assess the effects of sulphur and nitrogen emissions on crop yield. However, the National Farmers Union and others have said that there is no doubt that there is a reduction. Research shows that there are problems with crop yield and the corrosion of metals. Research has not yet been conducted on human health, but must we wait until a child is killed on a road before we install a zebra crossing——

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman is getting a little carried away. The problem with health is not that the solution of heavy metals in water is not well understood—it is recognised as a danger—but that the acidity of water derived from deposition as a contribution to that problem is so minimal as to be far less important that other sources.

Mr. Roberts: There is some dispute about that. I accept the Minister's statement that acidification from emissions of sulphur and nitrogen into the atmosphere is only one factor. In its report the Committee did not fall into the trap, as Sir Walter Marshall accused us of doing, of saying that all pollution is caused by sulphur emitted from Britain's power stations. There is a combination of complicated factors. Equally, to suggest that we do not know whether any significant benefit would accrue from reducing sulphur and nitrogen emissions from power stations is to mislead the nation and the House. However, that is what the CEGB tried to do when it gave evidence to the Select Committee, and through its public statements and press releases.

Mr. Alton: I agree with everything that the hon. Gentleman is saying. To underline the point, is it not the case that everybody is out of step but ourselves? Why cannot this country recognise what the countries in the 30 per cent. club have recognised, as have other countries in Europe which recognise and support the EEC draft directive, which is that it must be good for the health of our citizens to take urgent action now?

Mr. Roberts: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. We were at one on the Committee, and I am at one with him in what he has just said.

I hope that what I say in simple terms about acid rain is not misunderstood. After listening to the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North, one would think that the CEGB did not emit nitrogen dioxide from its power stations, which the retrofitting of the power stations would deal with. I shall deal with the pressurised fluid bed combustion system and with the retrofitting of power stations.

Acid rain is created by the emissions of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen dioxide when either coal or oil is burnt in power stations, industry or motor cars. The generally accepted contribution of each to the acidity of our rain is that 70 per cent. of the pollution is caused by the sulphur dioxide and 30 per cent. by the nitrogen oxide. The United Kingdom is western Europe's largest producer of sulphur dioxide. We emit one fifth of the region's 20 million tonnes per year. Historically, we have always been the leading European polluter. In 1970 we were producing almost one third of west Europe's SO_2 because of our dependence on coal and oil and our refusal to clean emissions.

As a result of North sea gas, the recession and several other factors, there has been a reduction in our emissions, but that has not come about as a result of action or positive decision by the Government, the CEGB or industry. Although we have reduced our emissions by the amount that is claimed by the Government, we are still the largest polluter in western Europe and probably emit more than anybody else except the Soviet Union. Research and political pressure in Europe have led to action and the consequences that we have seen in our environment. There is a need for action here, but we stand isolated.

Countries in the EEC—France, West Germany, the Netherlands, Italy, Belgium, Denmark and Luxembourg — and in Europe outside the EEC — Austria, Switzerland, Sweden, Norway and Finland—have all taken the action which the British Government refused to take, and have done so on the same scientific evidence that is before the British Government and the Select Committee. The Select Committee made recommendations hoping that the Government would look at the evidence objectively and become good Europeans and good internationalists.

At one stage the Government were on the verge of taking the necessary action and wondered what to do. The Prime Minister was under pressure from the West German Chancellor and others in the EEC, so she called a meeting at Chequers to consider the issue. Along came Sir Walter Marshall and Peter Chester, among others, and the result was catastrophic. It was probably the dirtiest dirty weekend in history. They came to the conclusion that no action should be taken and that public expenditure was not justified because they agreed with what the CEGB said then, and what the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North has been saying this morning.

That decision was not only wrong, but politically inept, because it would be relatively cheap to join the 30 per cent. club, as the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) said. The sum of £1·5 billion spread over 10 years represents a farthing a day on the average electricity bill of £200 a year. That would mean a bill of £201 a year instead of £200 a year.

Mr. Skeet: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to save money to make it available for scientific research, will he consider the fact that if the miners' strike had not happened we could have saved ourselves, in Scargill's estimate, £5 billion? That money could have been used for this purpose.

Mr. Roberts: I am in favour of a negotiated end to the dispute. I hope that what the hon. Gentleman says about the cost of the dispute is heard by the Secretary of State for Energy, the Prime Minister and the chairman of the NCB. Perhaps we could then get round the conference table.

When the hon. Gentleman spoke in the debate, he mentioned his so-called support—while attacking coal and wanting it to remain dirty—for the miners, the NUM and the coal industry. I do not think that we want that sort of support. He and other Conservative Members mentioned the alternative of nuclear energy, which is an important issue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard) attended a fringe meeting during the Labour party conference. She heard the first speaker, Mr. Peter Heathfield, but left before the second speaker—myself—was able to reply. I am not surprised that she formed the wrong view of the position when she spoke to the party conference. I do not believe for one minute that it is in the interests of the coal industry, the NUM or the miners to allow coal to be burnt in a way that pollutes the atmosphere.

In 1982, 14 per cent. of our energy was supplied by nuclear power and the remainder by coal. During the strike, of course, the remainder has been supplied by coal and expensive oil. We are led to believe, through leak and innuendo, that the Government want to expand the nuclear base to 33 per cent. I believe that the closure of pits has something to do with that, as has the Government's and the CEGB's response to the Select Committee report. If the miners cannot strike because nuclear energy is providing the bulk of our electricity, that will make the problem easier for the Government. Expansion depends on the completion of the Sizewell inquiry. In the meantime, the Government are happy to have coal stigmatised as an acid rain producer.

Mr. Waldegrave: That is not a fair point. The hon. Gentleman's views are not shared by the fuel and power committee of the TUC, which wrote to the Secretary of State for Energy saying that, although it was indeed a serious problem, more research was needed and that specific emission limits were probably not yet in order. Therefore, the matter is not quite as simple as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Roberts: I have disagreed with the TUC before, and no doubt will do so again. Similarly, I have disagreed with the NUM, and will do so again. On this matter, the TUC is misguided. I do not put the responsibility for this Machiavellian approach of wanting to develop nuclear power and not to take action on acid rain at the door of the Department of the Environment or the Minister, but at the door of the CEGB, the Department of Energy, Sir Walter Marshall and, perhaps, the Prime Minister. If we act now to prevent acid rain pollution, there will be no justification to move further towards nuclear power on the ground that coal-fired power stations are begining to destroy the environment.

Another issue is involved. The NCB wants to develop super-pits in the midlands using computerised machinery to minimise labour costs. If that happens, there will be a large-scale closure programme in Scotland, Wales and the north-east and the coal reserves will be sterilised. We will never again get hold of those reserves, because the pits will have been closed. If the United Kingdom joins the 30 per cent. club, that will reduce SO_2 emissions by installing the filters necessary in the coal-burning power stations. That may be too expensive for smaller industries, which will have to use coal with a lower sulphur content. The Welsh and Scottish coalfields produce more coal with a lower suphur content than any other area in the United Kingdom.

Clean coal means that the whole basis on which the economic or uneconomic pit is assessed will alter, and that is very important. It is not those who are advocating the retrofitting of power stations and the production of coal so that it does not create acid rain who are attacking the coal mining industry and the NUM; it is those who take the opposite view who are doing so. If the Government and the CEGB plan an expansion of nuclear energy, jobs will go not only at power stations but in the coal mining communities.

The fluidised bed combustion system which is being developed, and which I hope will continue to be developed, if successful, could be put into new power stations. Even if it is developed to the full, it cannot economically be put into existing power stations. Therefore, there must be flue gas desulphurisation. That is what the Select Committee recommended for all our large power stations. By doing so, without turning to the small industries such as cement and gas, we could achieve the 60 per cent. reduction and fall in line with the EEC directive. We could certainly join the 30 per cent. club.

A question raised by the Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green, was not answered by the Minister. How do the Government envisage achieving the broad policy aim of a 30 per cent. reduction in notional SO_2 emissions from 1980 levels by the late 1990s? The Government do not tell us in their response to the report. They do not explain exactly how they will implement their policies. They should do so quickly.

The Government's approach is "We do not know. We need more research. It is not proven. If we spend the money, perhaps that will not result in saving the environment." That is an excuse, a cover and a blank. The Government have accepted the recommendations which do not cost anything. The ones that required expenditure were rejected. The environment in Britain will suffer as a result and the cost to the community, private individuals, the public purse and Britain's reputation in the world will be tremendous. The sum of £1·5 million over 10 years, a farthing a day increase in electricity costs for the average household, will be considered a small price to pay when the cost of the damage of not taking action now is assessed in a few years' time.

1.7 pm

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) on his speech, and all the members on the Committee on their report. I endorse much of what was said by my hon. Friend the Minister, in the sense that he was right to remind the House that over many years the United Kingdom, and this Government in particular, has had quite a good record of achievement in combating the problems of pollution. It is not perfect, but it is quite good. One has only to look at the decision to take lead out of petrol by the early 1990s, the gradual and welcome implementation of part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 and the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 to see that, though not a complete agenda of progress in dealing with pollution, none the less the Government have a solid record behind them.

I believe, as do many of my hon. Friends, that the party of which I am a member and the Government whom I support can and should do more, and should do better and act more urgently. I have one comment on what my hon. Friend the Minister said when he talked about the need to wait for a more convincing cost-benefit model to decide the balance between the economic costs of certain forms of action and the environmental benefits. If the Government wait until such a virgin and youthful model is forthcoming, they may wait too long. There are preferable ways forward, to which I shall refer.

"Acid deposition", as it is more correctly described, has become, whether we wish it or not, a litmus test of the Government's good faith in dealing with air pollution. It may not be admirable that that is so, but it is the politcal reality. Limiting air pollution must be the next main area of environmental progress by this country.

It was reassuring to read in paragraph 1.2 of the Government's reply:

"The United Kingdom believes in the principle of good neighbourliness".

I hope that our friends and partners on the Continent will take that as a sincere statement.

Equally, it is good to learn that the Government, as they said in paragraph 1.3,

"will, however, continue to encourage the development of new technologies" to deal with some of these problems of pollution. All that is to the good, and I am glad that it is on the record, but there are a number of worries that arise about that broad statement which need to be underlined. I have one or two worries of a kind which need to be spelt out a little.

First, do the Government define what they choose to call

"environmentally effective and economically feasible policies" in a way which means something, or is it just vacuous language? I hope that it is not the latter, because, clearly, if we are talking about environmental policy, we want something that is effective and economically feasible; we do not want the cost grossly to outweigh the environmental benefits. I am prepared to give the Government the benefit of the doubt on those points, but more evidence is needed to substantiate the Government's position.

Secondly, if the United Kingdom is making such good progress, as my hon. Friend the Minister said, with the reduction of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxide emissions, why is it not possible—I ask this in all innocence—for us to join the 30 per cent. club, which, after all, is an objective which has 1993 attached to it—some little time away—when it seems that we should probably be qualified to join that club at least on terms comparable with those of some of the other nations by that stage as a result of the progress that we are making in parallel and independently of any such commitment?

Thirdly, and this is the point that I wish to stress most, surely the best way for the Government to encourage the development of the relevant technologies, which is an important part of the limitation of power station emissions, would be to follow the recommendation of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution in paragraph 5.96 of its report, which is relevant to today's discussion. It said that certain of the technological options already available should be tested on an experimental basis on a couple of our large, new coal-fired stations for a trial period over the following five years to see which works best.

That would not involve the CEGB in extensive and costly retrofitting for all its existing coal-fired stations; nor would it prejudge the outcome of further scientific and technological progress which may be made. It would be more than just a token of the Government's good faith. It would enhance the Government's credibility in the eyes of the public, and especially in the eyes of our partners on the Continent. I am thinking of the Germans and Scandinavians. I hope that the Government will be able to respond positively, if not today, in the near future, to that point in the Royal Commission's report.

There are one or two small tangential points which I should like to mention briefly. I welcome the Government's positive response to the Select Committee's recommendations on air pollution monitoring. We shall never control and limit air pollution from any source adequately if our data base and monitoring facilities are inadequate. Much of the Government's approach over the years has relied on what we choose to call the "best practicable means". That sounds sensible, and allegedly it can do more to protect the environment than legally enforceable maximum limits, which is more the continental or American approach to such problems.

If we are to sustain that position, which is almost a theological one in British government, we must be able to point to instances where our approach has enabled us to do better than the alternative method of dealing with those matters. It would be useful for the House and some of our more dubious continental partners if, at the end of the debate, or on another occasion, the Minister could provide some useful and convincing examples of where our approach of the "best practicable means" has led to better results than the more legalistic continental approach.

Paragraph 3.65 of the Government's response appears to some of my hon. Friends to be a little negative and paradoxical in view of the Government's stated intention to achieve a 30 per cent. reduction in sulphur dioxide emissions by the end of the 1990s, compared with the 30 per cent. reduction by 1993 of the 30 per cent. club. Is the real reason for this discrepancy that the CEGB is now confident of having its new and better combustion technologies beginning to work by the end of the 1990s rather than by the early 1990s? That would seem a plausible explanation for the discrepancy between the two dates.

If agreement with our Community partners can be reduced to a reasonably simple and minimal area of disagreement, it is surely worth considering whether our policy is absolutely right. Perhaps it boils down to a seven-year difference in target date, to a methodological difference between the best practical means and legal maxima, to the problem of there being a continuing scientific dispute — which will probably continue ad infinitum; if we wait for scientists to agree on every point we will wait for ever—and to the political point, which has not been mentioned in today's debate.

It is clear that the whole issue raises extremely difficult matters to do with the unequal sharing of costs and benefits. At present, our partners have the dubious privilege of getting the effects of our invisible export in the shape of certain forms of air pollution, whereas we get the benefit of not having to finance the costs of limiting those. If we followed the lines suggested by the Select Committee, the United Kingdom would pay more, relatively speaking, and our partners would benefit more, relatively speaking, and that must be considered in a Community context.

The Government have it in mind to bring forward in due time a new comprehensive form of clean air legislation as the successor to the 1956 Act. That is all to the good, but I hope that when preparing that legislation Ministers and their advisers will pay attention to the need to include a suitable means of limiting air pollution emissions from hospitals and other forms of Crown property. This may sound a narrow point, but it is important symbolically.

At present, such places are excluded from the legal provisions, with the result that anybody walking past the Great Ormond street hospital for children on a fine summer day or looking across the river at St. Thomas's hospital can often see great plumes of noxious smoke and fumes emanating from their coal-fired boilers, simply because those places do not fall even within the provisions of the 1956 Act. I hope that that loophole will be closed.

In making preparations for subsequent air pollution legislation, I hope that the Government will give a favourable response to the idea that the Department of the Environment should truly become principally a Department of the Environment, because there is no other institutional body in Whitehall which has exactly that remit and responsibility.

In that context, I hope that the Government will move towards the establishment, soon after the legislation comes into force, of a new Her Majesty's pollution inspectorate, with real power behind it, specifically to see that environmental standards are monitored and met.

I welcome the progress that the Government have made so far, I congratulate the Select Committee on the work it has achieved, and I hope that Ministers and others concerned will recognise that a great deal remains to be done.

1.20 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): During the debate we have, quite rightly, been using the term "acid rain" to cover a number of different chemical and polluting effects. We use the term to describe various forms of air pollution, sometimes carried over many hundreds of miles both within Britain and from Britain to abroad, arising from the production of sulphur dioxide, oxides of nitrogen and hydrocarbons, both singly and in various chemical combinations. It is important for us to recognise, as the Select Committee does in its report, that there is no one chemical process at work. Indeed, there are several processes. They are caused by several different forms of pollution and it is necessary for us to tackle them all if we are satisfactorily to solve the problem.

The result of the pollution that is produced and carried is environmental damage elsewhere in Europe of untold proportions and the environmental damage which is beginning in Britain, which is extremely worrying. I do not think that any of the members of the Select Committee who went to West Germany to see the results of environmental pollution there will ever forget our visit to a forest on the north-western escarpment of the Black forest, where five years ago there was luxuriant tree growth. There was a living, vital and extremely attractive forest. That area now looks like Passchendale. There are a few skeletons of trees. There is a wilderness where before there was a forest. That is a direct result of acid rain, the pollution which has fallen in both wet and dry forms on that part of the Black forest.

I do not think that any of us will forget either our visit to Galloway's lochs and rivers to see the dramatic increases in acidity which are being experienced, especially at times of the year when the snow melt occurs. These results should be fixed clearly in our minds when we go on to consider how it might be possible for us to start tackling the problems.

I am pleased that the Government have accepted many of the Select Committee's recommendations. I am pleased, too, that they will engage in more monitoring and research work. However, I must say strongly that it is obvious that, on the crucial recommendations of the Select Committee, especially on the reduction of the emission of sulphur dioxide, the Government have failed to take up the seriousness of the problem and the recommendations of the Committee.

The Central Electricity Generating Board is trying to claim, as it tried to claim at different times in its evidence to the Select Committee, that there is much less of a problem than many of us have been arguing. The briefing note which the board circulated to Members only a few days ago in preparation for the debate states in paragraph 7:

"In only a few, fairly small areas of Europe—and Britain is not one of them—has SO_2 been shown to be directly responsible for environmental damage."

That is misleading at best. It ignores the fact that there is overwhelming agreement among scientific opinion, both here and abroad, that SO_2, in terms both direct and indirect, has a damaging effect on fish life in streams, rivers and lakes. The Minister accepted that in his evidence to the Select Committee.

The Government have said that, in tackling the problem, there is something to be said for the fact that Britain has "achieved" — that is the word that the Government use — a major reduction already in the production of sulphur dioxide. It is worth reading carefully paragraph 3.62 of the Government's response to the Select Committee's report. They point to the 40 per cent. reduction in SO_2 production since 1970 and state:

"This reduction has been due to a number of factors such as fuel substitution, energy conservation and"— here we have a wonderful euphemism—

"industrial restructuring".

They mean that the major reasons for a reduction in SO_2 production over the past 20 years have been a transfer of fuel use to natural gas and, even more important, the industrial recession. To call that an achievement is to deny entirely the basic causes of the reduction in production.

If, as the Government and we hope, the economy shows an upturn in the next five to 10 years and the recession turns around so that we have an industrial base again, what is the potential upturn in sulphur dioxide production that the Government expect if there is not a specific effort to reduce sulphur dioxide emission at source? We must ask also whether the Government have any figures available on the production of sulphur dioxide by power stations over the past 12 months. If the burning of Polish coal, which contains about three times the amount of sulphur that British coal tends to have, and the burning of heavy oil in power stations have both been increased considerably, we must expect that the production of sulphur dioxide by power stations will have increased accordingly over the past 12 months. It would be interesting to know whether the Government have done any work at all to monitor the effects that have occurred in the most recent period.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): The average sulphur content of Polish coal is certainly higher, but the coal exported has a sulphur content much lower than the average, so the most serious problems occur in Poland rather than abroad.

Mr. Smith: That may well be true, but the fact remains that the coal currently being imported from Poland has a considerably higher sulphur content than the average for British coal. Indeed, the areas where British coal has the lowest sulphur content are south Wales and Scotland, which are currently producing very little coal indeed.

The Government state that, having reduced sulphur dioxide emissions considerably in the past 20 to 30 years, the aim is a further reduction of 30 per cent. They state in their response:

"the Government aims to achieve a further reduction of 30 per cent. from 1980 levels of SO_2 emissions by the end of the 1990s."

It is sad that they should refer to the end of the 1990s rather than to the internationally agreed date of 1995. Moreover, the Government have not so far addressed themselves to the point so forcefully made by the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi). I hope that the Minister will do so when he winds up. Although the Government claim that they are aiming for a reduction of 30 per cent., nowhere in their response or in the Minister's speech today have they said how they intend to achieve that. No specific measures whatever have been proposed. It is incumbent on the Government to put forward specific proposals and to show how the reduction will be brought about.

The Select Committee went further, rightly commending the 60 per cent. national reduction proposed by the EEC, which would mean a reduction in sulphur dioxide production by power stations of between 80 per cent. and 85 per cent. The Government's dismissal of that proposal in their response to the Select Committee is sketchy and thin in the extreme. The only argument that seems to have been put forward and the only argument that the Minister gave related to the cost involved. They ignore entirely the experience of countries such as Germany where, when flue gas desulphurisation equipment has been installed in power stations and industrial enterprises, it has been found that the eventual outturn cost of that installation is considerably less than original estimates. That must surely now be taken into account when we consider the costs of installing flue gas desulphurisation equipment in our power stations.

The Government also ignore the fact that the cost would be spread over some 10 to 15 years and that the impact year by year would be far smaller than the figures which the Government have been giving out. The Government should also bear in mind the fact that fuel costs in Britain have risen substantially over the past 10 years.

During his evidence to the Select Committee, I asked the Under-Secretary of State if he would care to compare the figures that he was giving for the installation of flue gas desulphurisation equipment and the cost to the electricity consumer if it were borne directly and entirely by the consumer—that is open to debate—with the rise in electricity prices over the past few years. He said:

> "I have no doubt the question would not have been so pointedly asked unless there had been quite a considerably large figure involved: 50 per cent. over the last few years."

One should consider what the Government have done to fuel prices for the consumer. There was a request from the Secretary of State for Energy in 1979 to the British Gas Corporation to raise domestic prices by 10 per cent. plus inflation for each of the following three years. Recently the Government forced the electricity industry to raise its prices by 2 per cent. There has been a rise of something like 40 per cent. in electricity prices in real terms over the previous decade. The Government imposed a levy on the gas industry of something like £526 million in the financial year 1983-84. Therefore, it ill becomes the Government to say that a rise of 1 per cent. a year in electricity costs to the consumer over the next 10 years is an intolerable burden for the electricity consumer to bear despite the environmental benefits which might well result. The environmental task is surely far more urgent, and the benefits of action are far greater, than the Government have yet given any sign of realising.

Two further small points ought to be made. The first is to ask the Government whether they have a policy, and if so what it is, in relation to new power stations which might be commissioned over the next few years. In particular, what requirement will they place on SO_2 emissions from the oil-fired Kilroot station in Northern Ireland which it is planned will convert to coal later and which is upwind of some of the most sensitive areas in southern Scotland? What are the Government's plans for that, and do they have any specific proposals for ensuring that proper desulphurisation equipment and low nitrogen oxide-producing burning processes are installed in that planned station?

Secondly, there is pressurised fluid bed combustion. All the members of the Select Committee were impressed by the evidence that pressurised fluid bed combustion could provide, if the necessary research was done, a new, attractive and clean technology for the burning of coal in future. But we were all agreed about the importance of speeding up research to produce that technology much sooner than at present expected.

We all know that there are difficulties. In particular, there is the effect on the turbines and the necessity of disposing of waste products. The problems have not yet been entirely solved. However, the attractiveness and potential of the PFB combustion process are such that the Government should assist the National Coal Board and the CEGB in bringing forward the date for the final establishment of a proper working method of PFB.

While it is true that the Government seem to recognise the existence of a problem of some sort, and while they have agreed to carry out more research and more monitoring, their response to the Select Committee's report is deeply disappointing. They have totally failed to acknowledge that action must be taken on the crucial recommendations about the emission of pollutant gases from power stations.

Of course there are complexities, uncertainties and difficulties. There is no 100 per cent. scientific proof of the exact chemical processes at work. However, the members of the Select Committee all agreed that there was overwhelming evidence that the production of SO_2 and nitrogen oxide by power stations causes environmental damage. The Minister himself acknowledged that that is so. He told the Select Committee that sulphur dioxide

> "must cause some damage. It must contribute to some environmental damage, either now or in the future. I think that is right, yes."

If the Minister seriously believes that, we must take steps now rather than later to start to curb the emission of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxide by our power stations.

We have heard much talk recently about the so-called greening of the Conservative party. The phrase may well be appropriate with regard to the Conservative Members who joined me and other hon. Members on the Select Committee in producing our report. Regrettably, it is not yet true of the Government.

1.38 pm

Mr. Norman Miscampbell (Blackpool, North): I am very conscious of the time. I shall therefore make only one of the points that I had intended to make in a somewhat longer speech. I shall not follow other hon. Members by dealing with the scientific particularities of the matter, which have been fully dealt with.

I believe that in making a decision on this matter we should not concentrate entirely on the economic consequences to ourselves. There are grave political decisions to be made, and grave political damage could be done to our country if we do not recognise the anger—anger is the right word—that has been expressed, especially in Scandinavia and, to some extent, in Germany.

I wish that we could accede to the Committee's suggestion that we should adopt all the EEC suggestions. However, to join the 30 per cent. club would not, in our present situation, cost nearly as much as going all the way with the EEC, and the cost of that step should be weighed against the costs that will inevitably be imposed upon us in terms of political damage if we do not take it.

I remember being at a lunch in a forest when the Swedes sang a song, several verses of which referred unfavourably to the CEGB. I also remember, with special force, talking to an obviously well-informed journalist who said of our visit to Scandinavia that we were brave to come. I remember, too, a highly placed official saying that he dealt continuously with troubles in the forest and with people who rang in for advice, and that at times they were almost in tears. There is undoubtedly great political feeling there. We were taken to see a river in Norway where, in 1929, two Englishmen caught 1,000 salmon in six weeks. I cannot think what they did with so many fish, or why they should want to catch them, though I am a fisherman. Not one salmon has been taken out of that river for nearly 20 years.

We are faced with considerable political difficulties and should not think that others will necessarily keep their word. Eastern Europe has made the appropriate noises, but we know that Czechoslovakia continues to burn lignite, which is causing enormous trouble, and of other difficulties. Unless we act, I do not believe that they will.

I welcome the Government's obvious intention to deal with nitrogen oxide emissions, and I hope that we are successful. I urge the Government to consider joining the 30 per cent. club. Although I should like to go much further, I cannot believe that the costs of doing that do not represent a bargain, bearing in mind the political damage that we shall do ourselves in Europe, especially with our friends in Scandinavia, if we do not show that we are willing to co-operate.

1.41 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): The attitude of the Government, some of their supporters and the CEGB can be summarised as, "Acid reigns OK." It is not OK. It must be admitted that Britain leads the Western world in the most unenviable capacity as a producer and exporter of acid rain pollutants. We are ahead of the rest of Europe, the United States, Canada and Japan. We are the largest emitter of sulphur pollution in western Europe. The catastrophic effects of that pollution are well documented and incontrovertible. They expose the inadequacy of the Government's policy on the problem. Evidence of damage nationally suggests that the Government have taken into account only the tip of the iceberg when considering the enormous hidden costs to the country of this most obnoxious rainfall.

There is great anxiety in agriculture. Evidence shows reduced yields of cereals, root crops, grass and possibly sheep on acidified pastures. Friends of the Earth estimates that losses to winter wheat and barley might amount to £200 million a year. That represents an entirely unnecessary loss to the farmer, which, in turn, costs the country dear in terms of the cost of food and the loss of farming land.

For the ruinous effects of acid rain on our national architectural heritage we need look no further than the Palace of Westminster and the work that has had to be done here. The cost of treating corroded iron, steel, glass and Portland stone here, at Westminster abbey, St. Paul's cathedral, the Hyde park corner memorial and other buildings throughout London could well run into millions of pounds. Moreover, that cost will recur every decade unless we reduce acid rain pollution. The country is bearing an unjustifiable financial and cultural cost as buildings old and new are damaged, leaving future generations an architecture that is etched in acid.

The danger to our natural environment must also be taken into account. That is even more sinister, because the damage may not be apparent to the general public. The widespread nature of acidified fresh water in the United Kingdom is a disgrace. According to the Welsh water authority, 120 Welsh rivers are affected. In addition, it is estimated that 57 Scottish lochs are either partly or wholly acidified. Unless the Government take steps to reduce those levels, they should make it a statutory obligation on water authorities to erect public notices to warn the population of the possibility of acid baths which may replace natural fresh water ones.

The Nature Conservancy Council lists 100 areas of international importance which are vulnerable to acid rain. Its appeal for legislation to reduce pollution because of the dreadful effects on wildlife has been met by an unsubstantiated attack by the CEGB. The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the World Wildlife Fund are among the esteemed authorities which are painstakingly cataloguing the decline of our natural environment.

The Forestry Commission, reluctant until recently to consider the Scandinavian tree death problem, is now conducting a national survey into widespread unexplained damage to trees in the United Kingdom. In the face of the evidence catalogued by many reputable organisations, the Government's present position is feeble.

At present, the aim of the policy is to bring about a 30 per cent. reduction in acid rain pollution by the year 2000. That policy compares unfavourably with that of other Western countries. The nine European Community countries and Canada have formed a 30 per cent. club which commits each member to a 30 per cent. reduction in sulphur emissions by 1995. Even if the United Kingdom joined the club and met its objectives, we would still be the biggest emitter of sulphur pollution in western Europe. The reduction would only retard environmental damage.

The European Commission proposes an EC directive for a 40 per cent. reduction in nitrogen oxide and a 60 per cent. reduction in sulphur by 1995. Britain should support that directive and put it into effect. The EC proposal is of the highest order because it commits all its member states to a mutually beneficial improvement in the quality of environmental life.

How tawdry by comparison are the Government's European preservation policies, which preserve wine lakes and butter mountains rather than the environment. I find little evidence for the Government's opposition to this laudable EC directive to reduce acid rain.

The principal component of the practical strategy consists of modifying combustion at large plants. In the United Kingdom the large plants responsible for 66 per cent. of pollution are CEGB power stations. Although the Government have identified that major source of pollution, they oppose cleaning it up, even though the amount added to an average yearly electricity bill would be about £1. Polls have shown that the general public would willingly pay the extra amount for pollution-free electricity, combined with a vastly improved environment.

Given that, one would expect the CEGB's case to the Government, which opposes improvements, to have substance. Far from it. The CEGB's only consistency has been its unremitting propaganda against improvements. It has waged a campaign of misinformation, first against the Scandinavians in the mid-70s and then, as EC pressure grew, against the Germans, British environmental groups, the NCC and finally the House of Commons Environment Select Committee. The press, too, has been misinformed, leading it to publish much higher consumer costs than is the case.

The Select Committee criticised the CEGB for presenting misleading and useless cost estimates, seriously inaccurate forecasting and "trite and evasive" evidence on several serious issues. The comment by Sir Walter Marshall, chairman of the CEGB, to the Committee provides a most objectionable quote rather than an explanation of its policy. He said:

"I would much prefer it if politicians did not attempt to make balanced scientific judgments."

It is not for him to tell us our responsibilities when investigating matters of national and international importance.

The Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), replied to the chairman of the CEGB:

"You say that my committee misunderstood CEGB evidence. To the contrary. Your evidence was assessed alongside that of over 100 other witnesses, tested, evaluated and found wanting —not for the first time by a Select Committee."

I should prefer it if the Government did not attempt to make balanced political judgments on acid rain based on the dubious record of the CEGB, and especially the performance of its chairman. The Government have already experienced the undesirable effects of entrusting the future of a nationalised industry to the cult of the personality. Mr. MacGregor at the National Coal Board has wasted £5 billion of taxpayers' money in one year. Britain cannot afford the additional, inestimable cost of environmental damage following the "Marshall" plan.

I ask the Government to adopt the EC directive on the reduction of acid rain as a matter of urgency to combat its catastrophic consequences.

1.51 pm

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): As one with an academic chemistry background, I find this debate and the Select Committee proceedings on the subject fascinating. I feel strongly on the subject, but where one feels strongly it is all the more important that one tempers such strength of feeling with due regard to the scientific facts and to the economic costs of possible options. Notwithstanding that, it is evident from the evidence taken by the Select Committee in Britain, Germany and Scandinavia that there is a serious problem. I welcomed the opening speech of my hon. Friend the Minister, which was thoughtful. He is a genuine seeker after the truth. His visit to Scandinavia did much to convince him of the importance that the Scandinavians place on the problem and of the large scale of their difficulties.

The place of fishing, hunting and shooting in the Scandinavian psyche and the position of trees and forests in the German psyche are similar to the British view of land, which has always been a great feature of British aspirations. Therefore, it is hardly surprising that the Scandinavians should react so strongly when in one area of Norway alone more than 10,000 lakes are fishless.

There is some agreement about the evidence for the depredations that have occurred and about the volume of pollution that is being emitted from Britain and other countries. It is all very well for the Soviet Union cynically to attach itself to the 30 per cent. club. Britain has a proud tradition of fulfilling its promises, whereas the Soviet Union frequently joins international commitments to impress people without the slightest intention of carrying them out. The evidence of serious pollution not only in eastern Europe but in the countries immediately adjacent to it shows that it is a cynical attitude compared with the genuine concern of many western European countries. A realistic appraisal of the fact that if we commit ourselves to the 30 per cent. club we have to achieve that has led my hon. Friend the Minister and his advisers to take a rather more cautious approach than we would like.

I impress upon my hon. Friend two points. First, pollution is wrong in principle. There is no question but that these are toxic substances, and that means that we have a moral obligation to take every opportunity to reduce the level of pollution that we are giving out. Secondly, there is a real worry in Scandinavia about what effect this will have on British-Scandinavian relations, which have traditionally been extremely good.

We have an opportunity to put into practice the traditional British approach of best practicable means by taking full advantage of the technology that is presently available to us. The cost of complying with joining the 30 per cent. club is a reasonable cost, given the balance of probability that arises from the scientific evidence that we received and evaluated. From the scientific evidence, there was no question but that there was a relationship between our emissions and Scandinavian problems. We may not understand each and every link in the chain that joins those two, but we must accept that if we reduced our pollution it would bring some benefits to Scandinavia and to ourselves. Under those circumstances, it is right to make a commitment to the 30 per cent. club. After all, we are nearly two thirds of the way there.

It was unfair of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) to say that the Government have entirely rejected the main point of the Select Committee's report, because one has to examine not just the letters that are printed in the report but the thought behind them. If we were to achieve part of the 30 per cent. reduction, that would take us into compliance with the membership of the so-called 30 per cent. club and would achieve a good proportion of the Committee's main objective, which is to secure a large-scale reduction in pollution.

There is a long way to go, but there is a great deal that we can achieve. I commend to my hon. Friend the Minister the fact that the consequences of our go-slow on the 30 per cent. club are a serious deterioration in our relations with Scandinavia and are undermining our justly-earned reputation as one of the leading European countries in pollution control.

1.57 pm

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) on his chairmanship of the Select Committee and for so ably opening the debate.

This is not simply a matter for the Department of the Environment. There are also implications, which have not been raised, for the agriculture and food industries, certainly through better education and information. There are employment aspects and energy implications. I have been pleased to see my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environmnent here for most of the debate. The Foreign Office is also involved because of the interaction with other states. The Health and Social Security Department is involved because of the damage that sulphur dioxide, nitrogen dioxide and other emissions are having on the health of our nation. I could carry on in a similar vein. Therefore, I am delighted to see that the representative of one of our most important regional offices is winding up, and it would have been nice to have seen a representative from the Welsh and Northern Ireland Offices. Environmental considerations need to be an integral part of our policy network if they are to make any headway. We have a moral as well as an economic duty to safeguard our society.

Has the scale of the problem been truly appreciated? The debate has been relegated to the first parliamentary Friday after Christmas, so it would appear not. Only the USSR, in the whole of Europe, produces more sulphur dioxide than Britain. Man-made ozone, created from the combustion of fossil fuel, has had the most damaging effect. An example from my own constituency is the historic York minster, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) referred today.

The information that I received was from the surveyor of the fabric at York minster. There were two specific examples. Five or six years ago, Norman stone exposed to medieval air for 200 years on the north side underneath the vergers' vestry was revealed. Although it had been covered at about 1380, during all that time there had only been a darkening of dirt. There was no erosion or decay of the stone. Now, with magnesian limestone—which is certainly more delicate—there are great problems. The second example is stone put in only seven years ago, which has already lost one eighth of an inch of its surface. That is a staggering example of what is happening to a major historical and religious building. Acid rain is a contributory factor. I do not doubt that we have cleaner cities since the Clean Air Act 1956, but that deterioration has occurred during such a short time. I hope that the Minister will appreciate that we do not want to get into the United States bumper bar expression "acid rain causes nuclear power", but it is a strong message.

I know that a number of my colleagues have referred to the difficulties of the CEGB, and I am sure that we have underestimated the arguments about nitrogen. But if we are to deal with true diplomacy and in the interests of trade, there must be stronger action. I am one of those who would like Britain to join the so-called 30 per cent. club, and feel that we should go further, because polite nagging is not enough. The Minister should not shelter under an umbrella of limited technical energy research to protect him from an anticipated acid drizzle of disapproval from his fellow environment Ministers in Europe. We owe it not only to this generation but to our children and grandchildren to improve the environment, which has been so damaged by man, and, in consequence the quality of life.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): Tribute has already been paid to the work of the Select Committee. I wish to pay tribute to the interest shown by the members of the Committee in today's debate — not only in speaking about the report but in standing by its recommendations. The Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), pointedly asked the question what is the precise Government programme. He did not receive a reply from the Minister. Perhaps he could not answer or perhaps he did not want to answer. The fact remains that the Chairman was understandably disappointed that the Government did not accept the two main recommendations in the report, although they accepted the other 17. It was almost as though the twin pillars upon which many of the recommendations rested had been pulled down by the blind Samson at the Department of the Environment. Time and again hon. Members argued in favour of joining the 30 per cent. club and of commitment to the European directive.

In many ways, this has been a House of Commons occasion. One of the duties that Select Committees perform is to make the House more aware of the issues, the complexities and the technicalities at stake. Having served on a Select Committee, I know that in many ways they fulfill that important obligation.

The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) emphasised a point contained in the text of the report, that the Committee had started its inquiry "with open minds". However, the Committee is now convinced about the matter and looking for more positive Government action and acceptance of the urgency of what is at stake. Several hon. Members have said that costs are involved, but there is a price to be paid for doing nothing. Many hon. Members also referred to the Clean Air Act 1956. Of course, nobody would say now that that was not worth the cost. We probably take it too much for granted. People have forgotten or did not experience the fogs and smogs that used to plague urban areas. Therefore, there is a sense of acceptance with regard to that aspect of clean air legislation.

Several hon. Members also referred to the on-costs that will arise elsewhere if we do not act on the problem of acid rain. In a notable passage in his speech, the Minister talked about the cost-benefit approach. I wondered, cynically, whether it was benefit to us and cost to somebody else. That is the difficulty that we are dealing with. My hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) spoke about a Marshall plan. For a moment one thought of the post-war Marshall plan, which was positive and designed to give out resources. It was not of course the same as the Marshall plan associated with the CEGB, which is to hold back and restrain, but there will be costs elsewhere. We have a compartmentalised approach in the way in which we do our accounting in Government circles. What may seem to be a cost at the Department of Energy may not be a cost in another Department. The Government should take a view on the basis of totality.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton), who was, as ever, on the ball, mentioned the Scottish interest and the apparent absence of input by the Scottish Office, although I know that many eminent Scots gave evidence to the Select Committee in other capacaties. The Scottish Development Department published its paper on acid rain in June last year, which acknowledged the potential damage to the lochs in Galloway. The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) referred today to the problems of Loch Ard in his area. The right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) drew attention to the areas at risk in many parts of the western Highlands. Last year the Nature Conservancy Council report on acid deposition and its implications for nature conservancy in Britain contained some disturbing warning signs in its text.

The hon. Member for Stirling also alluded to the aggravation of some problems by the Forestry Commission's policies over the years, and the species of tree that it has planted. That is a fairly complicated matter because age, structure and other factors undoubtedly come into play. However, I wonder whether, if more of the woodlands of Scotland were in the private sector, there would be a greater sense of urgency on the part of the Government with regard to the damage that is being done. The Government have a slipshod attitude on matters of public asset as against private interest.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does my hon. Friend accept that the planting policies of private forestry operations have over the past 10 or 20 years tended to be even worse than those of the Forestry Commission in terms of the type of tree planted? Does that not augur badly for the sale of Forestry Commission land upon which the Government are now embarked?

Mr. Craigen: That is a tree up which I shall not climb. My hon. Friend, however, makes an interesting point. One of the difficulties facing many lay people who are not caught up in either the ecological or energy lobby is that they see no direct result from the problems of acid rain. It is only when they come up against the specifics that they start taking an interest.

In our basically urban society—that is what we have in the United Kingdom—less attention is paid to the problems of the environment than in some European countries where, although they may be urbanised, there tends to be a greater interplay between urban and rural areas than is often the case in part of the United Kingdom.

The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet referred to the problems of buildings. Several hon. Members have mentioned the forests under attack. We have also heard about the risks to agricultural land and the threat to our fresh water. My hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), a recognised authority on matters of the natural environment, mentioned the threat to much of our wildlife. The hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green made the point that it is sensible to try to stop the emission of acid at source. I agree that preventing rather than paying for the consequence is the most sensible approach. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) made a useful point when he asked what was the Government's policy about the commissioning of new power stations, because that would at least give us a clue as to the importance that they attach to the problem.

Several hon. Members, not least my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), have rightly emphasised the importance of using as much as possible coal with little sulpur content. They specifically referred to coalfields in Scotland, the north-east and south Wales where we might say that the coal is worth its weight in coal if it has a limited sulphur content. I hope that more attention will be paid to the use of clean coal, if it can be described as such.

The hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) and others rightly emphasised the employment potential in environmental conservation and protection. We are inclined to overlook the job creation spin-off that can arise from preventive measures.

I wish to repeat two points made by my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields. We feel that the United Kingdom should join the 30 per cent. club and show much greater earnestness of its intent to our neighbours. That point was ably put by the hon. and learned Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Miscampbell) when referring to the importance of external relations.

Secondly, we must indicate our strong and clear commitment to the European directive. The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) rightly emphasised that we are dealing with an issue which straddles national boundaries and which requires the greatest possible collaboration and co-operation in the European context.

We have today paid tribute to the Select Committee. Our tribulations arise from the Government's response to the report of what was an all-party Select Committee which emphasised the urgency of the problem and the need for quick action. There is a temptation for any generation to bestow on future generations the consequences of its short-sightedness. That is especially true in politics where, let us be frank, we tend to operate at least on a quinquennial basis. While the green fingers may not yet have touched the ballot boxes, environmental factors must have a higher place in the politics of Britain.

No Government this century have gained so greatly and benefited so quickly from the natural resource of offshore oil than the present Government. Moreover, the benefits were put in their lap by the efforts of the former Labour Government because of the way in which that Administration approached oil participation and public enterprise arrangements. I hope that the Government will not prove as careless in their handling of environmental issues as they have shown themselves callous in dealing with all matters domestic.

2.17 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) ended by saying that we should not be short-sighted. I suspect that he suffers more from a short memory, judging by his remarks about the development of North sea oil under the last Labour Government. He seems to forget the record of that Administration in environmental terms and particularly the fact that between 1974 and 1979 they had the chance to implement the Control of Pollution Act 1974 but failed to do so, purely on the grounds of cost. On the basis of that example, we are entitled to take with a pinch of salt the remarks that have been made today from the Opposition Front Bench.

This has been a useful debate, introduced comprehensively by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) on what is probably one of the most complex environmental problems facing us today. Hon. Members have shown interest in and knowledge of the subject and have expressed what I appreciate is a widely held concern about the environmental effects of acid rain. This mirrors the concern which the Select Committee expressed in its report.

The debate has demonstrated the complexity of the issues and the potentially enormous costs which could arise from some of the solutions proposed. There is a great deal at stake and we must be sure that we fully understand the essentials of the problem, and particularly the cause and effect relationships, before we commit ourselves to considerable sums of public expenditure; time permitting, I shall return to that subject. I shall deal with as many points as possible in the time available to me, but if I fail to reply to any questions I shall endeavour to answer them by way of correspondence.

I will try to put the whole issue in perspective. A number of hon. Members have criticised the Government for what they describe as inactivity. They criticise us for depending on research instead of taking up some of the measures which they feel we should be undertaking. Had this criticism been made against a background of increasing emission levels of SO_2 there might have been inactivity worthy of the criticism which has been levelled at the Government. However, that is not the background against which we are debating this issue. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State said, we have seen a reduction of about 40 per cent. in the SO_2 level since 1970, and a 20 per cent. reduction since 1980. The emission levels are reducing. It has been said that they have reduced for many reasons outwith the Government's control but that does not diminish the importance of the fact that the levels are reducing. We must continue to encourage their reduction.

The speech of the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) was dealt with by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. I regret the language which the hon. Gentleman used when addressing himself to a sensitive and complex issue. He described the present position—I think that I quote him correctly — as like waging chemical warfare against Britain and north Europe. He will realise that those are emotive words which conjure up fears and frightening pictures for many, especially in terms of health.

I have always believed the hon. Member for South Shields to be a responsible politician who would not wish unnecessarily to create fears in people's minds. He knows that there is no evidence in the United Kingdom that acid deposition directly affects health at ambient air pollution levels and that any current health factors associated with air pollution are most likely related to past exposure, especially to smoke from the use of coal in pre-Clean Air Act days. I believe that the hon. Gentleman used the language of exaggeration. I hope that on mature reflection he will realise that he should not have used it. I hope, too, that at some future time, if not now, he will withdraw it.

Dr. David Clark: I shall not withdraw. We are talking about chemicals in the atmosphere, and there is considerable evidence of health risks in Scandinavia as a result of Britain's acidic emissions.

Mr. Ancram: Obviously the hon. Gentleman has a picture of chemical warfare that is different from that of my hon. and right hon. Friends. I hope that when he reflects upon his remarks——

Sir Hugh Rossi: On the risks to health in Scandinavia, the Select Committee adduced evidence of diarrhoea in babies as a result of leaching through copper pipes in the water supply. That does not happen in Britain.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that clear on the basis of evidence received by the Select Committee. I hope that the hon. Member for South Shields will reflect on his remarks in a calmer moment.

The hon. Members for Maryhill and for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) said that the Scottish Office did not submit evidence to the Select Committee. If they read page VIII of the first volume of the report, they will find a list of written evidence received on the acid rain inquiry that was not printed. The Scottish Office is referred to about a third of the way down the page. That evidence was based on the position paper to which the hon. Member for Maryhill referred.

As Minister with responsibilities for the environment in Scotland, I have given considerable and serious attention to acid rain. It has aroused considerable public concern and debate in Scotland. There was evidence of this in the three-day conference that was organised in September by the Scottish Wildlife Trust. It is because of that concern that I have been anxious to ensure that there should be a widespread and fully informed public debate. To assist in this, the position paper was published in the summer of 1984. That document sets out the Scottish dimension.

I can summarise the position in Scotland by saying that, because of its geology and soil, Scotland includes many of the areas that are most vulnerable to acid deposition. Consequently, an extensive research effort is being undertaken in Scotland to determine the chemical reactions taking place in the atmosphere within plant canopies and within soils and water systems to assess the impact that acid rain is having on those environments.

The evidence so far is of some past acidification of surface waters, but I am glad to say that as yet the environmental effects are limited to a reasonably few lochs and streams in the geologically most vulnerable areas, mainly in the south-west of Scotland, where over a period of years there has been some reduction in fish populations.

I was most interested this summer to see for myself something of the research work that is being undertaken at Loch Dee in Dumfriesshire by the Solway river purification board in conjunction with the Forestry Commission and the freshwater fisheries laboratory of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland. Several hon. Members asked about the impact of afforestation on acidity. At least one of the experiments that is taking place at Loch Dee is related to that and the findings of those experiments will obviously be of great value in terms of the way that afforestation should take place in future.

The Government are keen to see research on the subject progressing. We shall continue to support it financially. As was made clear at the beginning of the debate, a considerable amount of research work is already being undertaken in the United Kingdom. In 1984-85 Government-sponsored work alone will cost £5 million, of which 10 per cent. will be spent on projects in Scotland. That is a substantial effort and, for those who said that it should be increased, it shows an increase of about 30 per cent. over last year.

My Department has also published a register of research projects on acid rain being undertaken in Scotland, whether at the behest of Government Departments or sponsored by other bodies such as universities, electricity boards, and so on. Copies of that register have been placed in the Library. It is interesting and impressive that 49 separate projects are under way in Scotland, representing an investment of some £3 million up to about 1987. Of that, some £2 million involves direct Government funding.

The right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) asked about the damage to forests and where it had occurred. Visible damage to forests has been observed in old plantations on the western seaboard of Scotland, but that damage is not extensive. It is largely random and the symptoms differ in some significant respects from those observed in Germany.

The Forestry Commission's initial view is that the damage is climatic in origin and relates to the temperatures which were experienced in 1983-84. However, the possiblity of pollution damage cannot be ruled out. Therefore, the commission is undertaking research to establish the causes, but it will be some time before the results of that research are available.

Several hon. Members asked what would be the cost of implementing the EC directive or of joining the 30 per cent. club. A number of figures were put forward which in general it was agreed came roughly to an increase of 5 per cent. in electricity prices over 10 years. I do not think that hon. Members realise that that figure covered SO_2 measures alone and that in addition several million pounds would be required for power stations to install nitrogen oxide controls.

Mr. Alton: Who pays to put right the damage being done to buildings up and down the country, and what will the Government contribute to those costs?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman must realise that it is one thing to define an environmental problem when the sources of pollution are identifiable and quite another to seek to define it when other principles apply.

I am conscious that time is running out, but several serious points were discussed, not least by my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman), and I shall try to answer them in correspondence as soon as possible.

The basic question throughout the debate has been how the Government intend to achieve the reduction by the end of the century. We believe that we can build on what is already a substantial reduction in SO_2 emissions and that we can achieve the further 30 per cent. by the end of the century. We also believe that we can achieve a similar reduction in nitrogen oxide emissions.

We believe that we shall achieve that aim not by the adoption of a rigid emission target, which is ultimately just a set of words, but by a progressive and flexible approach using new developments and new control techniques, from the lean burn engine and fluidised bed combustion which have already been mentioned to further conservation measures with both intrinsic and economic merit as well as the changing pattern of energy generation and fuel use. It has become clear from the debate that our aims and purposes are, in a sense, common to us all——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Magistrates' Court, Basildon

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

2.30 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): Before presenting the case for a magistrates' courthouse in Basildon, I should make it clear that the need for this results not from any crisis or breakdown of law and order in my constituency but from a crisis in the physical administration of justice. I am fortunate and privileged to represent an area in which the overwhelming majority of my constituents are decent, hard-working, law-abiding citizens. The reputation that some people gave to Basildon in its infancy as a new town of being a rough area, rife with vandals and thugs, is entirely unjustified. The town has matured and developed into a happy, well-balanced community full of the old east end spirit of warmth and generosity, and I greatly enjoy living there.

From time to time, however, some of my constituents fall foul of the law and end up in Billericay magistrates' court because there is no court in Basildon. The largest new town in the country does not have its own magistrates' court, and it is no exaggeration to say that crisis point has been reached at Billericay magistrates' court, where many have described conditions as inhumane and unjust and likely to lead to miscarriages of justice. I have taken soundings from many people interested in these matters and all agree about the unsuitability of the present courthouse.

The population of Basildon is about 100,000 and is increasing yearly by between 2,000 and 3,000, with a projected total on completion of the new town of about 120,000. With the increase in population, there has been an increase in crime. The number of arrests has doubled since 1974 and is now nearly 4,600 per year. Nine male and three female cells are available, so that double banking is often necessary. Billericay police station has three male and two female cells. In 1984 it had to handle 1,130 prisoners. Those cells are also used by prisoners from Basildon because there are no court cells, so it is common for as many as six prisoners to wait in one cell.

Billericay courthouse consists of two court rooms, two retiring rooms, one interview room doubling as a duty solicitors room, and one witness room. There are no rooms for advocates, police, press or ushers. There is no first-aid, waiting public or matrons' room, and there are no refreshment facilities. There is also no custody accommodation for juveniles, and the statutory requirements for a juvenile court are not met at all. Cells, toilets and gaolers' rooms are shared with Billericay police station.

There is minimal room for lawyer-client consultation. That cannot assist the administration of justice. The toilet facilities sometimes lack the capability to provide privacy for large numbers of prisoners, and there are no exercise facilities whatever. That cannot do much for the preservation of human dignity among prisoners, some of whom are subsequently found innocent. The most worrying aspects are that it is sometimes impossible to separate juvenile offenders from adults, that distressed victims often have to sit opposite their attackers and that separated parents may have to sit opposite each other even in cases involving child battering. There is nowhere in the building to conduct private interviews before or after a case has been heard. There is no facility for private counselling by social workers. The lack of those facilities could mean the wrong kind of assistance, or the wrong sentence.

I am not just worried about the conditions. The effectiveness of the battle for law and order is being reduced because the court is six miles from Basildon. The sheer drain on manpower is harming the effectiveness of the local police, who do a marvellous job despite the appalling difficulties.

One prisoner must be accompanied by one escort, three by two escorts and five by three escorts and a sergeant. After the weekend, it is a common occurrence for the police to have to escort six prisoners to Billericay. Large numbers of Basildon police spend time outside the court room waiting for cases to be reached and decided, and at the same time a number of vehicles are kept waiting outside the court. Only five prisoners may be carried in one vehicle, so after the weekend at least two may be needed.

Last year, just under 800 prisoners required immediate transport from Basildon to Billericay and 5,449 offenders were reported for process and later summoned to the court. Vast amounts of the time and resources of the police are therefore being spent elsewhere than on their prime function, which is the prevention and detection of crime. There are also the officers who are needed to give evidence —perhaps on a number of occasions. Beside the cost in manpower and indeed in cash terms, year after year, the capital cost of providing a courthouse in Basildon pales into significance.

There is little point in the Government's increasing the numbers of police, encouraging a return to the beat and ensuring that the total package of remuneration is good enough to attract high quality recruits if policemen are to spend much of their time sitting in court rooms miles from their sphere of operation.

It had always been intended that, as Basildon took its place as the centre of population for the area, a courthouse would be provided. In 1966 Essex county council acquired land next to the police station. There is already a tunnel leading from the cells to the proposed site. A purpose-built courthouse would provide suitable accommodation for the efficient administration of justice in the petty sessional division for years to come.

The major advantage of the provision of a magistrates' court in Basildon would be the elimination of the quantities of police and vehicle time spent on security and escort duties. Security would be immeasurably increased by the use of the tunnel. Policemen who might otherwise wait for hours for a case to be called would be available for office duties, and so more policemen would be available to patrol the streets and to care for the population.

An experiment has recently been conducted locally. The police have set up a sub-station in one of the busiest areas of Basildon. To date it has helped them to arrest at least one person who might otherwise have got away, and it has accelerated dramatically the arrest of others. The localising of the executive arm of the law has indeed increased efficiency. The localising of the judicial function must surely have the same effect.

There are differences of opinion about what other activities might be catered for in the new courthouses. There is what has been termed the joint venture project. I believe that it is crucial that the courthouse should be the right size. Authoritative sources believe that we need four court rooms. There must be proper facilities inside, and a reasonable exercise yard for prisoners. Time after time communities build some new facility and then find that the building is too small. Let us not make the same mistake here, but consider reasonable projections.

Essex county council is a well-run authority which does its best to provide cost-efficient services. Ironically, it is in some financial difficulties. It believes that it has been penalised unfairly through following tight Government financial guidelines. We badly need a new library in Basildon, and I want the best possible facility for it. For financial reasons, the council is considering combining the library with the courthouse building. I do not like that idea, for many reasons, so I appeal to the Government to help us in our financial difficulty and to prevail on an appropriate local body to see whether it might help us.

It makes sense to combine the courthouse with the probation service and with social services if there must be a joint venture. Such activities are conducted in difficult circumstances in Essex House, which does not even have facilities for disabled people. The lease on Essex House expires in 1994.

I spoke earlier of a crisis in the administration of justice. Our legal system adheres to the view that a person is innocent until proven guilty. I pay tribute to all of those who are involved in that process and who are battling on in difficult conditions. I should like to mention the magistrates especially. The case for a new courthouse is overwhelming. At the moment, the statutory requirements for holding juvenile courts cannot be met. Additional courts are held at Brentwood—there are six a week. For many years there has been talk of a courthouse in Basildon. I want the talking to stop and for there to be some action.

In June 1983 my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary said that our main task was to ensure that the extra resources were used efficiently and effectively. I should like the start date to be brought forward one year, because the most efficient and effective way in which to use the resources in Basildon is to build a magistrates' court now.

2.41 pm

Mr. K. Harvey Proctor (Billericay): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) for allowing me a few minutes of his Adjournment debate, especially as this is the first time that I have spoken in one. As the former hon. Member for Basildon, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate my hon. Friend on his splendid election victory of 1983.

The magistrates in our petty sessional division have sat at Billericay for more than 100 years, and in the present building since 1938. I join my hon. Friend in praising the chairman of the bench, Mr. Watt, the 46 magistrates and the officials who serve with such distinction. They have a high reputation for quality, judgment and fairness.

I am delighted that the Government have proposed the building of a new courthouse in Basildon. It is long overdue. We have the use of an overflow court in Brentwood, which is not satisfactory, although we are grateful to Brentwood magistrates for giving us the use of one of their courts from time to time.

I assume that the magistrates' bench will be transferred to Basildon. What is the proposed use for the present court buildings in Billericay? Will they be used as overflow courts, even when Basildon is operative? The name of the petty sessional division is the Billericay petty sessional division. I understand that Parliament must approve any change of name. Might I suggest, for historic reasons that I have already given, that the name remains unchanged?

Finally, my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon commented on the position of the county council, the court building and the library. This matter goes back to the time when I represented Basildon. The Great Oaks site in Basildon was owned by the county council and a joint scheme for three courts and a 14,000 sq ft library was thought appropriate. Will the Minister tell us whether a fourth court will be necessary and whether it will be built? What accommodation will be available for other services, such as those of lawyers and probation officers? I understand that the county council is prepared to consider alternative sites for the library so long as the site involves no extra cost to Essex ratepayers. So far, sites such as the civic centre and the Church walk house block have been suggested.

2.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) has eloquently described the many and various shortcomings of the existing magistrates' courts in Billericay. Although I have not had the pleasure of visiting the premises, I would not want to dispute his account. Indeed, our files are well filled on the subject. We were not surprised or displeased to receive in 1982 proposals by Essex county council to replace the courthouse of Billericay with one in Basildon. We were sent full details of the scope and range of the existing facilities, and we acknowledge them to be lacking by modern standards.

The picture presented showed that the case for a new courthouse satisfied three of our four basic criteria of operational need: shortage of court rooms, shortage of staff accommodation and inadequate ancillary facilities. We were able to agree that that added up to a priority operational need and, therefore, that forward planning might be put in hand for the scheme.

At that stage we could not give a commitment to a specific start date because, against the background of continuing severe restraint on capital expenditure in the public sector, the rolling programme of major magistrates' courts building schemes was already substantially committed. The case made about the Billericay court is being made by many other courthouses. There is stiff competition for a place in the programme.

Hard decisions still have to be made about relative priorities for slotting in new starts. We explained at the beginning that inclusion of the scheme on the priority planning list meant that the Basildon courthouse was now one of the group of high priority schemes which would have first call on such margins as became available for new starts in the years ahead.

That was two years ago. I am glad that since then further progress has been made. We have found a place for the scheme in the latest package of projected new starts in 1987-88, on which offers went out to the providing authorities last month. Since his election my hon. Friend has played a leading role in ensuring that we have not been left in any doubt about the deficiencies of the present position. I hope that he will not let the best be the enemy of the good. Compared with the timings of many projects, the Basildon project has been processed with considerable speed. Since the hon. Gentleman has achieved so much, I hope that he will not sell his achievement short by thinking that he has been handed a dusty deal. He has been handed rather a good deal. I should like to know that he acknowledges that fact.

I welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor) to the debate and know that he is interested in it. I am glad that the move from Billericay to Basildon will not provoke local enmities, in the middle of which we sometimes find ourselves, in relation to magistrates' courts benches. In answer to his questions, the local authority is in the driving seat. The national taxpayer may pick up 80 per cent. of the bill, but the local authority and local interests are in the driving seat for producing the plan. The Government do not seek to dictate on such matters. We consider carefully the points put to us and, provided that they fit our view of the way in which the court system should operate, local interests usually discover us to be obliging on matters such as those mentioned by my hon. Friend. Therefore, I must ask him to make his points first to the local interests, and we shall see where we go from there.

It is for Essex county council, as the providing authority, to decide whether it can accept the offered commitment and its expenditure implications. Although the capital cost will qualify for the usual 80 per cent. grant from central funds, the basic funding responsibility and that for the residue rests with the local authority. In that connection, my hon. Friend expressed some disappointment that the start date is 1987-88. I would say only what I have already told him: on the present pattern of committed expenditure on the magistrates' courts rolling programme, 1987-88 is the earliest date at which margins will be available for any new major start on courthouse schemes under the centrally controlled capital allocation within which all magistrates' courts in England and Wales must be accommodated.

Indeed, in the present financial climate, with local authority budgeting so fine-tuned, as my hon. Friends will be aware, it would not be reasonable to expect the local authority to accommodate the funding of a substantial new capital commitment in its forward budget, at much shorter notice than the start date that we have given. However, once a starts offer is accepted and the commitment agreed as firm, the Government would always be ready to consider adjustments on timing, forward or back, to take account of changed circumstances.

It has been suggested, as my hon. Friend said, that there might be security problems if the new courthouse complex were to incorporate the local public library. The practicalities of locating other services on the same site or in the same building as the courthouse are a matter for the local authority, because the site belongs to it and public libraries are its responsibility. If public library facilities were provided in the same building as the magistrates' court, there would be security considerations in relation to some aspects of the courthouse function—the custody area is an obvious example—and there would have to be separate access arrangements. However, I differ a little from my hon. Friend in saying that these are matters which we would expect the local authority to sort out with the police. We would consider those aspects when firm design proposals were put to us following those discussions.

Subject to what we may discover when the detailed plans are introduced, I can see no grounds of principle for excluding other services or the public from the site or from other parts of the building; nor is there any reason why the practicalities of ensuring the necessary separation of facilities should present insuperable problems. We must await the plans before we make a decision. My hon. Friend will make his points to the local authority and the police to ensure that his views are taken into account as the necessary local evaluation process continues.

My hon. Friend asked me to say which specific facilities would be provided in the new Basildon courthouse, including the number of court rooms, and whether there would be facilities for the probation service. My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay also mentioned that. These are matters for the providing authority, Essex county council, to decide, but it will wish to take into account the views of the magistrates' courts committee. The scheme can then be put to the Government, who will express a final view on its scope and range. The original outline proposals envisaged a need for three court rooms plus the usual ancillary facilities, and on that basis we accepted the scheme. However, no detailed design proposals have been put to us. I acknowledge that provision for future expansion might make it sensible to build four courts rather than three, and I should make it clear that, if the local authority decided to do so, the Government would have no objection. These matters lie in their court—no pun intended.

As for the probation element, as far as we are aware, this was not originally envisaged. However, there is no reason in principle why a probation suite should not be provided as part of the complex if it is needed. Again, this is a matter for the probation committee to sort out with the Essex county council, and then to put such arrangements as they propose to us.

I hope that by the end of the decade we shall have a new court building in Basildon that will be an ornament to the administration of justice in Essex. If so, a number of people can take credit for that, and my two hon. Friends will be prominent among them. I am glad to be able to say as much this afternoon.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes to Three o'clock.

THE ARTS

Arts Council (Grant)

Mr. Freud asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether he will list in the Official Report the per capita Arts Council grant given to each regional arts association for each of the last five years.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information is as follows:

Museum Purchase Grant Scheme

Mr. Murphy asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what future arrangemens are envisaged for the local museum purchase grant scheme at present administered by the Victoria and Albert museum and the Science museum.

Mr. Waldegrave: In the light of the consultations last year, and of subsequent discussions with the two museums and the Museums and Galleries Commission, my right hon. and noble Friend has decided to confirm the proposal to transfer responsibility for the local museum purchase grant schemes to the commission with effect from April 1985. The Victoria and Albert and Science museums will, for the time being, continue to administer the schemes on behalf of the commission, within guidelines agreed between them and the commission. The operating arrangements will be subject to review in the light of experience.

This solution takes account of the views expressed during the consultations that the transfer would be in keeping with the developing role of the commission and with the newly-acquired trustee status of the two museums which makes it less appropriate that they should continue to be the sole agents for the disbursement of these centrally-provided funds. It also responds to the widely-voiced concern that any changes should be such as not to inhibit the speed and flexibility of handling grant applications, or to forgo the valuable expertise and continuity provided by the museums.

My right hon. and noble Friend pays tribute to the skill with which the museums and their staff have operated the schemes over the years, and which he is confident will be preserved under the new arrangements.

Subject to Parliamentary approval, the Supply Estimates for 1985-86 will provide for the transfer of vote accountability for the grant funds, which will remain at the levels planned in 1984-85 despite the reductions my right hon. and noble Friend is making in purchasing grants elsewhere.

Arts and Libraries (Expenditure)

Mr. Murphy asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if he is in a position to announce the allocation of the arts and libraries expenditure programme for 1985-86.

Mr. Waldegrave: The central Government element of the arts and libraries programme has been set at £272 million for 1985-86, an increase of 5·8 per cent. in cash over the corresponding provision for 1984-85. Subject to Parliamentary approval of the Supply Estimates, my right hon. and noble Friend proposes the main 1985-86 allocations listed below. For most areas of recurrent funding, this will be a tight settlement. While it will allow present levels of activity to be broadly maintained, the need to provide room for some modest new developments as made it necessary to restrict the underlying baseline increase to 3 per cent. in cash above 1984-85 levels.

The Arts Council's grant will be £105 million, representing a total increase of 5 per cent. over 1984-85. This, however, includes £2 million extra money towards implementation of its regional development strategy, some additional help for the Scottish national companies, advance preparations for taking over the South Bank, and other special needs.

The total provision for the British Film Institute will represent a 4¾ per cent. increase, for the Crafts Council a 5·8 per cent. increase, and for the National Film and Television school a 13 per cent. increase, including in each case additional sums for special needs. Following the successful launch of the business sponsorship incentive scheme for which £½ million has been set aside this year, my right hon. and noble Friend is providing £1 million for its continuation in 1985-86. My right hon. and noble Friend is contributing another £¼ million towards the Royal Academy's building and endowment appeal fund, with the aim also of stimulating further private donations.

For the museums and galleries, the 1985-86 settlement continues the shift in emphasis towards the better conservation and maintenance of existing collections and buildings, as compared with new acquisition and construction.

The total net provision for national museums' and galleries' general running costs will be increased by 4·6 per cent. after allowing for higher estimated receipts and for revoted surplus income from previous years. The Government's review of the net vote/revote system is still in progress and the existing arrangements will therefore have to continue during 1985-86. However, my right hon. and noble Friend aims to introduce improvements in 1986-87 designed to give museums a greater incentive to maximise income for their own benefit.

This provision for the national musuems and galleries includes the continuation of the 1984-85 £½ million allocated for conservation projects, together with a further £1 million for other special needs. The £½ million fund for conservation projects in local museums through the Museums and Galleries Commission will be repeated in 1985-86. The provision borne on the Property Services Agency's vote for the national museums' and galleries' capital building and maintenance programme, which was substantially increased this year, will be further increased by some 15 per cent. in 1985-86, with priority being given to the maintenance and refurbishment of existing buildings. This continued shift of emphasis is being achieved partly by reducing the basic national purchase grants by about 13 per cent. on average, though with no reductions for the smaller institutions.

My right hon. and noble Friend is making a separate announcement about future arrangements for the local museum purchase grant schemes currently administered by the Victoria and Albert Museum and Science Museum. £1½ million is allocated in 1985-86 for the National Heritage memorial fund, and £1 million for acceptances of art objects in lieu of tax, from the arts and libraries programme; matching provision will be made on the Department of the Environment vote. My right hon. and noble Friend is making a separate announcement on the Government's policy towards heritage provision.

Next, subject to Parliamentary approval, my right hon. and noble Friend proposes to increase the statutory ceiling on the public lending right scheme by nearly 40 per cent. to £2¾ million. This will help authors and go some way towards restoring the real value of the ceiling since it was originally fixed. Recurrent provision for the British Library and grants to the Royal Geographical Society, Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts and the British Records Association will be increased by 3 per cent. on average in 1985-86. The allocation on the Property Services Agency's vote covering the British Library's new St. Pancras building project will be more than doubled next year, reflecting the path of expenditure on the first construction phase now under way. The Government's decisions on later stages of the project will be announced in due course.

These allocationns are within the arts and libraries programme total given in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Autumn Statement. Plans for 1986-87 and 1987-88 will be set out in the next Public Expenditure White Paper, and be subject to annual review. They will carry forward the general pattern established in 1985-86.

WALES

Nurses

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the total numbers of (a) full-time state registered nurses, (b) part-time state registered nurses, (c) full-time state enrolled nurses and (d) part-time state enrolled nurses employed by the National Health Service in Wales (i) at 30 September 1978 and (ii) at 31 March 1984; if he will also express the number of state registered nurses and state enrolled nurses, respectively, at each date in whole-time equivalents; and if he will give the ratios for each date of whole-time equivalent state registered nurses to whole-time equivalent state enrolled nurses.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information for 1978 and 1984, collected at the time of the annual September census of NHS staff, is given in the following table:

	30 September 1978	30 September 1984
Number of full-time SRNs	6,666	8,292
Number of part-time SRNs	3,520	3,854
Number of full-time SENs	2,737	3,624
Number of part-time SENs	2,088	2,779
Whole-time equivalent of SRNs	8,654·9	10,567·0
Whole-time equivalent of SENs	4,037·8	5,395·1
Ratio of SRN: SEN (whole-time equivalent)	2·14:1	1·96:1

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the average numbers of hours worked per nurse in Wales in the National Health Service (a) at 30 September 1978 and (b) at 31 March 1984.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is not immediately available. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

Dairy Quotas

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide a breakdown by county in Wales of the percentage of the total quota relinquished under the dairy produce quota scheme and the percentage reallocated, using the latest available data.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: To date 17·9 million litres of quota have been surrendered in Wales under the outgoers scheme. Reallocation of quota will not take place until the purchase of 2·25 per cent. of the England and Wales quota has been completed. Figures are not available on a county basis.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications to the outgoers scheme in relation to the dairy produce quota scheme in Wales he has received to date; how many have been approved; and at what cost.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: 708 applications to join the outgoers scheme were submitted in Wales. So far offers have been made to 639 producers and of these 207 have accepted surrendering some 17·9 million litres of quota at a cost of around £2·3 million over five years.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many exceptional hardship applications he has received to date relating to the dairy produce quota scheme in Wales; and how many he has approved.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: 994 exceptional hardship case claims were received in Wales. These are currently being considered by the dairy produce quota tribunal for England and Wales.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications he has received for a second quota relating to the dairy produce quota scheme in Wales; and how many have been approved at the latest date.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: 4,736 special case claims for secondary quota were received in Wales. These are currently being considered by the dairy produce quota tribunal for England and Wales.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the total milk quota relinquished to date in Wales under the dairy produce quota scheme; and how this compares as a percentage of the total dairy production for the period concerned.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Acceptances of offers made under the outgoers scheme amount to 17·9 million litres in Wales to date (7 December 1984). Milk production in Wales for the period April to October 1984 is provisionally estimated at 984·5 million litres.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications have yet to be dealt with under the dairy produce quota scheme for Wales in the following categories: (a) the outgoers scheme, (b) the exceptional hardship scheme and (c) the second quota scheme.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In Wales 167 producers have yet to accept or decline the offer to join the outgoers scheme, and 69 producers have not yet been invited to join the scheme. The dairy produce quota tribunal are currently considering the 994 exceptional hardship case claims and the 4,736 special case claims submitted in Wales.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many more applications he expects to approve under the dairy produce quota scheme for Wales in the following categories: (a) the outgoers scheme, (b) the exceptional hardships scheme and (c) the second quota scheme.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The intention of the outgoers scheme is to buy in 2·25 per cent. of the total England and Wales quota, and we shall continue to make offers until this target is achieved. No estimates can be made of the outcome of special case and exceptional hardship case claims currently being considered by the dairy produce quota tribunal.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of Wales if he will make a statement on the basis on which judgments for approval are made under the dairy produce quota scheme in the following categories: (a) the outgoers scheme, (b) the exceptional hardship scheme and (c) the second quota scheme; and if he will include any revisions which have been made to the basis for these judgments since its inception.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Under the outgoers scheme priority is being given to the smaller producer who depends mainly upon dairying for his basic income. Exceptional hardship and special case claims are determined by the dairy produce quota tribunal in accordance with published rules of procedure.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if the initial quota to be relinquished under the dairy produce quota scheme in Wales has been revised.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if the basis on which additional quotas are reallocated under the dairy produce quota scheme in Wales has been revised since its inception; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what amount and percentage of the total reallocated quota under the dairy produce quota scheme has not been subsequently taken up in Wales, at the latest date; and what procedure he will be following for its further re-allocation.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Purchase of the required 2·25 per cent. of the England and Wales quota under the outgoers scheme must be completed before reallocation can take place.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the exchange system between wholesale and direct sales quota as it is operating in Wales under the dairy produce quota scheme.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Arrangements are in hand to introduce a system of exchanging direct and wholesale quotas. Consultations are taking place with interested parties with a view to setting up this system as quickly as possible and details will be publicised in due course.

Tourism

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the budget of the Wales Tourist Board for the present financial year; and if he will give the figures for the previous three financial years.

Mr. Edwards: The allocations to the Wales Tourist Board are as follows:

	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	£ million 1984-85
Grant-in-aid	3·172	3·580	3·875	4·565
Assistance to tourist projects	1·911	1·985	1·209	1·800
Total	5·083	5·565	5·084	6·365

Feliheli Bypass

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state (a) from what date a route was protected for the Feliheli bypass on the A487, (b) at what date an inquiry held into possible route alternatives, (c) when work was commenced on detailed plans for the bypass, (d) when he intends to make a decision regarding the definite route for the bypass and (e) when work on the bypass is scheduled to be undertaken.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

River Conwy (Tunnel)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the estimated extra cost of the extension of the tunnel under the Conwy estuary and the adoption of a different form of construction on the western approach to the tunnel.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: About £3·6 million.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Passports

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons British citizens may be refused passports; and how many such refusals took place in each category in 1984 to date, and during each of the previous three years.

Mr. Waddington: United Kingdom nationals may be refused passport facilities only when an application is made in respect of:

(a) A minor whose journey is known to be contrary to a court order, to the wishes of a parent or other person or authority to whom a court has awarded custody, care and control, or to the provisions of section 25(1) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933, as amended, or section 52 of the Adoption Act 1958, as amended;

(b) A person for whose arrest a warrant has been issued in the United Kingdom, or who is wanted by the United Kingdom police on suspicion of a serious crime;

(c) In very rare cases, a person whose past or proposed activities are so demonstrably undesirable that the grant or continued enjoyment of passport facilities would be contrary to the public interest;

(d) A person repatriated at public expense, until the debt has been repaid.

Records of refusals are maintained only for the category (c). These are extremely rare and there were none in the period specified.

Association of Chief Police officers

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list each committee of the Association of Chief Police Officers, the chair of each committee and the composition of each committee.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. The nature and composition of the association's committees are a matter for the association.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will place copies of the minutes of the Association of Chief Police Officers' committee meetings in the Library.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No.

HMS Conqueror (Log Book)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis about the progress of police inquiries into the disappearance of log books from HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that police inquiries into the disappearance of the log books are continuing.

Fire Authorities (Industrial Disputes)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance is given to fire authorities concerning the involvement by firemen in industrial disputes, such as the current miners' dispute, unrelated to their own employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None, This is the responsibility of the management of local authority fire brigades in the light of firemen's conditions of service and the Fire Services (Discipline) Regulations 1948.

Drink Driving

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will continue on a permanent basis the availability of blood and urine tests for persons tested with evidential breath-testing machines; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Blood or urine tests are available under the provisions of the Transport Act 1981 for any person tested with an evidential breath-testing machine whose breath-test reading is between the legal limit of 35 microgrammes per hundred millilitres of breath and 50 microgrammes per hundred millilitres of breath. My right hon. and learned friend will consider whether the non-statutory option of a blood/urine test for those whose breath alcohol readings are over 50 microgrammes, introduced last April, should continue when he receives the report on the six-month experimental monitoring of breath tests by the forensic science service.

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many motorists convicted of drink-driving offences following the introduction of the Lion Intoximeter have subsequently been pardoned; how many such cases are currently under consideration; whether he intends to continue allowing any motorists so charged to take also a blood test; and if he plans to offer any financial compensation to those convicted and subsequently pardoned.

Mr. Mellor: Free pardons have been granted in five cases involving the use of the Lion Intoximeter and recommended in eight others. No other cases of this kind are under consideration. It is not the practice of my right hon. and learned Friend to pay compensation when a free pardon is granted in a case where a non-custodial sentence has been imposed. As to the availability of blood or urine tests, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given today to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels).

Fingerprints and Photographs

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there has been any change in the standard practice of destroying fingerprints and police photographs of persons who have been acquitted; and whether any new guidelines on the subject have recently been issued.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I am aware of no such change. However, the code of practice on identification to be made under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, and already published in draft, will lay down detailed requirements governing the taking and destruction of fingerprints and photographs. Section 64 of the Act itself will require the destruction of fingerprints if the person is cleared of the offence.

Data Protection

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Data Protection Registrar will be made aware of the existence of any certificate which exempts personal data under section 27 of the Data Protection Act.

Mr. Waddington: Part IV of the Data Protection Act 1984 exempts a number of categories of personal data from the provisions of the Act, including data whose exemption is required for the purpose of safeguarding national security: in no case does the Act require the registrar to be made aware of data to which an exemption is being applied. If any question were to arise whether data were properly exempt under section 27 a certificate would at that point need to be produced to justify the exemption.

Visiting Forces Act

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will amend the Visiting Forces Act in such a way as to prevent the United States authorities claiming primary jurisdiction over British law for United States service men who have, in the course of their duties, shot a United Kingdom citizen.

Mr. Mellor: I will reply as soon as possible.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

University Costs (Books)

Mr. Crouch asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how the increase in the cost of books, periodicals and binding compared with the cost of all non-pay items in the index of university costs during the period November 1980 to July 1984.

Mr. Brooke: The indices of changes in university recurrent costs prepared on behalf of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals show that between November 1980 and 1 July 1984 the cost of books, periodicals and binding increased by 68·7 per cent. compared with an increase of 32 per cent. for all non-pay items (the index of non-pay items includes employers' National Insurance contributions and excludes local authority rates).

Classical Languages

Mr. Viggers asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the future of the teaching of classical languages in maintained schools.

Mr. Dunn: The Department's 1981 publication "The School Curriculum" recognised that the study of classical languages introduces pupils to broad aspects of history and culture as well as to the disciplines of language and literature, and suggested that the teaching of classical subjects might benefit if provision were planned as a whole across local education authority areas. The place of classics in the school curriculum was also raised in the Department's discussion paper "The Organisation and Content of the 5-16 Curriculum", issued in September, on which comments were invited. A copy is available in the Library.

Non-invasive Procedures (Research)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what support his Department is giving to research into non-invasive procedures using biofeedback and electrical stimulation techniques to improve motor function after spinal cord injury.

Mr. Brooke: The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid through the Department, is the main Government agency for the promotion of medical research in the United Kingdom. I understand that the coucil is currently supporting projects at Hammersmith hospital and the university of Hull on nerve and muscle function which could prove relevant to spinal cord injury. The council also supports a considerable amount of other basic research which may turn out to have a bearing on this kind of injury.

Parental Contributions

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out a precis of the information available in his Department concerning the numbers of dependent children pertaining to those parents deemed to be paying parental contributions, setting out where possible the numbers of families by family size.

Mr. Brooke: In 1982-83, there were some 255,000 students for whom a parental contribution was assessed. Information on the number of families involved or on family size is not available.

North London Polytechnic

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the polytechnic of north London was last inspected by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: In the last two years Her Majesty's inspectors have inspected and reported on the following courses at the polytechnic of north London:

Course	Date Inspected
Non-graduate certificate of qualification in social work	November 1982
BSc sociology and BA applied social studies	April/May 1983
BA contemporary European studies	April/May 1983
Science and engineering degrees	October 1983

There will be further inspections as appropriate.

Support Grants

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the successful and unsuccessful bids of local education authorities for education support grants.

Sir Keith Joseph: The information requested is shown in the following table:

Student Unions

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will estimate the cost to public funds of contributions on the students' behalf to compulsory membership of student unions;

(2) if he will consider introducing legislation to provide for the voluntary membership of student unions;

(3) if he will estimate the savings to his Department if membership of student unions were made voluntary.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 13 December 1984, c. 594]: Student union funds are allocated from the total resources available to the institution of which the union is a constituent part. The total amount of such funds is not known, but they are substantially used for the provision of welfare, sports and social services within the institutions.

The Government believe that these services need to be provided by one means or another. Thus, any possible saving to public funds resulting from a change to voluntary membership of student unions would be small. Membership of student unions could only be made voluntary through the removal of the existing provisions of charters and statutes, and articles of government, under which such membership is automatic. My right hon. Friend has no intention at present of legislating to amend the status of student unions.

ENVIRONMENT

Building Regulations

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy not to alter the building regulations so as to permit an increase in the heat loss from buildings.

Mr. Gow: My policy is to recast the building regulations so as to simplify them and the procedures involved, while maintaining substantially the standards required, including those for the conservation of fuel and power.

Housing Associations

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many tenants of charitable housing associations are excluded from the right-to-buy provisions of the Housing and Building Control Act because their properties were not funded by the housing association grant section 29 of the Housing Act 1974.

Sir George Young: All tenants of charitable housing associations are excluded from the right to buy because of sections 2(1) and 2(2)(a) of the Housing Act 1980. Some tenants are eligible for the home ownership scheme introduced under section 35 of the Housing and Building Control Act 1984. We estimate that some 80,000 to 100,000 households will be excluded from that scheme solely because housing association grant has not been paid in respect of their homes in accordance with the criteria in section 35(1).

Greater London Development Plan

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will submit the Greater London council's alterations to the Greater London development plan to a public inquiry.

Mr. Macfarlane: No. My right hon. Friend has already announced that he has invoked section 6(1) of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984, which allows him to defer consideration of the GLC's proposed alterations.

Housing (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to expand the capacity of his Department to undertake research and collect information on London's housing to compensate for the loss of the Greater London council's duty to assess London's housing needs, in the event of the Greater London council being abolished.

Sir George Young: No. It will be for the councils of the London boroughs to continue such research as they consider necessary, acting individually or under the collective arrangements provided for by clause 83 of the Local Government Bill.

Local Authority Finance

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider undertaking a survey of those local authorities in coal mining areas to ascertain the financial problems that are arising on expenditure due to the continuation of the miners' strike, with a view to their exemption from financial penalties if the study reveals an increased financial burden.

Mr. Waldegrave: If local authorities ask for such expenditure to be disregarded my right hon. Friend will consider their representations.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will ascertain from local authorities in coal mining areas the extent to which they are incurring extra financial expenditure due to granting financial assistance under the Child Care Act because of the continuation of the mining dispute with a view to exempting them from financial penalties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have nothing to add to my reply of 10 December 1984 at column 395.

Tip Sites (Waste)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will hold a public inquiry into the excavation, transfer and dumping of waste material from the former tip known as the Glory Hole at Eastney, Portsmouth.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend sees no occasion for doing this.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what responsibility his Department has to ensure that the excavation of former tip sites is carried out safely; and what guidelines exist for the excavation, transfer and dumping of waste from such sites which may or may not be toxic.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department has no direct responsibility for the excavation of former tip sites. The issues arising are primarily ones for the local authorities or, in the case of the safety of the workers engaged in the excavation, the Health and Safety Executive. Advice on problems relating to the redevelopment of contaminated land is available from the Department through the interdepartmental committee on the redevelopment of contaminated land. Further advice on the practical aspects of waste disposal is provided by the Department through its publication of waste management papers and through ad hoc guidance.

Empty Houses

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many empty houses in Rutter Close, West Drayton, Middlesex, are owned or managed by the Property Services Agency; when they will be sold or leased; and if he will take urgent action to ensure that they are occupied.

Mr. Gow: There are 46 surplus houses in Rutters Close, of which 43 are vacant. All are owned by the Ministry of Defence. These properties have been passed to the Property Services Agency for disposal. Private agents have been appointed and they will be offered on the open market for sale en bloc by tender early in the new year; 27 February 1985 has been set as the tender closing date. The sale is expected to be completed by early April 1985.

Accumulated Capital Receipts

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) why the regulations covering the case of accumulated capital receipts have been altered and tightened since the scheme was first introduced;

(2) if it is planned to reduce the restrictions currently in existence that prevent the use of all accumulated capital receipts for making good housing defects.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend will be making a statement about the arrangements for capital expenditure programmes later this week.

Rugby Borough Council

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total amount of Government funding provided to Rugby borough council in each year since 1977-78; and how that compares with the amount raised from the authority's domestic ratepayers for the same period.

Mr. Waldegrave: The answer is as follows:

	1977-78	1978-79	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85

.. Not readily available.

Notes:

1. Based on returns from Rugby borough council. 1981-82—1983-84 outturn, 1984-85 budgets.
2. Domestic rates raised are based on Rugby borough council local rate and Warwickshire county council precept, net of domestic rate relief grant (which has also been excluded from the grants shown in the table) and rate rebates.
3. The grants shown are those readily available and do not form a complete list.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much funding has been provided to Rugby borough council under the housing improvement programme for each year since the programme's inception; and how that compares with the amount raised by Rugby borough council.

Sir George Young: Details of the housing investment programme allocations to Rugby borough council since 1978-79 and the amount of its housing capital receipts which the council has been able, since 1981-82, to use to supplement those allocations are as follows:

HIP Allocations and Prescribed proportion of capital receipts arising in year

Local Government Superannuation Scheme

Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he now proposes to take to admit part-time employees into the local government superannuation scheme.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have now made considerable progress in finding solutions to the problems we have faced with these proposals, and my right hon. Friend hopes to be able to make an announcement very soon.

Acceptances in Lieu of Tax

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current position in respect of acceptances in lieu of tax in 1984-85; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The provision in the votes of the Office of Arts and Libraries and the Department of the Environment for acceptances in lieu of tax in 1984-85 is £4 million, including the £2 million towards the purchase of land and chattels at Calke Abbey announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 13 March 1984. During the current year the Government have already accepted drawings by Epstein, a painting by Renoir, sculptures, manuscripts, furniture, and heritage land at Birdoswald and Ty Canol Wood at a cost of £1·4 million. We also expect to conclude other acceptances, and to complete an agreement on Calke Abbey.

These acquisitions represent a successful year for heritage protection, and have been accompanied by a build-up of offers. However, the resources available for acceptances this year and next, which have to provide for the acquisition of Calke, are limited. As a result it will be necessary during the financial years 1984-85 and 1985-86 for the Government to be increasingly highly selective in considering those offers already received and any new ones. In reaching decisions we will look for strong evidence that acceptance in lieu on behalf of the taxpayer, bearing in mind the substantial tax incentive to the offerer, represents especially good value for money.

Provision for the protection of the heritage is already substantial. It is spread over various public programmes, including support for the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission, the purchase grants for public museums and galleries, and assistance through the National Heritage memorial fund as well as acceptances in lieu. The private treaty sale system also provides considerable tax related incentives to both sellers and public collections.

The Government will continue to keep the balance of these provisions, and the scope for their improvement, under review, with the objective of ensuring that the resources available for maintaining the national heritage remain at an appropriate level.

Ordnance Survey

Mr. Wolfson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the continuation of the publishing activities of the Ordnance Survey in the field of road atlases, town plans and guides.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 14 December 1984, c. 655-56]: The Government's policy on the commercial activities of Ordnance Survey has not changed since it was stated in the 'Guidelines for Ordnance Survey Commercial Activities' which were published in July this year.

Nuclear Waste (Billingham)

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why a statement on the proposals to deposit intermediate level nuclear waste in the disused anhydrite mine at Billingham is not to be made before the Christmas recess, as was promised on the occasion of the Minister's visit to the area in October.

Mr. Waldegrave: The appropriate management of nuclear wastes is an important issue, and I know the concern which exists in the hon. Member's constituency. The Government regret that it has not been possible to resolve the matter in the time scale originally envisaged. The Government will not, however, allow the further delay to be prolonged: a statement will be made shortly after Parliament returns. In considering possible sites identified by the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive for disposal facilities, the Government has to have regard to the overall strategy for waste management, as well as to the quasi-judicial function which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would have if a planning application were to be submitted.

Rates Act 1984

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many letters he has received since 17 January concerning the provisions of the Rates Act 1984 from people living in the designated authorities, indicating how many letters have come from people in each constituency covered wholly or in part by the 18 authorities;

(2) if he will publish for each authority designated under the Rates Act 1984 the assumptions he has made in respect of (i) exclusive penny rate products, (ii) expenditure for 1983-84 and 1984-85, (iii) rate fund revenue balances, (iv) special fund balances, (v) capital fund balances, (vi) (a) trading account balances in respect of public transport and (b) other trading account balances, (vii) housing revenue account balances and (viii) balances of other funds and other credit balances excluding those in respect of liabilities, capital discharged and capital receipts, in determining their provisional maximum rates;

(3) if he will publish for each authority designated under the Rates Act 1984 the estimated block grant entitlements he has taken into account in determining the provisional maximum rate; and what are (i) the assumptions made about that authority's expenditure in 1985-86 and (ii) the assumptions made about all non-designated authorities' expenditure in 1985-86, in determining that grant entitlement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I will answer these questions shortly.

Romney Marshes

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Nature Conservancy Council will conduct an inquiry into the effects of the Southern water authority's action in spraying Romney marshes with Dalapan in the spring.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am advised that the Nature Conservancy Council and the Southern water authority intend to undertake a joint research project to look into the effects of herbicides on the flora, fauna and water quality of dykes in the Romney Marsh area. It is proposed to commence a three-year study in the Spring of 1985.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations the Nature Conservancy Council had with the Southern water authority as required under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, section 15 of the Countryside Act 1968 and section 22 of the Water Act 1973 in respect of the spraying of Dalapan on Romney Marshes in the spring.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Nature Conservancy Council and the Southern water authority met recently to discuss the future use of herbicides on Romney Marshes. The water authority has agreed not to spray Dalapan from helicopters within the area notified as a site of special scientific interest, but have not ruled out the localised use of Dalapan or other chemicals within the site of special scientific interest. A further meeting between the water authority and the NCC to discuss the future management of the dykes within the SSSI will be held in January.

PRIME MINISTER

Malta (Bomb Disposal)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government have given any assistance to the Government of Malta for the disposal of unexploded second world war bombs and mines in the waters around the island.

The Prime Minister: In September we provided the services of a Royal Navy hydrographer to advise the Maltese Government on this question. We subsequently indicated to the Maltese Government our readiness to conduct a full hydrographic survey and an underwater search for unexploded ordnance, subject to agreement on terms of reference; and to consider, in the light of any such survey and search what further assistance it might prove possible to offer. Exchanges between the Governments are continuing.

Government Policies (Representations)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Prime Minister on which issues over the last 12 months apart from student grants she has received more than 30,000 representations.

The Prime Minister: There have been two such issues: the 'Save the Swans' campaign against the use of lead by anglers; and a Soviet postcard campaign about disarmament.

International Youth Year

Mr. Murphy asked the Prime Minister how Her Majesty's Government intend to mark International Youth Year.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on 16 November at column 373.

Price Changes (Calculation)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister what measures Her Majesty's Government use of relative price changes beside the retail price index; and whether any of these measure relative price changes affecting elderly people specifically.

The Prime Minister: Besides the retail prices index, commonly used measures of domestic price changes include the producer price indices (the price index for materials and fuel purchased by manufacturing industry and the price index for home sales of manufactured products); the price deflators for gross domestic product and total final expenditure, the consumers' expenditure price deflator and the tax and price index. There are also the quaterly one and two-person pensioner price indices which are specifically designed to show the impact of price changes on the expenditure of one-person and two-person pensioner households.

United Nations General Assembly (Ministerial Speeches)

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether she will set out in tabular form, with dates, those Ministers who have addressed the General Assembly of the United Nations Organisation, or any of its committees, during the current autumn session of the Assembly; and what were the particular debates in which they spoke.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs spoke in the general debate in plenary on 26 September. My hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce), Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, spoke in the general debate of the First Committee on 1 November.

"Consultancy, Inspection and Review Services in Government Departments"

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Prime Minister what recommendations she intends to issue arising from the report released earlier this month by the Civil Service efficiency unit entitled "Consultancy, Inspection and Review Services in Government Departments".

The Prime Minister: The report introduces a further stage in the management reforms begun in 1982, which are intended to ensure that those who work in Government feel a personal responsibility to increase value for money and can act accordingly. I endorse the report's recommendations, which are addressed to Ministers and Permanent Secretaries in charge of Departments. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury announced on 12 December at column 493 the creation of a joint management unit to support top management in the Treasury and Cabinet Office. One of the unit's first tasks will be to assist Departments in implementing the report.

Visits (Far East)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on when she now hopes to make these visits to Kuala Lumpur, Singapore and other capital cities postponed from last September.

The Prime Minister: I hope to be able to reinstate my visit to south-east Asia and Sri Lanka during 1985 but it is not yet possible to take a firm decision on dates.

Digital Equipment Corporation

Mr. Ashdown asked the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government were (a) aware of, (b) consulted about and (c) agreed to the visits made by United States officials from an unknown United States Government agency to the Digital Equipment Corporation offices in Reading in 1982 and 1983.

The Prime Minister: I am informed by the Digital Equipment Company that it has no record of any such visits in 1982 or 1983.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Alvey Programme

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of firms participating in or benefiting from the Alvey programme are (a) defence contractors, (b) not connected with defence contracts and (c) first-time users.

Mr. Pattie: The majority of the 50 or so firms now participating in the Alvey programme have interests in both civil and defence applications of IT but some of the smaller firms are not defence contractors. Generally only experienced users can contribute directly to an advanced technology programme but we have specifically created some clubs to give companies a first exposure to the latest techniques.

British Telecommunications plc

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many employees of British Telecommunications plc there are in Northern Ireland; and how many of these employees it is estimated applied for shares in the recent public offer.

Mr. Butcher: As at 30 November there were 4,845 BT employees in Northern Ireland but a breakdown of applications by geographical area is not available. However, 96 per cent. of all eligible employees in the United Kingdom applied for shares.

Company Share Dealings (Investigations)

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the companies or persons investigated under sections 68 to 70 of the Companies Act 1980 indicating those cases which were referred for prosecution; and if he will arrange for copies of all the investigations to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Fletcher: Dealings in the shares of 73 companies have led to such investigations being undertaken or considered. Each investigation typically involves many individuals. Neither they nor the company are named unless criminal proceedings are instituted. Particulars of the cases brought are as follows:

Defendant	Relevant share	Verdict
John Bryce	Winterbottom Trust Ltd.	Guilty
John Titheridge	Joseph Stocks & Sons (Holdings) Ltd.	Guilty
Joyce Titheridge		Guilty
John Allen Crump Dickenson	Harris & Sheldon Group Ltd.	Guilty
Colin Kettle Neil Thorneywork	Blockley plc	Not guilty
Awaiting trial
David John Brooks Ronald John Hancock	Suter Electrical Ltd.

Car Imports Quotas

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will take steps to encourage Ford and Vauxhall to surrender unused Spanish import quotas to Austin Rover.

Mr. Channon: The Spanish authorities have made no announcement of their allocation of the reduced duty quotas for cars. The details are therefore confidential to the Spanish Government and each company. Before the expiry of the 1983-84 quotas the United Kingdom pressed the Spanish authorities to carry forward and redistribute any unused allocations, and drew attention to Austin Rover's case for benefitting from this. No such carry forward in fact took place although Austin Rover did, we understand, receive an increased allocation. We intend to make similar representations to Spain before the quotas are next renewed.

Cellular Radio

Mr. Ward asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps are being taken to co-ordinate with other European countries the future regulations to cover the second generation of cellular radio.

Mr. Butcher: Work on a harmonised European specification for the second generation of cellular radio is currently being carried out by a special group established by the Conference of European Posts and Telecommunications Administrations (CEPT). The group has been charged with producing an outline specification by the end of 1986 for implementation by the early 1990's. The Department is actively participating in this work.

Licensed Premises (Price Lists)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the recorded figures for complaints made by the public against licensees who have not displayed price lists in their premises in a prominent place.

Mr. Fletcher: I regret that figures for such complaints are not available. If any person considers that a licensee is not complying with the provisions of the Price Marking (Food and Drink on Premises) Order 1979 they should contact their local trading standards department who are responsible for enforcing the legislation.

Assisted Areas (Manchester)

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why in schedule 2 to the Assisted Areas Order 1984 (S.I., 1984, No. 1844), he has designated the city of Manchester intermediate area on the basis of obsolete ward boundaries, so that certain existing wards within the designated area are not listed, wards which have been abolished are listed, and certain existing wards have been designated on obsolete rather than current boundaries.

Mr. Trippier: All travel-to-work areas in England and Wales are defined by reference to 1981 census wards. The Manchester assisted area was defined so as to mesh in smoothly with those adjoining travel-to-work areas which are assisted.

Regional Development Grant

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what has been the average time between application and first payment of regional development grant prior to recent changes;

(2) what he expects to be the average time interval between first application and the first payment of regional development grants under the procedures announced on 28 November.

Mr. Trippier: Regional development grants under the old scheme are paid in respect of approved expenditure incurred in providing new capital assets on qualifying premises. In the period 6 January 1984 to 14 September 1984 the average time between the receipt of an application for grant and the payment of grant was just under seven weeks. Under the new scheme grant will be payable in respect of new capital assets provided, or jobs created, within the context of an approved project.

The average interval between a claim for grant and the payment of grant will depend on a range of factors, in particular the volume of claims. When claimants and staff have experience of the new system it should be possible to make payments in respect of claims within about the same time as hitherto under the old scheme.

Information Technology

Dr McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report a list of all the Government or Government-sponsored organisations concerned with the promotion of information technology, research and development into information technology, its application to industry, and the training of experts in information technology.

Mr. Butcher: In the time available the following Government or Government-sponsored organisations have been identified as being concerned on a continuing basis with the activities listed in the question:

Department of Trade and Industry and associated research establishments.
Department of Education and Science.
Ministry of Defence and associated research establishments.
Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency, Treasury.
Manpower Services Commission.
The Information Technology Advisory Panel.
The British Information Technology Export Organisation (EXPORT IT).
The National Computing Centre.
United Kingdom AEA Harwell.
The Civil Service college.
The Federation of Microsystems Centres.
The University Consortium for Industrial Numerical Analysis.
The United Kingdom Council for Computing Development.
The British Standards Institute.
The Production Engineering Research Association.
The Machine Tools Industry Research Association.
The Engineering Industry Training Board.
The IT Users Standards Association.
The National Computer User Forum.
The joint networks team of the Computer Board and Research Councils.
The National Interactive Video Centre.
The Engineering Council.
The British Technology Group.
The Advisory Body of Research Councils.
The Advisory Council on Advanced Research and Development.
The Business and Technicians Education Council.
Information Technology Education Centres (149).
Science and Technology Regional Organisations (40).

In addition a large number of individual firms or other organisations receive financial support for specific projects. The Government obviously has responsibility for the funding of IT-related activities in universities and polytechnics.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the total amount of Government financial support for information technology for each year from 1978-79.

Mr. Butcher: The Department of Trade and Industry's financial support for electronics and information technology is published with information on other research and development support in annual DTI reports. The report for 1978-79 is entitled "Research and Development Requirements and Programmes Report"; the more recent reports are entitled "Research and Development Report". The report for 1983-84 is to be published on 31 January 1985.

Tourism

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the present annual budgets for (a) the English Tourist Board and (b) the British Tourist Authority; and if he will give similar figures for the previous three financial years.

Mr. Butcher: The following table shows the sums of money provided by my Department to these boards including money for grants under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969. The figures for 1984-85 are estimates.

	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
English Tourist Board	8·6	10·4	8·6	8·8
Section 4 grants	4·0	4·5	6·3	8·4
British Tourist Authority	16·2	18·1	17·0	16·8
Total	28·8	33·0	31·9	34·0

Hotel and Catering Industry

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how the changes in development area status affect grants for improvements or new building work in the hotel and catering industry in what were development or assisted areas.

Mr. Trippier: Regional selective assistance is rarely given to the hotel and catering industry because tourism and tourism-related projects are normally considered for selective aid under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969, which covers the whole of Great Britain. The changes to the assisted areas will not affect assistance under that Act, which is available for all types of tourism development. Selective regional assistance will be available to eligible projects on the basis of the old map of assisted areas provided that the application was received before 28 November.

Regional development grants have been available in respect of approved capital expenditure incurred on the provision of new capital assets (including buildings and works) on premises used wholly or mainly for qualifying activities. The premises had to be in a development (or special development) area. The hotel and catering industry as such was not a qualifying activity, but industrial canteens were typically located on qualifying premises.

Grant is still payable under the old scheme, and on the basis of the former map of assisted areas, in respect of expenditure defrayed before 29 November 1984, assets provided before 29 November 1985, or assets provided under certain categories of project in receipt of selective assistance or of an offer of such assistance made before 29 November 1984.

Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to make an announcement about the future of the loan guarantee scheme beyond the end of 1984.

Mr. Trippier: I have decided that, although the experimental scheme has not fulfilled its original goal of breaking even, it should be extended for a further year to the end of 1985. However, in order to contain costs, I am imposing a ceiling on lending in the calendar year 1985 of £50 million. The main terms of the scheme will remain unchanged, with the Government guaranteeing 70 per cent. of loans made by participating lenders and charging a 5 per cent. premium on the amount guaranteed. As now, no personal security will be taken on scheme loans but in future where an applicant has such security which he is unwilling to pledge against a commercial loan he will not be eligible for a scheme loan. In order to improve the survival rate amongst scheme borrowers, I shall be asking lenders to insist on minimum standards of appraisal and financial reporting from all applicants.

Regional Development Grant

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much has been paid out in regional development grants for (a) oil-related projects and (b) other projects in the Kirkcaldy and Dunfermline travel-to-work areas in each year since 1979; and how many companies have benefited.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I have been asked to reply.

I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

ENERGY

Nuclear Plants and Facilities

12. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the negotiations between the United Kingdom Government and Euratom concerning a mutually satisfactory inspection regime for British nuclear plants and facilities.

Mr. Goodlad: All civil nuclear facilities in the United Kingdom with the exception of the mixed civil-military processing plants at Springfields and Sellafield are regularly inspected by the Eurotom Safeguards organ isation. The United Kingdom Government have made proposals to Eurotam for inspection regimes for these plants which take account of the fact that they handle both civil and military material. These proposals are at present under consideration by Euratom.

Departmental Running Costs

19. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Energy what further action he is taking to control the total running costs of his Department.

Mr. Peter Walker: My Department is continuing its successful action to reduce running costs. Its cash provision for running costs in 1985-86 is expected to be approximately the same as its expenditure two years earlier, representing a reduction of roughly 9 per cent. in real terms.

Electricity Generation

23. Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy what financial support his Department gives towards research and investment for the building of an economic, non-pollutant coal gasification plant for the provision of electricity generating capacity.

Mr. David Hunt: The Department of Energy is providing up to £500,000 for a study of a commercial-scale power station using British Gas coal gasification technology. This technology offers the prospect of substantially reduced sulphur emissions without the economic penalties associated with established sulphur removal processes.

28. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of electricity generated by the Central Electricity Generating Board was produced from coal, on a fuel used basis, for the period March to September; and how this compares with the same period in 1983.

Mr. Goodlad: On a fuel used basis, 52 per cent. of the electricity produced by the Central Electricity Generating Board in the period March to September 1984 was derived from coal compared with 81 per cent. in the equivalent period in 1983.

Redundant Mineworkers Payments Scheme

24. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with representatives of opencast coal mining workers about the redundant mineworkers payments scheme.

Mr. David Hunt: In discussion with representatives of the Transport and General Workers Union, my right hon.

Friend has pointed out that the prospects for opencast mining appear to be good and unlikely to give rise to large-scale redundancies consequent upon restructuring.

Coal Industry Dispute

25. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the effects of the mining dispute.

27. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the dispute in the mining industry.

31. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the latest developments in the dispute between the National Coal Board and the miners on strike.

37. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he will next meet the chairman of the National Coal Board to consider the current dispute in the coal industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: I refer hon. Members to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth).

Solent (Oil Exploration)

26. Mr. Ottaway asked the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received concerning the allocation of a licence to Shell (UK) Ltd. to search for oil in the Solent.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have received representations from a number of people and organisations. Virtually all have been concerned about protection of the environment and the amenity of the area.

35. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has received from the Shell company for the deployment of exploration rigs in the Solent.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: No plans have been received and none are expected in the near future. Further geological surveys have to be undertaken before any proposals for drilling can be prepared. No well can be drilled without my consent.

Coal Industry (Subsidy)

29. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the total of public funds used to subsidise the coal industry since 1954; and if he will give any figures he has for comparable data for other Western countries.

Mr. David Hunt: Since 1954, grants accrued in the NCB's accounts, capital write-offs and expenditure on the redundant mineworkers payments scheme have totalled over £5 billion. I regret that comparable figures over this period for other Western countries are not available.

Opencast Mining (Ayrshire)

30. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Energy what recent discussions he has had with the National Coal Board on opencast mining in Ayrshire.

Mr. David Hunt: None.

Wind Power

32. Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on experiments currently funded by his Department in the field of wind power.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department is funding the construction of a 3-megawatt, 60-metre diameter wind turbine on Orkney and a novel 25-metre diameter vertical axis machine at Carmarthen bay, together with supporting research. Studies carried out by the Department show that wind power seems to be one of the most attractive renewable sources for generating electricity. We therefore intend to continue research and development to find out how large, and how cost-effective, a contribution it could make to electricity supply in Britain.

Energy Efficiency Scheme (Grants)

33. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many applications his Department has received for grants under the energy efficiency scheme since its inception on 1 January; and what proportion of those applications has been successful.

Mr. David Hunt: Up until 6 December 1984, the Energy Efficiency Office had received the following applications for energy efficiency survey grants:

Extended surveys	:	535
Short surveys	:	1809
Combined heat & power feasibility studies	:	14

Virtually all applications were successful: only one application for an extended and four applications for short surveys were rejected. Eleven further applicants for extended survey grants were advised to apply for short survey grants instead.

We expect surveys carried out with the aid of these grants—totalling £1·4 million—to identify savings worth over £60 million a year.

Energy Efficiency Office

34. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many local authorities have contacted the Energy Efficiency Office, in the current financial year, to seek advice on energy management.

Mr. David Hunt: Over 250 local authorities have already sought advice from the Energy Efficiency Office.

Mining Industry (Workers' Co-operatives)

36. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will consider encouraging the setting up of workers' co-operatives in the mining industry.

Mr. David Hunt: I have stated that I am always willing to consider any such proposal, but the NUM has shown no enthusiasm for this approach.

Nuclear Plants (Safeguards)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy how the erasing of information from the computer memory of Central Electricity Generating Board computers on the isotopic composition of plutonium created in the United Kingdom civil nuclear power programme facilitates the implementations of safeguards in British nuclear plants and facilities.

Mr. Goodlad: All the data required by the safeguards authorities regarding isotopic composition of discharged fuel are available at individual power stations.

North Sea

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the amount of North sea supply work secured by British-owned firms.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: In 1983 the total value of orders reported by operators for oil and gas development work on the United Kingdom continental shelf was £2·61 billion. British based companies won 72 per cent.—£1·88 billion—of these orders.

Separate records are not kept of the value of orders won by British owned companies.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list for the years 1975 to 1984 the numbers of workers employed in North sea related work (a) onshore in Scotland and (b) offshore.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I have been asked to reply.

The information in the form requested is not available. Total employment in firms in Scotland identified by the Manpower Services Commission as being wholly related to North sea oil and gas activity is estimated to have been as follows for the period 1975-1984.

June	Thousands
1975	20·1
1976	27·1
1977	28·6
1978	34·0
1979	41·8
1980	46·3
1981	50·0
1982	58·3
1983	63·3
1984	64·0

These figures include offshore work undertaken by companies in Scotland but do not include employment in oil-related construction projects in Scotland or in firms partly involved in oil and oil-related activity.

Offshore employment in the United Kingdom sector of the northern North sea (ie the waters east of Scotland and in the Shetland basin) is estimated to have been in the following ranges.

	Offshore Employment
June 1980	21,000	to 23,000
July 1981	23,000	to 25,500
July 1982	21,500	to 24,000
July 1983	26,500	to 28,500

The figures are based on the Inland Revenue survey of offshore employment in companies with offshore production and exploration licences for blocks on the UKCS. They should not be directly compared with the MSC figures on employment in wholly oil-related firms in Scotland because of differences in coverage and method of compilation.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many (a) pipe-laying barges, (b) oil rigs and (c) supply vessels now operating in the North sea are registered in Britain.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The information requested at November 1984 is, respectively, (a) None (b) 14 and (c) 118.

Mr. Ian MacGregor

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will place in the Library the full text of the compensation agreement between the Government and Lazard Freres for the release of Mr. Ian MacGregor to become chairman of the National Coal Board.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply of 30 October 1984 at columns 879-80.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hong Kong (Refugees)

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration he has given to the British Refugee Council's report on the closed camps of Hong Kong; and what action he is taking.

Mr. Luce: I have received a copy of the British Refugee Council's report "Behind Barbed Wire". This is being carefully considered. I shall be discussing those recommendations which fall within the responsibility of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office with members of the Asia committee of the British Refugee Council.

Five Continents Peace Initiative

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the five continents peace initiative.

Mr. Luce: As I said in my answer of 27 June to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) we share the conviction of the signatories of the appeal that there must never be another world war. We believe that security between East and West would be better improved by the negotiation of balanced reductions in the weapons of the superpowers than by a freeze. We have therefore unreservedly welcomed the meeting between Mr. Shultz and Mr. Gromyko in January which we hope will lead to agreement on how to carry forward the process of negotiating arms control agreements covering both nuclear and outer space questions.

Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he will be making to the third review conference of the non-proliferation treaty in Geneva in September 1985; and what parliamentary representation he proposes.

Mr. Luce: The non-proliferation treaty is one of the most important arms control agreements. It has contributed substantially to the security of contracting parties. The British delegation to the 1985 review conference will speak strongly in its support.

The level of Ministerial representation at the 1985 review conference has yet to be decided but will be such as to underline our very firm commitment to the NPT.

Falkland Islands

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what fishing controls exist around the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Renton: Beyond the three-mile limit there are no special fishing controls. We are actively considering the possibility of establishing an exclusive fisheries limit (EFL) around the Falkland Islands. As the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs recognise in its report, this raises a number of complex issues. No decisions have yet been taken.

Peking (Embassy)

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give a breakdown by strength of Department of the number of staff currently based at the embassy in Peking.

Mr. Renton: The establishment of our embassy in Peking broken down by Department is:

Ambassador
Personal assistant

Chancery
Counsellor
Two first secretaries
One second secretary
One second secretary (also employed on information work)
Three secreterial staff
Two locally engaged staff

Commercial Department
Counsellor
First secretary
Second secretary
Attache
Three United Kingdom based support staff
One locally engaged officer.
Commercial work in southern China is covered by the China trade unit in the British Trade Commission in Hong Kong which is staffed by a first and second secretary with 1·5 locally engaged staff.

Economic Section
First secretary

Information Section
See Chancery
One part time locally engaged employee

Consular and Immigration Section
One first secretary
One attache
One United Kingdom-based support staff
4·5 locally engaged staff

Science and Technology
Second secretary

Administration, Communications and General Support
First secretary
Attache
15 United Kingdom-based support staff
39 locally-engaged staff

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any plans to increase the strength of the commercial section of the Peking embassy.

Mr. Renton: There are no plans to increase the strength of the commercial section of the embassy in Peking. The re-opening of a consulate general in Shanghai in the first half of 1985 will improve our commercial coverage in that important area of China.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those individuals who are currently based with the commercial section of the Peking embassy and state each of their responsibilities.

Mr. Renton: There are eight United Kingdom based officers in the commercial section of the British embassy in Peking.

H. L. Davies, Counsellor (commercial)
He supervises the work of the commercial section in Peking and the China trade unit in Hong Kong.

S. J. Towlson, First secretary (commercial) and deputy to the counsellor (commercial).
Special responsibility for:
Guangdong Nuclear Project
Steel and non-ferrous metals
Medical Telecommunications
Scientific instruments
Power generation
Electronics
Banking, invisibles, ECGD Exhibition policy
Construction, tourism
Patents, copyright, trademark
Commercial law
British Consultants Bureau
Minerals (non-metallic)
Joint ventures

W. D. W. Dennis, First secretary (economic).
Special responsibility for:
Economic affairs
Energy (Oil, Coal, Gas)
Energy conservation
Technical co-operation
CBI scholarships
Information technology
UN agencies
World Bank
Commercial section computerisation programme

J. Harrod, Second secretary (commercial).
Special responsibility for:
Shanghai consulate
Environmental protection
Roads, railways
Ships, shipping
Chemicals, petrochemicals
Advertising Publishing
Education

C. Haswell, Attache (commercial).
Special responsibility for:
Agriculture
Automotive industry
Mechanical engineering, machine tools
Aerospace
Textiles, textile machinery
Food processing, packaging
Light industry
Exhibitions
Forthcoming events

Miss S. Bennett, Attache.
Special responsibility for:
Commercial archives
Projection and exhibition equipment
Export intelligence service notices
Press
Trade statistics

Miss N. James, Secretarial duties
Miss L. Franklin, Secretarial duties

Messrs. Davies, Dennis, Harrod and Haswell speak Chinese.

In addition the section has clerical support from one locally engaged member of staff.

Embassies

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the current strength of the commercial section of each of the United Kingdom's embassies.

Mr. Renton: It is not possible to provide the information requested in the time available. I will write to my hon. Friend.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Waste Material (Dumping at Sea)

Mr. Hancock asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions have taken place regarding the dumping at sea of waste material excavated from the site known as the Glory Hole at Eastleigh, Portsmouth; and how his Department ensures that no danger can occur to marine life or the environment.

Mr. MacGregor: My Department received in April 1984 an application to dump at sea material to be excavated from the site known as the Glory Hole at Eastney, Portsmouth. The applicant was informed in July 1984 that a licence would not be granted. At the same time he was asked whether he wished to discuss the matter with officials but this offer has not so far been taken up. In the meantime the city of Portsmouth planning department have indicated that it would wish to be present at any such meeting.

In considering dumping at sea licence applications my Directorate of Fisheries Research provides scientific advice on the likely implications for the marine environment and the living resources it supports.

Mr. Hancock asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his Department's present policy with regard to the dumping of waste material at sea; and what guidelines are published.

Mr. MacGregor: My Department's policy on sea dumping is governed by the requirement of the Dumping at Sea Act 1974, also contained in part II of the Food and Environment Protection Bill now before Parliament, whereby the licensing authority has to have regard to the need to protect the marine environment and its living resources from any adverse consequences of dumping operations. Full account is taken of the provision of, and of the decisions arising from, the Oslo and London dumping conventions and of scientific advice provided by my Directorate of Fisheries Research. Before dumping licences are granted for applications which satisfy these requirements, consideration is given as to whether sea dumping represents the best practicable environmental option for the wastes concerned.

Dumping licences vary considerably and each application has to be considered individually on its merits in the light of the relevant legislation and international considerations. Guidelines are, however, provided by the relevant annexes of the Oslo and London conventions.

Soil Survey

Mr. Lilley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether any action is to be taken on recommendation 54 of the Rothschild White Paper, "Framework for Government Research and Development", Cmnd. 4814, November 1971, that a review of the Soil Survey of England and Wales should be held.

Mrs. Fenner: Action was taken and the White Paper "Framework for Government Research and Development" Cmnd. 5046, July 1972, paragraph 56, stated that the Soil Survey of England and Wales would continue to be a research council responsibility, but the funds for its financing would be transferred to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food as from 1973-74.

Cereals

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what reduction in the price of cereals would be required to eliminate the present surplus in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: It is not possible to estimate accurately the price cut needed to reduce production by any given amount. Producers' planting decisions are affected by other factors such as the profitability of other enterprises and the development of new varieties. This does not however detract from the need for the Community to pursue a sustained policy of price restraint if the cereals market is to be brought into a better balance.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to what extent common agricultural policy prices are linked to changes in the value of the deutschmark against other currencies in the European currency unit currency basket; and if he will publish in the Official Report the percentage increase in United Kingdom common agricultural policy prices which would result from, respectively, an increase of 10 per cent. in the value of the deutschmark and a fall of 10 per cent. in sterling, all other things remaining the same.

Mr. MacGregor: For three years from April 1984 the creation of new fixed positive monetary compensatory amounts (MCAs) will be avoided. During this period at each realignment of currencies in the European monetary system (EMS), the coefficient used in calculating MCAs will be adjusted to the extent that the "strongest" currency — that is the currency which revalues most — is revalued. The currency concerned can in principle be any one of the currencies maintained within the narrow margins of fluctation under the EMS and would not therefore necessarily be the Deutschmark.

Adjustment of this coefficient would not directly affect CAP prices but could lead to extra negative MCAs for some member states. Removal of these negative MCAs by green rate devaluations would increase national support prices in the member states concerned but the Commission has undertaken to take account of the need to avoid disturbing the market balance for agricultural products or to aggravate inflation in the countries concerned before proposing any such devaluations. A change in the value of the Deutschmark or of sterling has no affect on CAP support prices in the United Kingdom. Only a change in the level of the representative rate for CAP purposes—the "green pound"—or a change in common prices expressed in European currency units affect support prices.

Rapeseed

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the effect the elimination of the subsidy on crushing domestically-produced rapeseed would have on production of rapeseed in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: The effect of the removal of the rapeseed crushing subsidy would be that crushers would not buy Community seed except where world prices were at or above Community levels. The seed not purchased by crushers would be sold into intervention or exported with the aid of export refunds. This should not greatly change the returns to growers. If the whole of the rapeseed support system were removed, but the support systems for other arable crops remained in place, most growers would no doubt opt to switch out of rapeseed production unless world prices were very firm.

Nuclear Winter

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give an estimate of the quantities of seed, fertilisers and fuel which would be required to restore agricultural production following protracted cold and dark caused by the atmospheric effects of a nuclear conflict.

Mrs. Fenner: No meaningful estimate can be given in view of the large number of assumptions required to forecast the possible effects of such conflict.

Dairy Farming

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what number of individuals serving on local panels allocating secondary milk production in Wales have detailed knowledge and experience of dairy farming.

Mr. MacGregor: Ministers have appointed as members of local panels persons of proven judgment and experience from many walks of life. A large proportion of all panel members have a detailed knowledge of farming, particularly dairy farming, and others have been professionally concerned with rural matters. In Wales 22 of the 33 panel members are or have been dairy farmers.

Potato Marketing Board

Sir Philip Holland asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received since June 1983 from potato growers urging him to withdraw financial support fom the Potato Marketing Board; whether he now considers that this body has outlived its usefulness; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: Although I have received some representations on the subject, the future of the Potato Marketing Board is a matter for producers. Proposed amendments to the potato marketing scheme have been thoroughly debated within the industry and a public inquiry recently considered the views of objectors.

The Government reviewed their role in potato market support earlier this year and concluded that both consumers and producers benefited from the relative stability which a limited managed market framework could provide. While this implied a continuing need for Government funding, the proposals following from that review will limit the commitment to a greater degree in future.

Mineral Waters

Mr. Hirst asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects that the regulations about mineral water to be made under EEC directive 80/777/EEC will be tabled and approved by Parliament.

Mrs. Fenner: We expect to lay before Parliament during January new regulations relating to the exploitation and marketing of natural mineral waters which implement EC directive 80/777.

Farm Capital Grants

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the value of the cutback imposed on Northern Ireland in the measures announced by the Minister in his recent statement of changes in farm capital grants.

Mr. Jopling: The changes announced on 11 December 1984 apply throughout the United Kingdom and about £13 million of the estimated savings in 1985-86 are expected to arise in Northern Ireland.

Sea Fish Industry Authority (Development Programme)

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is in a position to make a statement about the progress of the European Community's examination of the Sea Fish Industry Authority's development programme in accordance with article 93(2) of the treaty of Rome.

Mr. MacGregor: I am pleased to be able to announce that the European Commission has now given its approval to over three-quarters of the authority's development programme. This means that the authority will now be able to press ahead with its campaign to improve the marketing of fish in the United Kingdom, for which the Government have pledged £7·9 million towards the authority's proposed spending of £14 million over the first three years.

This is very good news indeed. The authority can now start its multi-million pound campaign to get fish increasingly on the menu.

A substantial amount of money will be spent on specific schemes to improve the freshness and quality of fish from the moment it is taken from the sea to the point of sale to the customer. It took both the authority and the Government some time to work out an effective and commercially-oriented programme, and I am delighted that it now has the approval of the Commission.

The first instalment of this Exchequer contribution will be paid next month. Discussion will be resumed early next year on the few remaining items in respect of which the Commission has sought additional information. Our aim will be to bring these to a satisfactory outcome as quickly as possible.

Milk

Mr. William Ross asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which European Economic Community member states have technical and administrative difficulties concerning the application of the milk supplementary levy.

Mr. MacGregor: The Agriculture Commissioner told the Council on 11 December that, apart from Luxembourg, all the member states where there might be a liability to supplementary levy this month had made the individual quotas known to their producers. The extent to which special cases and other administrative details had been completed varied considerably, but all member states still have some problems to resolve.

Mr. William Ross asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which European Economic Community member states have produced over their milk quota to date or for such periods for which figures are available.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. William Ross asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which European Economic Community member states have adopted a system of milk quotas based on dairies; and of these which have dairies which have to date exceeded that quota.

Mr. MacGregor: The following EC member states have adopted milk quotas according to formula B (ie based on wholesale milk deliveries to purchasers): Denmark, France, Greece, Ireland and Luxembourg.

We do not have information about the quotas issued to individual dairies in these member states. However, Denmark and France have both stated that they are within quota for the first half year, though the Commission is challenging the latter. Greece is not liable for levy until the end of 1984-85. Ireland and Luxembourg both appear to be above their quotas for the first half year. In the United Kingdom quotas are applied through Formula B in Great Britain where deliveries are within the purchaser quotas issued.

Mr. Speller asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the EEC member countries penalised for being believed to have produced more milk than is allowed under the Community quota scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: In making its calculations of funds to be advanced to member states for financing expenditure on the CAP during December, the Commission has made allowances for the revenue estimated to be due under the supplementary levy. This affects the advances to all member states except Denmark, Greece and Italy.

We are fully committed to the milk supplementary levy arrangements agreed by the Agriculture Council in March. It is clear from last week's Council discussion and from the position adopted by other member states that there are differences in the interpretation of the rules and uncertainty about the amount of levy due. We are, therefore, suspending action for the time being. We are keeping the situation under review and are ready to collect and pay over any levies that may be due from us once the legal position becomes clearer and other member states are conforming to the requirements.

EMPLOYMENT

Information Technology Centres

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) whom he consulted outside of Government, and when, before publishing his recent proposals on the financing of information technology centres; and what was the result of those consultations;

(2) what consultations he had with information technology centres before publishing his recent proposals for their future financing; and what was the result of these consultations.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The basis on which the Manpower Services Commission funds information technology centres has not changed, except for the additional funding which the commission is providing until October 1985. Centre sponsors and managers have been aware from the outset that the funding from the Department of Trade and Industry was for pump-priming purposes for a limited period only. I have not therefore carried out the widespread consultations referred to. The announcement I made in my reply to my hon. Friend the member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) on 7 November 1984, at columns, 2-3, should encourage centres to continue their development and thus enhance our efforts to accelerate training in new technology.

Long-term Unemployed

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many of the long-term unemployed, that is those out of work for one year or longer, have no formal qualifications; and what were the comparable figures for 1974 and 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: Results from the 1983 labour force survey indicate that in the second quarter of 1983 there were 1,213,000 persons in Great Britain aged 16 to 59 without a job who were looking for work in the week before the survey and had been seeking for more than a year. Of these, 726,000 had no educational or vocational qualifications. The corresponding figures from the 1979 survey were 288,000 and 207,000, respectively. There was no labour force survey in 1974.

Young Persons

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what statistical evidence he has that unemployment and wage rates for young people are correlated.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There have been a number of studies in recent years which indicate that the employment prospects of young people have been adversely affected by high levels of earnings relative to adults. These include work within the Department which is summarised in Department of Employment research paper No. 42. A survey of international evidence, published in the OECD "Employment Outlook" of September 1984, reached similar conclusions.

Methyl Isocyanate

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has about the use in Britain of methyl isocyanate.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Methyl isocyanate is used in the factory of Ciba Geigy at Grimsby in the manufacture of Thiazofluron, an active ingredient for herbicides. It was used in 1981 in the manufacture of insecticide at the FBC factory at Hauxton, Cambridgeshire. Since that time no insecticide has been made at the factory and only small quantities have been used for laboratory experiments. Some other premises use small quantities for research purposes.

Job Creation

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he has introduced to improve the creation of jobs in London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government are committed to maintaining their economic policies, which are directed at holding down inflation and public borrowing, while encouraging greater enterprise, flexibility and competitiveness in industry and the labour market. This is the best way to secure real, lasting growth in output and jobs in London and elsewhere. We are bringing direct help to large numbers of unemployed people in the area through our special employment and training measures, such as the enterprise allowance scheme which is currently helping almost 4,000 people in London to set up in business, and is to be further extended next year. London will also benefit this year from nearly £57 million of urban programme aid, a substantial proportion of which will be devoted to job creation projects.

Community Programme

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will estimate (a) how many married women and (b) how many married men will become ineligible for places on the community programme under recent changes;

(2) if he will indicate (a) how many married women and (b) how many married men who would not now be eligible under recent rule changes have had places on the community programme in the 12 months preceding the change.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) on 9 November 1984, at columns 27-28.

British Association for Commercial and Industrial Education

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what research has been commissioned by him or the Manpower Services Commission from the British Association for Commercial and Industrial Education in the last five years; which of this research has been published; which remains incomplete; and which has been completed but not published.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In the past five years the Department of Employment has not commissioned any research from the British Association for Commercial and Industrial Education. The Manpower Services Commission has commissioned one project of this nature. In December 1982 it was asked to report on the training information system in the United Kingdom, with particular reference to the needs and resources of non-statutory training organisations. The report has been completed, but there are no plans at present to publish it.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on employment trends in the manufacturing and service sectors.

Mr. Alan Clark: The employed labour force in Great Britain increased by 28,000—seasonally adjusted—in the second quarter of 1984. Within this total the number of employees in service industries increased by 36,000 and the number in manufacturing industries increased by 3,000.

Computer Operators (Newcastle)

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of computer operators at present registered as unemployed in the Newcastle on Tyne travel-to-work area.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about occupation is not available in the unemployment benefit office records on which the unemployment count is based.

Industrial Training Boards and Skillcentres

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many proposals for new courses and projects have been (a) made and (b) approved in the last two years in respect of skillcentres that have been proposed for closure.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 14 December 1984, c. 631]: In the skillcentres proposed for closure the skillcentre training agency has introduced in the last two years 27 wholly new adult training classes for the Manpower Services Commission's training division. This is in addition to the normal upgrading of existing provision in line with industrial requirements and technological change. Some 64 tailor-made courses have also been run exclusively for employers. There is no approval system for new courses, which are negotiated on a commercial basis.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what research has been (a) commissioned, (b) completed and (c) published at the instigation of himself or the Manpower Services Commission since 1979 into the role of industrial training boards, including the effectiveness of voluntary arrangements to replace the functions of former statutory industrial training boards; and if he will give a progress report of all such research not yet published and a list of all such research.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 14 December 1984, c. 631]: In the course of the review of the Employment and Training Act 1973, research was commissioned into aspects of the roles of industrial training boards. Details are contained in the report "Outlook on Training" published by the Manpower Services Commission in July 1980. The Manpower Services Commission subsequently undertook a review of future training arrangements in each sector of the economy which in July 1981 was published in the report "A Framework for the Future".

No further research has been commissioned by this Department or the Manpower Services Commission into the role of industrial training boards or non-statutory training organisations. I understand, however, that officials are preparing an information paper to be put to the commission in the near future, though there are no plans for publication.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has about the profitability of skillcentres that have been proposed for closure.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 14 December 1984, c. 631]: The expected outturn in 1984-85 for each of the skillcentres proposed for closure is as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Executive (Accountability)

40. Mr. Canavan asked the Lord Privy Seal whether he will introduce measures to make the Executive more accountable to the Legislature.

Mr. Biffen: Parliamentary accountability is a continuing factor in the conduct of government.

CIVIL SERVICE

Civil Servants (Confidential Material)

45. Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister for the Civil Service how many civil servants have been disciplined in the last two years for breaches of trust in relation to confidential material; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on 6 February 1984, it would not be appropriate for me to give details of this kind.

Trade Union Discussions

46. Mr. Parry asked the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met representatives of trade unions in the Civil Service; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to the oral answer I gave today to the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley).

Disabled Persons

Mr. Thurnham asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will list the number of registered disabled people employed in Government Departments in the years 1979 to 1984 expressed as a percentage of the total number of employees in each Department.

Mr. Hayhoe: The numbers of registered disabled people employed by Government Departments are collected once a year, as at 1 June. The numbers of registered disabled people employed by Government Departments in the years 1979 to 1984, expressed as a percentage of the total number of employees in each department, were:

SOCIAL SERVICES

Prescriptions

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultation he had with the Committee on Safety of Medicines before deciding to impose restrictions on certain medicines hitherto prescribed on the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: None. Our limited list will set out the range of drugs available on the National Health Service in the therapeutic categories concerned to meet all clinical needs. Consideration of this matter seems to me to be quite distinct from the work of the committee which, under the Medicines Act 1968 and Community legislation, advises on whether medicines of all kinds should, taking into account safety, efficacy and quality, be authorised for marketing in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements he intends to make in respect of patients in general practitioner local hospitals who receive drugs under the hospital formulary which will not be available on prescription under the National Health Service on their discharge, under the minimum list proposals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Limited list arrangements will apply throughout the National Health Service. Our proposals aim to provide effective low cost medicines to meet all clinical needs in the small number of therapeutic categories affected. If there are differences of significance between these proposals and the 400 or so local hospital formularies in existence we would expect these to be reflected in the comments we receive during the course of consultation.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will outline the current methods of supervision and scrutiny of the costs of drug prescribing by general practitioners under the National Health Service; and why he considers them to be inadequate.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The present system of prescription monitoring is undertaken by our Department in conjunction with the Prescription Pricing Authority. Prescribers whose costs are above average are visited by our regional medical officers, who also discuss prescribing topics in the course of their regular contacts with general practitioners. While such contacts have proved useful in individual cases the already excessive drugs bill continues to rise and we have concluded that other measures are necessary to constrain it.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will set out in tabular form, for each regional health authority, the cost of drugs prescribed by general practioners for the latest available 12-month period and the number of prescriptions written, indicating whether there are any significant regional variations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The numbers and net ingredient costs of prescriptions dispensed by chemists and appliance contractors in each of the regional health authorities in the 12-month period ending 31 August 1984 are as follows:

Regional health authority	Number of prescriptions	Total net ingredient cost (£s)

Many factors including demographic differences and morbidity patterns contribute to regional variations but we are not able to quantify the effect of any one particular factor.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will list the drugs available for prescription under the hospital formulary which will not also be available under limited list prescribing.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Hospital formularies are drawn up on an individual hospital or health authority basis. There are some 400 in existence and the drugs they cover at the moment will not necessarily be the same as the final list of drugs to remain available on the National Health Service in each of the groups covered by our limited list proposals. We will not finally decide which drugs will no longer be prescribable at public expense through the National Health Service until after our consultation with the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the drugs industry is complete.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he intends to make to compensate companies for losses in sales occasioned by their products being excluded from National Health Service availability under his limited list proposals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I do not believe that a customer would ordinarily compensate a vendor if the customer decided to buy alternative products.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement as to the effectiveness hitherto of the guidance issued to doctors in his Department's cost charts on the costs of prescribable medicines in containing expenditure regarding those groups of medicines to be included in his proposals for limited list prescribing.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Doctors find our cost comparison charts useful in pointing to the wide variations in costs between similar drugs. So many factors influence prescribing that it is not possible to isolate the impact of the charts in particular therapeutic categories, though there can be no doubt that they have one.

Oglesby Report

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how far he has now implemented the recommendations of the Oglesby report; and whether any administrative savings have resulted.

Mr. Newton: I assume my hon. Friend is referring to the Oglesby report on mobility allowance and attendance allowance procedures and medical adjudication. So far we have implemented 14 of the report's recommendations, all of which should improve the quality of service to the public. It is not possible to estimate the extent to which they may have produced administrative savings. The average time taken between claim and receipt of first payment has reduced since March 1983 from 16 to 10 weeks for mobility allowance and from 12·5 to 10 weeks for attendance allowance.

Roche Products Ltd.

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from Roche Products Ltd. concerning his proposals for limited list prescribing; what response he is making; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our officials have already met representatives of the company. We cannot give a final response to their representations until we have completed our consultations. We will consider arguments they put forward about the completeness of the provisional list of drugs with care.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Cabora asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps his Department is taking to encourage those people so entitled to claim supplementary benefit.

Mr. Whitney: We continue to seek to promote take-up by issuing a claim form to all retirement pensioners and widows, all unemployed claimants and all sickness benefit claimants, and by co-operating as fully as possible at local level with well-organised take-up campaigns mounted by local authorities. We have also introduced a free phone information and advice service throughout the whole country except at present London postal districts.

Pensioners

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of pensioners with gross incomes (a) over £20,000, (b) between £10,000 and £20,000, (c) between £5,000 and £10,000 and (d) receiving supplementary benefit; and if he will break down each figure into the following categories: (i) lone pensioners, (ii) married couples and (iii) any other types of family unit.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Still Births

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total number of still births in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. John Patten: The table gives the information in respect of England and Wales.

Year	Number
1974	7,175
1975	6,295
1976	5,709
1977	5,405
1978	5,108
1979	5,125
1980	4,773
1981	4,207
1982	3,939
1983	3,631

Funerals (Payments)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will estimate the number of supplementary benefit claimants who claimed a single payment for help towards the cost of a funeral in each of the past 10 years; and whether he will calculate the total costs of such payments;

(2) whether he will estimate the average of single payments made to supplementary benefit claimants for help towards funeral costs in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Whitney: Figures on supplementary benefit single payments for funeral expenses are not yet available for 1983, nor are any available for years before 1981. The table shows the approximate number, total amount paid and average amount of such awards recorded in the annual statistical inquiries of December 1981 and December 1982 respectively. Because these figures relate to payments made during the 12 months preceding each enquiry to claimants still in receipt of supplementary benefit at the time of the inquiry, they are an under-estimate of the total number and overall cost of such payments made during the year. Figures are not available on the number of people who claimed such payments (as opposed to the number of payments actually made).

Date of annual statistical inquiry	Number of payments	Average amount	Total amount paid
December 1981	11,000	165	1·8
December 1982	12,500	210	2·6

NHS (Treatment Statistics)

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) females over 60 years of age and (b) males over 65 years of age received treatment under the National Health Service in 1982-83.

Mr. John Patten: Information on age is available for National Health Service inpatients only. In 1982, the latest year for which this information is available, there were an estimated 694,700 male inpatient cases aged 65 and over and 993,900 female inpatient cases aged 60 and over.

Heart Operations (Manchester)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many National Health Service patients from the north-west have so far been taken to London hospitals for heart operations in 1984; how many were referred by consultants in south Manchester; and what the total cost has been.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available centrally. The right hon. Member may wish to approach the chairman of the North-West regional health authority for the information he seeks.

Disabled Persons (Hospital Treatment)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration his Department has given to the findings of the report of the nursing studies research unit at Edinburgh university on the problems faced by disabled people entering hospital; what action he is taking with regard to each of the report's recommendations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I am not aware that the report has been made available to nursing interests in England but I understand that the authors are preparing papers for wider circulation. In the meantime I understand that the report is being studied by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Hip Replacement Operation

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the minimum, maximum and average length of waiting time for a hip replacement operation in each regional health authority; and how many people on these waiting lists died before their operation in each of the last three years.

Mr. John Patten: Information on minimum and maximum waiting times for inpatient treatment is not available from the sample date held centrally. The estimated median interval between the date a patient was placed on the waiting list and the date of admission to an NHS hospital in each of the 14 regional health authorities for the latest three years for which information is available centrally is given in the table. Information on deaths occurring to people while they are on a hospital waiting list is not available centrally.

* Estimates relate to first six months of 1982 only.

† 1982 figures for the four Thames regions and SHAs/BGs are not strictly comparable with earlier figures because of NHS re-organisation. In particular, the Royal National orthopaedic hospital, formerly managed by a board of governors, came under the administration of North East Thames Regional health authority in April 1982. The central sample information relating to BGs/SHAs is now too small for reliable estimates to be made of such operations in 1982.

Hospitals (Hygiene and Nutrition)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what measures are being taken to improve hygiene standards in hospitals and residential establishments; and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government for improving nutritional standards in hospitals.

Mr. John Patten: We have no reason to believe that the general standards of hygiene are unsatisfactory. We expect nutritious food to be provided for patients and the Department has given health authorities advice on this.

Marginal Tax Rates

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide the latest figures, derived from the family expenditure survey, of the numbers of (a) working families with children and (b) working persons without children with an effective marginal tax rate of (i) 60 per cent. or more, (ii) 70 per cent. or more and (iii) 100 per cent. or more; in each case what percentage of all working families and persons these figures represent; and if he will give an estimate of the current position.

Mr. Whitney: I regret the exact information requested is not available. The family expenditure survey data have been analysed to give estimates of working families with various ranges of marginal tax rates but not precisely those requested. The latest estimates derived wholly from these data relate to 1981. Further tentative estimates have been made of the current position. The available information is shown in the table:

*Estimated number of working families with marginal tax rates of 50 per cent. or more

Marginal tax rate (per cent.)	1981		†Current position
	Number	Percentage of appropriate group of working families	Number	Percentage of appropriate group of working families
Families with children
50 or more	260,000	about 4½	300,000	about 5
75 or more	60,000	about 1	210,000	about 3½
100 and over	10,000	about ½	not known	not known
Families without children
50 and over‡	70,000	about ¾	60,000	about ½

* Excludes families subject to higher rates of income tax.

† These estimates do not take account of the numbers taken out of tax as a result of the April 1984 Budget. It is estimated that up to 20,000 families with marginal tax rates of 50 per cent. or over will have been affected in this way.

‡ The sample numbers are too small to allow further analysis.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of all those in receipt of standard housing benefit with an income (a) above the needs allowance and (b) below the needs allowance have children; and, in each case, what percentage of those below pension age have children.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

School Children (Dietary Survey)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish the results of the dietary survey of school children referred to by the Prime Minister on 21 February, Official Report, column 457; and whether his Department is undertaking or commissioning any other research relating to nutritional intake.

Mr. John Patten: I understand that preliminary findings from the dietary survey of schoolchildren are expected to be available in spring 1985. Nutritional surveys of particular groups within the population are undertaken from time to time, and I expect the Department to continue to commission these as the need arises.

Departmental Staff (Medical Qualifications)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many civil servants in his Department are medically qualified; and how many of them have practical experience of working as general practitioners within the last five years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: On 1 November 1984 there were 312 medically qualified civil servants working in medical posts in our Department. We estimate that about 50 of these will have worked as general practitioners within the last five years. This includes all those appointed within that time to the regional medical service and the majority of those appointed to the division dealing with the medical aspects of social security. Doctors going to other posts only occasionally come directly from general practice, although a number have been recruited direct from posts in hospital practice.

Single Payments Regulations (Washing Machines)

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why washing machines are not classed as items for reimbursement under regulation 9*(a)*(i) of the Single Payment Regulations (S.I., 1981, No. 1528); if he will consider so including them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: A single payment of supplementary benefit for a washing machine may be made under regulation 9 (i) of the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulations 1981 to a claimant who would have been entitled to a weekly addition to benefit for laundry costs but for the fact that there is no laundry or launderette in the area which the claimant's family can reasonably be expected to use; or, if there is one, the claimant or his partner cannot use it because of illness, disability or lack of public transport.

Occupational Pensions

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of retirement pensioners have occupational pensions.

Mr. Whitney: The latest available figures taken from the 1982 family expenditure survey showed that 60 per cent. of men aged 65 and over and 21 per cent. of women aged 60 and over had occupational pensions. Overall, 35 per cent. of people over state retirement age were then in receipt of occupational pensions.

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information about individual occupational pension schemes is held by the Occupational Pensions Board.

Mr. Whitney: The Occupational Pensions Board maintains joint files with the superannuation funds office of the Inland Revenue. However the board's primary concern is with occupational pension schemes which are contracted-out from the state earnings-related pension scheme. Although these cover about 90 per cent. of scheme members, they account for only about 15 per cent. of all current schemes.

When a scheme first seeks approval under the Finance Acts or applies for contracted-out status, it is required to submit a copy of its deeds and rules. Contracted-out schemes are also required to submit, for the Occupational Pensions Board's approval, any proposed amendment to their deeds and rules which might affect their contracted-out status; and they must also supply regular actuarial certificates confirming the continuing solvency of the scheme with respect to its contracted-out liabilities.

Self-administered schemes which are contracted-out must provide the board with an annual statement confirming that the accounts are complete and have been audited, that contributions have been paid in accordance with the scheme actuary's recommendations, and that the actuary is aware of any substantial changes relevant to his current certificate. The statement must also indicate the extent of any self-investment or concentration of investment of scheme assets.

In the case of insured schemes which are contracted-out, the board requires an annual statement from the life office concerned confirming that premiums have been paid as required by the scheme actuary and that the membership details held by the life office are up to date. Contracted-out schemes are also required to notify the Occupational Pensions Board of any changes to the scheme name, employer's name, or the participating employers. They must also tell the board if the scheme is wound up.

There are no other requirements on schemes to keep the information held by the Occupational Pensions Board up to date or to submit annual reports or other information. Some information is submitted voluntarily by schemes seeking advice on whether they are complying with the statutory requirements for preservation of benefits for early leavers and equal access to schemes for men and women.

Pensions

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the average gross pension, retirement pension and second pension, being awarded to people retiring now.

Mr. Whitney: The latest available information on state retirement pension shows that in the six months to September 1983 the average new award was £27·60; this average includes pensions payable to people overseas, small payments of graduated retirement benefit and retirement pensions for wonen awarded on the basis of either their own or their husband's national insurance contributions. The average amount of new awards of occupational pensions is estimated at approximately £35 a week. This estimate is derived from the Government Actuary's 1983 survey of occupational pension schemes and includes occupational pensions in payment to people under state pension age.

Retirement Pensioners

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total number of retirement pensioners; and what is the total number of pensioner family units.

Mr. Whitney: At September 1983, the latest date for which information is available, there were 9,192,000 people receiving a retirement pension in Great Britain, including people who receive only small amounts of pension by way of graduated retirement benefit. Estimates derived from family expenditure survey data indicate that in 1982 there were some 6,290,000 family units in Great Britain headed by a retirement pensioner.

Midwifery Services

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many whole-time equivalent vacancies there are for staff midwives, midwifery sisters and senior nurses in midwifery.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect information of this nature centrally.

Perinatal Inquiry Committees

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which maternity liaison committees have set up confidential perinatal inquiry committees to collect information and collate reports.

Mr. John Patten: The most recent information on the extent of perinatal confidential inquiries is that given in 1983 to the Social Services Committee and published as part of appendix 1 of the Committee's third report, session 1983-84. We shall be calling for reports in due course on the action taken by health authorities in implementing the Reports of the maternity services advisory committee, which recommended both the establishment of maternity service liaison committees, and that such committees should encourage perinatal confidential inquiries to be set up.

Advisory Committee on Medical Manpower Planning

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to publish the report of the advisory committee on medical manpower planning.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We hope to publish the report in the near future.

Kidneys and Smoking-related Diseases (Member's Questions)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why, pursuant to his answer of 20 November, Official Report, column 127, he has not yet given a substantial reply to the questions from the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East relating to smoking-related diseases and kidney transplants; when he expects to make a substantive reply; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I replied to the hon. Member on 22 November at column 241 and on 14 December at column 665.

Aspartame

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is currently considering Professor Richard Wurtman's tests on the sweetener aspartame.

Mr. John Patten: The independent expert advisory committee on the toxicity of chemicals in food, consumer products and the environment last considered data relating to Dr. Wurtman's studies in 1983. The Department's medical staff continue to monitor information on aspartame, and would seek the committee's advice if significant new information about its effects was produced.

Portable Cordless Telephones

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department will seek to obtain details of the findings of recent research done in the United States of America into the effects on hearing of portable cordless telephones.

Mr. Newton: I have put the necessary inquiries in hand.

Mrs. Anne Wood

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why Mrs. Anne Wood of 37 Netheridge avenue, Lichfield, Staffordshire, has not received the child benefit due to her since 20 June; why the child benefit office in Washington new town has disregarded her written instruction to pay the sum due to her into either her bank or building society accounts; and if he will ensure that this matter is resolved before Christmas.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that some confusion, resulting in part from industrial action, led to Mrs. Wood's child benefit claim being delayed. The problems have been resolved and she should receive her arrears within a few days.

Invalid Three-wheeler Cars

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide the latest available data as to the number of petrol-driven three-wheelers for the disabled licensed for road use, and the number of those in reserve stock.

Mr. Newton: On 1 December 1984 the United Kingdom Health Departments' fleet of petrol-driven invalid three-wheelers consisted of 7,454 licensed vehicles on issue to disabled people, 1,426 licensed vehicles in reserve, and 2,013 unlicensed vehicles in store. The Departments also have some invalid three-wheelers powered by electricity. Two hundred and thiry five are on issue, 40 are in reserve, and 301 are in store.

Child Benefit

Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the maximum delay in a person entitled to child benefit asking for it to be paid direct into a bank account and the necessary arrangements for this to be done to be made.

Mr. Whitney: Payment of child benefit by credit transfer is made every four weeks in arrears. The arrangments for a straightforward new claim are such that the first credit should be available within six weeks of a claim being received. When an existing beneficiary asks to change to credit transfer, the change will usually take place after her current order book has expired. A child benefit order book normally covers a 20 week period. Recently there have been delays due to industrial action at Washington child benefit centre.

Supplementary Benefit (Leaflet S.10)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that leaflet S.10 concerning information for claimants about changes in supplementary benefit for couples was correctly drafted.

Mr. Whitney: One inaccuracy in this leaflet was noted by the Department subsequent to its publication. At line 13 on page 2 it was not made clear that one of the conditions for being the claimant when a claim is received on behalf of a couple is receipt of supplementary benefit to care for a relative or a severely disabled person for 6 months before the claim. This leaflet is no longer issued to claimants, but if the hon. Member is aware of any difficulties which it has caused, I would be grateful if he would let me know.

Sale of Optical Appliances Order 1984

Mrs. Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps his Department is taking to monitor compliance with the regulations laid down in the Sale of Optical Appliances Order 1984; and to whom complaints about alleged breaches of the regulations should be made.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I see no reason to make special arrangements to monitor compliance with these regulations.

Complaints about breaches of any of the prescribed conditions of the Sale of Optical Appliances Order 1984 can be laid on written information before a magistrate. Breaches of the regulations will be a criminal offence under the Opticians Act 1958 and could result in a fine of £1,000. In addition, failure to observe the conditions would be a breach of contract between the consumer and retailer and open to redress through the courts.

Mrs. Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will include in publicity material issued by his Department in connection with the Sale of Optical Appliances Order 1984 a reminder that it remains illegal to provide reading glasses without a prescription from a qualified opthalmic optician or ophthalmic medical practitioner.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. The guide published by our Department is quite clear on what is permitted and what is not.

Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State (Visit)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for what reasons the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abington (Mr. Patten) visited the Woolworth store in Edgware road, Westminister, on Monday 10 December.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Sale of Optical Appliances Order of Council 1984 came into effect on 10 December to permit the sale of spectacles by unregistered suppliers. This marked an important day for the Government's policy of encouraging competition in the interests of consumers and my hon. Friend called to see for himself some examples of the wider range of low-priced spectacles already on the market.

SCOTLAND

Health Expenditure

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the most recent figures for the distribution of health expenditure for each Scottish region expressed in per capita terms and categorised according to (a) hospital services expenditure, (b) community health and family practitioners' services expenditure and (c) total expenditure.

Mr. John MacKay: The figures for 1983-84 are as follows:

£ per capita

Health Boards	Hospital Services	Community Health and Family Practitioner services	Administration and Related services	Total
Argyll and Clyde	168·37	81·96	12·83	263·16

Western Isles	144·07	101·53	20·46	266·06

Notes:

1. The expenditure figures used are taken from the annual accounts submitted to the Department by health boards, and are net of charges retained by family practitioners.
2. The population figures used are the mid-year estimates of resident population for 1983.
3. The column headed "Administration and Related Services" shows expenditure on health boards headquarters, on area nurse training, on local health councils and other items not in the category of patient services.
4. The figures do not include expenditure on support services provided by the Common Services Agency which was £10·63 per capita in Scotland as a whole; or expenditure on the main capital programme, which was £12·38 per capita.

The distribution of funds to health boards in Scotland is determined by population weighted according to age, sex and local mortality rates, by the amount of health care provided for patients from neighbouring areas—cross-border flow—by teaching hospital costs, by a number of other commitments, and also by the extent to which individual boards benefit by the operation of the resources equalisation process. It is therefore not possible to draw reliable conclusions from comparisons of per capita expenditure by health board based on resident population figures which make no allowances for these factors.

Broad-leaved Trees

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce measures to ensure that as a general principle where broad-leaved trees are felled grant aid should only be available for re-stocking with broad-leaved trees.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission already has a general presumption in favour of broad-leaved woodland normally being re-stocked with broad-leaved species.

Disabled Persons (Hospital Treatment)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration his Department has given to the findings of the report of the nursing studies research unit at Edinburgh university on the problems faced by disabled people entering hospital; what action he is taking with regard to each of the report's recommendations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The Scottish Home and Health Department is at present studying this comprehensive report, and considering what action it should take with regard to the proposals for improvements made in it. It line with normal practice, the nursing research unit has made arrangements for the report to be made available to nursing interests generally. In particular, copies have been sent to the chief administrative nursing officers of all health boards. The authors are also preparing further papers on their work for wider publication in relevant professional journals.

Selective Financial Assistance

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications for selective financial assistance he has received in (a) the month up to 28 November and (b) the year up to 28 November; and if he will take steps to ensure that all applications will be processed by the end of March 1985.

Mr. Allan Stewart: One hundred and thirty five applications for selective financial assistance for projects in Scotland were received in the month up to 28 November 1984 and 443 in the year to 28 November 1984. Arrangements have been made to have all applications received before 29 November 1984 processed by 29 March 1985.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much he has paid out in selective financial assistance to companies in the Dunfermline and Kirkcaldy travel-to-work areas from 1979 onwards; and how many companies have received help.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Age Concern

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will increase the amount of financial aid given to the organisation Age Concern Scotland in the next financial year.

Mr. John MacKay: Age Concern Scotland has not yet submitted any application for grant assistance by my right hon. Friend for 1985-86. Once an application is made, the amount of grant to be provided will be assessed in the context of the total resources available.

Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what amounts of grant have been awarded to the Scottish Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders under section 10 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 in the present year and in each of the past three years.

Mr. John MacKay: The amount of grant paid in the past three years has been as follows:

1981-82	114,649
1982-83	122,928
1983-84	139,319

The grant offered for the current financial year is £150,000.

Police Houses

Mr. Fairbairn asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many police houses there are in each of the regions of Scotland; and how many have been sold and how many are held vacant in each region.

Mr. Ancram [pursuant to his reply, 12 December 1984, c. 507]: The latest available information, which is for the period up to the end of 1983 and is in respect of police authority areas, is set out as follows:

Police Authority	Numbers of police houses	Numbers vacant	Numbers sold (since 1 April 1981)

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details, by police force area, of the total numbers of arrests to the latest available date in connection with the coal strike, and indicate the number of arrests by offence charged with, the sentences on conviction and the numbers still awaiting trial.

Mr. Ancram [pursuant to his reply, 19 November 1984, c. 20]: The latest information available centrally about (a) the number of arrests in each Scottish police force area in connection with the dispute in the mining industry, (b) the sentences on conviction, and (c) the numbers awaiting trial is as follows. Information on the offences in respect of which charges have been brought by procurators fiscal is contained in the reply which my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General for Scotland gave to the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) on 4 December at column 102.

(a) Arrests (to 7 December)

Police Force Area	Number of arrests
Central Scotland	38
Dumfries and Galloway	3
Fife	217
Grampian	Nil
Lothian and Borders	432
Northern	Nil
Strathclyde	703
Tayside	13
	1,406

(b) Sentences on conviction (to 16 November)

Police Force Area	Imprisonment	Fined	Admonished	Compensation order	Community Service order	Total
Dumfries and Galloway	—	2	—	2	—	4
Fife	—	12	4	—	—	16
Lothian and Borders	2	61	3	—	1	67
Strathclyde	—	107	11	—	—	118
Tayside	—	13	4	2	—	19
	2	195	22	4	1	224

Note: These figures relate to sentences: individual persons may have received more than one sentence.

(c) Awaiting trial

As at 28 November, 583 persons were awaiting trial. This figure relates only to those persons who have tendered a plea of not guilty and for whom a diet of trial has been fixed. There are a number of other outstanding cases where the accused is on petition but a decision on whether or not to proceed with the case has still to be taken and no trial diet has therefore been fixed. There are also other outstanding summary proceedings where the accused has not yet appeared in court to answer a complaint or where proceedings have been continued without plea.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Free School Meals

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many schoolchildren now receive free school meals in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: 91,293 in October 1983—the latest date for which statistical information is available.

Primary Schools

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much was spent per pupil at primary schools in Northern Ireland in real terms in 1978 and in the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Scott: The average current expenditure from public funds at 1983-84 prices is estimated at £559 in the financial year 1978-79 and £622 in 1983-84.

Housing

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many houses were built or completed in (a) the private sector and (b) the public sector in Northern Ireland in each year since 1954; and what is the estimate for 1985;

(2) if he will list the various housing subsidies and grants payable for the building, improvement and repair of dwellings in Northern Ireland since 1954, the periods in which they were payable and the maximum amounts in each case up to the recent most convenient date.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Mentally Handicapped Persons

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what consideration his Department has given to transferring responsibility for the schooling of mentally handicapped children from the health and social services authorities to the education authorities in Northern Ireland; and what conclusions he has reached;

(2) if he will bring forward legislation to give mentally handicapped children in Northern Ireland a legal right to education.

Mr. Hurd: Following public consultation on the issue and after careful consideration of the many views expressed, the Government have decided that responsibility for the education of these children should be transferred to the education service. The Government take the view that it is in the interests of the children concerned for their educational needs to be met through the statutory system of education as it applies to all other children rather than, as at present, through health and social services boards. To give effect to this decision, new legislation will be required and I shall be making the necessary arrangements to bring appropriate proposals before the House in due course.

The transfer of responsibility which this decision will entail will create new demands on the education sector and will also have practical consequences for health and social services boards in terms of service provision and facilities particularly in respect of mentally handicapped adults. The aim will be to make the best possible use of existing resources, but additional funding will also be made available in the light of the different demands facing education and library boards and health and social services boards in consequence of the Government's decision.

A period of detailed planning will be necessary and education and library boards will now be asked to take this forward in conjunction with the health and social services boards and the Departments concerned. This will take some time as will the preparation of the necessary amending legislation. Nevertheless, our aim is to have legislation approved by the end of 1986 and to effect the transfer in the spring of 1987. The legislation proposals will include provision for the protection of staff affected by the decision and their relevant staff organisations will be fully consulted.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will make a statement outlining the nature and extent of current provision for the mentally handicapped in Northern Ireland, what the Government's aims and objectives are in making such provision and whether he is satisfied that this provision will meet those objectives;

(2) if he will improve the provision of resources for adult training centres and social education centres for the mentally handicapped in Northern Ireland;

(3) if he will make a statement on the provision of sheltered employment for the mentally handicapped in Northern Ireland;

(4) if he will make a statement on the Government's attitude to and role in the dispute in the Western board area arising from the sole deployment of young help workers as day centre bus assistants and the ICTU directive; and if he will suggest to the board that it employs full staff members to assist those using the buses or redeploy care assistants on short hours to do this work with the support of young help workers;

(5) whether the Government feel it is acceptable or proper for areas of work to be undertaken solely by persons on the young help scheme rather than by permanent staff with the assistance of young helpers.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Gas Supplies (Republic of Ireland)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what costs have been incurred to date as a result of the plans, now discarded by Her Majesty's Government, to bring gas to Northern Ireland from the Republic of Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Incident (Linden Street)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if any police disciplinary action has been taken against any officers who took part in the Royal Ulster Constabulary Land Rover patrol in the vicinity of Linden street, Belfast, on 9 July 1981.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 7 December 1984, c. 298]: Following consideration of the incident by the Royal Ulster Constabulary's complaints and discipline branch the deputy chief constable decided that disciplinary charges should not be brought against any of the police officers involved. A report was made to the independent Police Complaints Board which concurred with his decision.

Plastic Bullets

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many formal complaints have been made about incidents of police use of plastic baton rounds in each year since 1979; in how many cases the complaint has been upheld; and in how many cases disciplinary action has been taken against the officers involved.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 7 December 1984, c. 298]: The information is as follows:

Complaints against police use of plastic baton rounds

Year	Complaints Received	Complaints Upheld	Disciplinary Action Taken
1979	None	None	None
1980	6	None	None
1981	60	*1	1
1982	6	None	None
1983	5	None	None
†1984	7	None	None

* The investigation of one case is in abeyance pending the result of litigation being pursued by the complainant.
† To 30 November 1984.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons have been injured by the use of plastic baton rounds in the Province to the latest available date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 10 December 1984, c. 349]: Since 17 March 1981, when records where first collated, 247 people are recorded as having been injured by plastic baton rounds. Police investigations of a further 50 cases where baton round injuries were alleged, have established that the injuries were not caused by this means.

Public Authority Housing (Demolition)

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list all the public authority housing built in Northern Ireland since 1960 which has been demolished or is scheduled for demolition and estimate the value by district council area.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have been informed by the chairman of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive that the available information is as follows:

Dwellings demolished or scheduled for demolition

District Council area and estate	Number of dwellings
(i) Belfast
Turf Lodge	294
Moyard	204
Divis	259
Blackmountain	210
Lower Shankill	283

It is not possible to value these properties on a common basis; many had no market value before demolition and in some instances demolition was required to improve the amenity of adjacent properties.

Newry-Dundalk (Port Improvement)

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will indicate, in relation to the two options to improve the route between Newry and Dundalk, the mileage in each case which lies within Northern Ireland and within the Irish Republic, and the estimated cost of each option.

Mr. Chris Patten: The two main options considered in the Newry-Dundalk road study report are:

1. Construction of a new route through Glendooey.
2. Improvement to the existing road through Ravensdale forest.

The first option has two variants and the second option three variants, reflecting differences in extent and standards of work involved. Distances and costs of each are as follows:

Variant	Total distance	Northern Ireland distance	Republic of Ireland distance	Total cost £ million
1a	8·43	6·20	2·23	7·6

Young Help Scheme

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the use of the young help scheme by health and social services boards in Northern Ireland outlining all regulations and guidelines relevant to the boards' use of the scheme.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested cannot be provided in the time available. I will write to the hon. Gentleman about the matters raised.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing the numbers working for each health and social service board in Northern Ireland under the young help scheme, the work they do and what permanent staff they are working with.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Cigarettes

Mr. Proctor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out in the Official Report a table showing the number of minutes which need to be worked in order to purchase 20 cigarettes in each EEC country; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that the information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Sterling Balances

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy towards official sterling balances.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

2p and 5p Coins

Mr. David Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures showing the real value of today's 5p and 2p pieces in 1930, 1940, 1950, 1960 and 1970; and which coins at the relevant dates would have come nearest to representing these values.

Mr. Lawson: I shall let my right hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Penny Coin

Mr. David Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what savings would be obtained by abolishing the penny.

Mr. Lawson: I shall let my right hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Tax Allowances and Child Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in real terms in (a) tax allowances since the temporary 1979-80 rates introduced by the Finance Act 1979 and (b) child benefit since April 1979, specifying in each case any assumptions used.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

European Economic Community (Budget)

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what way the Fontainebleau own resources formula and United Kingdom rebate for 1984 are linked to an agreement by the United Kingdom Parliament to a reimburseable loan for the 1984 European Economic Community Budget.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Fontainebleau own resources formula and the United Kingdom rebate for 1984 were not made conditional on the United Kingdom Parliament's agreement to supplementary finance for the 1984 EEC Budget.

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what extent United Kingdom agreement to a reimburseable loan extending 1984 Community expenditure will lead to an increase in United Kingdom net contributions for 1984 and in total.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The United Kingdom's gross contribution to Community institutions in 1984-85 will be increased by £119 million. This advance will be substantially offset by agricultural receipts.

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when, and how, the reimburseable loan to the European Economic Community is to be paid and repaid.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The United Kingdom's proposed advance to the Community under the inter-Governmental agreement will not be paid before there is Parliamentary authority for that. The Commission has undertaken to make proposals in due course for reimbursement.

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list his powers to make payment to the European Economic Community of a reimbursable loan for commitments in excess of the 1 per cent. value added tax ceiling.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No payment of the United Kingdom's proposed advance to the Community under the inter-Governmental agreement of 2-3 October will be made without Parliament's authority.

Lump Sum Retirement Payments (Taxation)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the tax yield from taxing lump sum payments on retirement.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Single Parent Families

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government have any proposals to enable working women who are single parents to recover income tax relief in respect of necessary payments by them to child minders and nannies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Nationalised Industries (Shares)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the study he conducted on the free distribution of shares in nationalised industries.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Jack Lacey

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Her Majesty's Government were (a) aware of, (b) consulted about and (c) agreed to the visit made by Mr. Jack Lacey, who claimed to be from United States customs, to Plasma Technology in Avon on 16 July.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Caravan Sites (Taxation)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Inland Revenue has turned down any applications from owners of touring caravan pitches and third party static caravan pitches to be taxed under schedule D clause 1 since the implementation of the Finance Act 1984.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

National Insurance Pensions (Taxation)

Mr. Higgins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people have been charged income tax on their national insurance pensions before the pension has been paid because of the industrial action in the Department of Health and Social Security.

Mr. Lawson: I shall let my right hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Occupational Pension Schemes

Mr. Galley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information about individual occupational pension schemes is held by the Superannuation Funds Office.

Mr. John Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Alcoholic Beverages (Taxation)

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue effect per penny of reducing total tax charges, excise duty plus value added tax on beer, spirits and low, medium and high strength wines, respectively, expressed in £ million at 1985-86 prices.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Oil Taxation

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the average percentage tax take per barrel of oil in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Norway.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

TRANSPORT

M1 Motorway

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to extend the southern sections of the M1 motorway to four lanes.

Mrs. Chalker: There are no schemes in the Government's current trunk road programme for further widening of the southern sections of the M1.

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents per mile there have been on the M1 motorway in each of the last four years; and how this compares with other motorways and with major trunk roads.

Mrs. Chalker: Comparison of accident rates on different roads and different types of road is most meaningfully done by looking at accidents per vehicle mile. On that basis the information sought is, for England, as follows:

		Accidents per million vehicle miles
M1	1979	0·28
	1980	0·28
	1981	0·28
	1982	0·28
	1983	0·26
All motorways	1980-82	0·23
All trunk roads	1980-82	0·60

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents there have been on the M1 motorway in each of the last five years; how many fatalities have resulted and how many people have been injured; and in which county these accidents have occurred.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested is as follows:

		Bedfordshire	Buckinghamshire	Derbyshire	Greater London	Hertfordshire	Leicestershire	Northamptonshire	Nottinghamshire	South Yorkshire	West Yorkshire	Total

Further data are available in tables 4 and 8 of Road Accident Statistics English Regions 1982, a copy of which is in the Library.

Air and Water Pollution (Felixstowe Docks)

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Transport, what steps he is taking to ensure that appropriate precautions are taken against the possible discharge to air or water of polluting elements associated with transport or methyl isocyanate from Felixstowe docks to chemical plants in East Anglia and York hire.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand from the Health and Safety Executive that it is aware of infrequent consignments of methyl isocyanate from Felixstowe to Grimsby. It is transported in sealed stainless steel drums inside a freight container. The drums and their labelling and handling comply with the relevant national and international standards and with the existing and proposed regulations, and they are checked for any sign of leakage before being stored. The position will be reviewed in the light of the investigation into the Bhopal disaster.

Stoke-Derby Link and Etwall Bypass

Mrs Currie asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on progress on the Stoke-Derby link road and the Etwall bypass in the south Derbyshire constituency; and if he can yet give dates for the start of construction of these roads.

Mrs. Chalker: I regret that progress on these schemes has been delayed by difficulties in updating the original traffic model. The consultants' report is not now expected until the spring of 1985. It will be some months before decisions can be made about order publication or start dates for construction. However as soon as the full data and information is received, the Department will proceed as quickly as possible to the next stage.

Car Radios (Traffic Information Systems)

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to make the fitment of radio traffic information systems obligatory on radios fitted to all new cars.

Mrs. Chalker: We have no plans for such legislation.

London Regional Transport (Grants)

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce his proposals for the levy on London's ratepayers in support of his grants to London Regional Transport for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: Under section 13 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984, I am empowered to make a levy on London ratepayers to cover up to two-thirds of the cost of my total grants to London Regional Transport for 1985-86. Accordingly I have today laid before Parliament a draft levy order, which is subject to affirmative resolution. This provides for a levy of 10·80 pence in the pound, estimated to raise £212 million. This is equivalent to 65·6 per cent. of my estimated expenditure on grants to LRT in 1985-86 of £323 million; the balance of £111 million comes from the Exchequer.

The Government have set LRT the primary task of securing better value for money through improved efficiency. LRT's specific financial objective is to reduce the revenue support requirement to half the 1984-85 level of £190 million by 1987-88. This will enable the Government to continue to reduce the burden upon taxpayers and ratepayers, while providing for continuing substantial levels of capital investment.

Substantial progress is already being made towards these goals. The element of grant for revenue support—about £125 million—is £65 million below the GLC's 1984-85 provision. At the same time, the capital element of the grant—about £200 million—is £50 million more than the GLC's budgeted capital grant for this year. Yet in 1985-86, the ratepayer will have to find only £212 million towards this programme—some £50 million less than in 1984-85 on a comparable basis.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has made an adjustment to the grant-related poundage schedule for London authorities in the rate support grant settlement to ensure that London ratepayers, and those elsewhere, are treated fairly following the transfer of LRT financing from local to central Government.

Improving efficiency has enabled LRT to contain their proposed fares increase in January to an average of 9 per cent., which will still leave fares about 10 per cent. lower, in real terms, than they were in May 1981 when the present GLC administration took office. LRT plan to maintain underground services at their present level for 1985-86 and to reduce bus services slightly, in line with falling demand.

The increase in resources for investment will enable LRT further to improve efficiency and to make public transport facilities more attractive to passengers including, for example, a substantial programme of station modernisation on the underground.

A420 (Reclassification)

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about his proposal to reclassify the A420 as a trunk road.

Mrs. Chalker: As my hon. Friend will now be aware, a draft order proposing that the A420 between Swindon and Oxford should become a trunk road, was published on 14 December. This road is part of an important route between Swindon and the midlands.

Travel Concessions (Manchester)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from the chief executive of the Greater Manchester council with regard to travel concessions; what reply he is sending; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have received a letter dated 5 December from the chief executive and I am sending the hon. Gentleman a copy of my reply.

Oxford Circus Station (Fire)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether the closed circuit television on the northbound Victoria Line platform at Oxford Circus assisted in detecting the station fire.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand that the fire was detected without the assistance of the closed circuit television system.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport who first detected the fire at Oxford Circus station.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand from London Regional Transport that a passenger leaving the station reported the fire to a station inspector at the ticket barrier at about 10 pm on the evening of 23 November.

British Transport Police

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is his policy for the future of the British Transport police;

(2) if he will list the sites at which British Transport police are currently employed and those sites at which they were employed in 1979, giving the numbers employed at each site in both cases;

(3) what procedures there are for vetting private security firms where they are to take over the work of the British Transport police;

(4) what consultations he has had with employers and warehouse owners at the sites on which staff reductions are proposed for the British Transport police;

(5) whether he is satisfied that reductions in the numbers of British Transport police will have no adverse effect on Her Majesty's Government's ability to combat drug smuggling.

Mr. Ridley: I shall reply to these questions shortly.

Space Saver Spare Wheels

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he is satisfied that drivers of vehicles equipped with space saver spare wheels are adequately informed of the special precautions to be taken when driving on them;

(2) what safety tests have been carried out by his Department on space saver spare wheels; and what was the result;

(3) how many vehicles he estimates are fitted with space saver spare wheels rather than conventional ones.

Mrs. Chalker: We estimate that there are about 40,000 to 50,000 cars on our roads supplied with one of these spare wheels. Transport and road research laboratory tests show that the car's braking and cornering abilities remain satisfactory under normal conditions, but that if the car is driven at its limits of braking or cornering it may be more difficult to control than if fitted with a normal wheel.

We have no reason to question the adequacy of the advice given to drivers at present, eg in the vehicle handbook. A new international standard provides for clear information on the precautions needed including a speed restriction of 50 mph. We expect that standard to be formally adopted as an ECE Regulation next year, and we shall then be able to require new cars equipped with these spare wheels to conform with it.

Railway Safety

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set up an inquiry into railway safety standards with particular reference to staff levels and rostering and to investigate the effects of financial constraints on railway safety.

Mr. David Mitchell: There is no evidence of any general decline in safety on the railways. On the contrary, the railways have been getting progressively safer during the past decade. The number of significant passenger train accidents so far this year is no greater than in recent years. What marks 1984 as different is the bunching of accidents recently in a relatively short space of time, and the deeply-regretted number of passenger fatalities, which had been relatively high by railway standards, but for which one accident—at Polmont—is largely responsible.

All the recent accidents are being investigated, the more serious by formal inquiry, and there will be published reports on them. If the investigations indicate that staff levels, rostering, or the finance available to the Railways were significant factors, the chief inspecting officer will say so in his annual report on railway safety for 1984 which, in accordance with normal practice, will review the overall safety position. A separate inquiry into railway safety would merely duplicate the work of the independent railway inspectorate.

Motorway Lighting

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will undertake a study into the comparative cost savings involved in reducing road traffic accidents by increasing the lighting on motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: A study on this topic is already in hand and will take account of the examination of data referred to in my reply to a question by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) on 12 December 1984, at column 528.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in the light of the accident on 11 December on the M25, he will make it his policy to light all stretches of motorway and A(M) roads so far unlit; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I have nothing further to add to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend on 14 December 1984, at column 528.

Singapore International Airlines

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any evidence of Singapore International Airlines receiving subsidies from the Singapore Government to promote Singapore International Airlines' activities in competition with British carriers.

Mr. Michael Spicer No.

Motorway Speed Limits

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to give statutory effect to advisory speed limits indicated on motorways; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I am considering this matter and will make a statement as soon as possible.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to install overhead speed limit indicators on all motorways; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Gantry mounted signals are installed on motorways where there is a need to display different restrictions over individual lanes. These are, typically, on the approaches to motorway/motorway interchanges, on an elevated motorway or on approaches to motorway tunnels.

Heathrow Airport (Traffic Movements)

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many fixed-wing movements have been excluded from the official air traffic movement figures at Heathrow in each of the years since 1979.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The figures for air transport movements published by the British Airports Authority exclude positioning flights, air taxi and general aviation movements. The number of movements accounted for by these categories of flight at Heathrow since 1979 is as follows:

	Number of Flights
1979	22,753
1930	21,486
1981	20,050
1982	21,883
1983	23,081
1984	*24,680

* January to November

Buses (Deregulation)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in those parts of the United Kingdom where trials have been undertaken into the consequences of deregulating bus transport, taxis were included.

Mr. David Mitchell: The trial area provisions of the Public Passenger Vehicles Act 1981 do not cover taxis. There are however other provisions of that Act under which taxis may be used to carry passengers at separate fares; they have been used successfully in some parts of the country, including the Devon trial area.

Taxis (Deregulation)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from those who represent taxi proprietors about the consequences of deregulating taxis; what has been the main emphasis of such representations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received many representations from the National Federation of Taxi Associations, its constituent bodies, and individual taxi proprietors opposing any curb on the powers of district councils to restrict arbitrarily the number of taxi licences. They are concerned that increased competition will reduce their earnings, result in the operation of lower quality vehicles and reduce the value of 'plates'. I have replied that quality licensing, will continue and that the purpose of taxi licensing, like that of other licensing systems, is to protect the consumer; and that it was never intended to provide a marketable asset for the benefit of the licence holder. I have indicated that I am prepared to consider applying the system currently employed in Scotland.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport what evidence he has to support his conclusion that the deregulation of taxis would result in a superior or cheaper service to the public.

Mr. David Mitchell Artificial restrictions in the supply of any commodity are inimical to the interests of the consumer. The fact that, because of their scarcity in some areas, these licences change hands for considerable sums indicates that, in such areas, there is an expectation of enhanced earnings resulting from an undersupply of taxis. The National Consumers' Council and the Consumers' Association support deregulation of taxi numbers.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport what inquiries he has undertaken about the impact of deregulation of controls on taxis in the United States; and what information he has received about the impact of such deregulation.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received reports which allege that deregulation in the way it was carried out in some cities in the United States of America has undesirable side effects. We have chosen a more measured approach.

Southampton

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to implement section 7 of the Road Traffic Act 1974 in the city of Southampton.

Mrs. Chalker: There are no provisions to enable the section 7 ban on parking on footways in urban areas to be implemented in some places and not others.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 18 December 1984

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Attorney-General what consideration he has given to bringing charges against officers of the National Union of Mineworkers for incitement to violence.

The Attorney-General: Incitement to violence is not a criminal offence, but an incitement by any person to others to commit a specific offence under the Offences against the Person Act 1861, or for them to commit offences against public order, such as riot or affray, renders the inciter liable to the criminal law. Such an offence of incitement is not one which a chief officer of police is bound to report to the Director of Public Prosecutions under the Prosecution of Offences Regulations 1978. However, the Director has had referred to him one case involving an alleged offence of incitement to riot by an officer of the National Union of Mineworkers, but the Director concluded that there was insufficient evidence for him to bring criminal proceedings. I am confident that if any chief officer of police has reason to think that any other offence of this type may have been committed and that there is evidence available which can properly be put before a court, he will refer that evidence to the Director for his consideration.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Literature (Asian Languages)

Mr. Madden asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will ensure that literature, available to the public on entering the Strangers' Gallery, is published in the main Asian languages.

Mr. Biffen: In the absence of significant demand for the "Guide to the Galleries" in Asian languages, I see no need for such provision.

Departmental Select Committees

Mr. Bruce George asked the Lord Privy Seal how many staff were employed within each department during the last session to liaise with a Select Committee; what is the grade of each civil servant; and whether the number employed or their grade has been altered since 1979 to 1983.

Mr. John Biffen [pursuant to his reply, 10 December 1984, c. 367]: Liaison with Departmental Select Committees forms part of the duties of about 50 staff across Departments, ranging in grade from Executive Officer to Grade 3 (formerly Under Secretary). The time each spends on liaison work varies considerably from individual to individual and from Department to Department, depending on the Select Committee concerned and its programme of work. But, taking all Departments together, an estimated 2,300 man days a year are spent specifically on liaison, as distinct from other aspects of select committee work. This represents a small increase on previous years.

WALES

Health Expenditure

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the most recent figures for the distribution of health expenditure for each Welsh area expressed in per capita terms and categorised according to (a) hospital services expenditure, (b) community health and family practitioners' services expenditure and (c) total expenditure.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The figures for 1983-84 are:

£ per capita

	Hospital Services	Community Health and Family Practitioners' Services	Other Services	Total
Clwyd	146·48	76·56	13·01	236·05
East Dyfed	161·32	81·59	17·83	241·13
Pembrokeshire	102·78		15·89
Gwent	163·87	86·11	16·15	266·13
Gwynedd	134·71	90·67	20·32	245·70
Mid Glamorgan	153·61	84·74	13·83	252·18
Powys	137·53	89·88	23·88	251·29
South Glamorgan	259·37	86·72	25·84	371·93
West Glamorgan	152·00	86·66	14·22	252·88
WALES	165·22	84·65	17·14	267·01

Notes:
1. The expenditure figures used are taken from Annual Accounts submitted to the Department by District Health Authorities.
2. Other Services expenditure includes the cost of provision of Ambulance Services, the Blood Tranfusion Services, various other services and Headquarters administration.
3. The figures do not include the cost of certain services provided centrally, for example by the Dental Estimates Board and the Welsh Prescription

Pricing Committee.
4. One Family Practitioner Committee covers the area served by the East Dyfed and Pembrokeshire District Health Authorities.
5. The figures do not include expenditure defrayed by the Welsh Health Technical Services Organisation, principally on the central capital programme. This expenditure would add £9·44 to the Wales Hospital Services figure, £2·90 to the Wales Other Services figure and £12·34 to the Wales total figure.
6. The population figures used are the mid-year estimates of home population for 1983 which are the latest available. It is emphasized that the distribution of funds amongst District Health Authorities in Wales reflects teaching hospital costs (South Glamorgan is a teaching authority), differences in expenditure arising from the provision of regional and psychiatric services, the incidence of centrally funded developments and progress towards the equalisation of resources. Equalisation requirements are determined by comparing the relative resource shares of authorities in the previous year with their corresponding shares of the population weighted for such factors as age, sex, variations in mortality and cross-boundary flows of patients. It is therefore not possible to draw reliable conclusions from a straight comparison of per capita expenditure using crude resident population figures.

Education Statistics

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest estimates of his Department of the numbers and percentages of children of school age attending Welsh medium schools or Welsh units.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: In 1983-84, the latest year for which information is available, the number of full-time pupils attending designated bilingual primary and secondary schools was 20,450, 4·3 per cent. of all full-time primary and secondary pupils. These figures do not include pupils attending schools in mainly Welsh speaking areas where although the main medium of instruction is Welsh, the schools have not been formerly designated.

Children (Welsh Speakers)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest estimates available to his Department of the numbers and percentage of children under the age of 10 years classified as fluent Welsh speakers.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The available information relates to the numbers of primary school pupils aged five to nine who were assessed as being fluent in Welsh by their headteachers. In 1983-84, the latest year for which information is available, 25,057 pupils were deemed to be fluent Welsh speakers, 15 per cent. of all five to nine-year-old pupils in primary schools.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest estimates available to his Department of the numbers and percentage of children in secondary schools in Wales classified as fluent Welsh speakers.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: This information is not available centrally.

Conservation (Management Agreements)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those management agreements concluded in Wales by local authorities, pursuant to the Wildlife and Countryside Act, in respect of countryside outside specially designated areas, listing in each case the cost of such schemes; and if he will make a statement on his policy towards the operation of the Act in Wales.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Information on managements agreements for non-designated areas is not available centrally. The Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 was the first substantial piece of countryside legislation to be introduced in more than a decade and it addresses a wide range of difficult and contentious issues. Apart from defects in the provisions for notification of sites of special scientific interest, which we have acknowledged, the Act has proved well adapted to the situation in Wales and has been instrumental in developing co-operation between landowners, tenants and conservation bodies.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those sites of special scientific interest in Wales, and specify those which have been damaged or destroyed by pesticides since 1981.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: There are 561 sites of special scientific interest in Wales. I will write to the hon. Gentleman with details. The Nature Conservancy Council advise that no notified sites in Wales have been damaged or destroyed by pesticides since 1981.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the expenditure incurred, by county, in Wales on the the management of sites of special scientific interest during each year of operation of the Wildlife and Countryside Act.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The answer is as follows:

Expenditure under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981

Dyfed
1984	577
Gwent
1984	200
Gwynedd
1983	750
1984	1150
Powys
1984	1160

In addition expenditure as a result of management agreements under the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 and the Countryside Act 1968 is as follows:

Dyfedd
1981	810
1982	810
1983	810
1984	810
Gwynedd
1981	2143
1982	2143
1983	2143
1984	2143
Mid Glamorgan
1981	200
1982	200
1983	200

1984	200
Powys
1981	841
1982	841
1983	841
1984	841
South Glamorgan
1981	86
1982	86
1983	86
1984	86

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list, by count, each registered site of special scientific interest in Wales.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: There are 561 sites of special scientific interest in Wales. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman with the details.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those sites of special scientific interest in Wales which have been destroyed or damaged during each year of the operation of the Wildlife and Countryside Act.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas : The Nature Conservancy Council has identified seven such sites in Wales which have been damaged or destroyed since the provisions of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 came into force. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman with the details.

Acid Rain

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many miles of Welsh inland waterways have been affected by acid rain;

(2) how many (i) rivers and (ii) lakes have been affected by acid rain in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not available. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment announced on 11 December at c. 445 an expert group has been established to assess the extent of acidification of freshwaters in Scotland, England and Wales and the causes of acidification.

Home Helps

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many home helps per thousand of the population there are at present in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: At 31 September 1984, there were in Wales 1·16 whole-time equivalent home helps per thousand population.

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the expenditure incurred, by county, in Wales on the operation of the Wildlife and Countryside Act during each year of its operation.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I regret that this information is not available.

National Parks

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the powers available to national park authorities to prevent damaging development in the areas over which they have jurisdiction.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: National park authorities have a number of powers available. They operate as the local planning authority for the area under their jurisdiction; they have the power under Section 39 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 to enter into management agreements with owners and occupiers of land within their area for the purpose of conserving or enhancing the natural beauty or amenity of the countryside; and they have the opportunity in advance of the work being carried out to object to applications upon which it is intended to claim grant under the agricultural and horticultural development and agricultural and horticultural grant schemes and to have their objections considered by the appropriate Minister, in Wales the Secretary of State.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Drivers

Q19. Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister what instructions are given to the drivers of Ministers' cars regarding their driving practices.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

It is not the practice to publish details of the instructions given to ministerial drivers.

HMS Conqueror

Q22. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister whether the record of signals sent by Fleet headquarters, Northwood, to HMS Conqueror and received from HMS Conqueror by Fleet headquarters, Northwood, in April to July 1982, has been retained.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answers given to him by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces on 6 December, and to the letter of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Gentleman of 23 November.

Coal Industry Dispute

Q25. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister if she will arrange to meet Mr. Arthur Scargill to discuss the mining dispute.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has no such plans. No one wishes more than this Government to see the industry return to normal working. The NUM leadership however has yet to show that it really wishes to achieve a constructive negotiated settlement.

Strathkelvin

Q76. Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to pay an official visit to Strathkelvin.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend has at present no plans to do so.

Leith

Q82. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Leith.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.
My right hon. Friend has at present no plans to do so.

Engagements

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether she will list her official engagements for 18 December.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 December.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 December.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 December.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 December.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 18 December.

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 December.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.
My right hon. Friend is paying an official visit to the People's Republic of China.

London-New York (Air Travel)

Mr. Lawler asked the Prime Minister if she will give an estimate of the cost of all air fares paid for by Her Majesty's Government in 1983 for journeys between London and New York.

The Prime Minister: The cost of air fares paid for by Her Majesty's Government in 1983 for journeys between London and New York is of the order of £60,000. I regret that a more precise figure could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Lawler: asked the Prime Minister how much money would have been saved if each flight paid for by Her Majesty's Government between London and New York in 1983 had been booked (a) with the British commercial carrier offering the lowest price at the time each flight was made, and (b) with the British commercial carrier currently offering the lowest price.

The Prime Minister: I regret that the information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Lawler asked the Prime Minister what is Her Majesty's Government's current policy regarding the choice of carrier for flights paid for by Her Majesty's Government between London and New York.

The Prime Minister: Her Majesty's Government policy is to require Ministers and civil servants to travel by British airlines on all official journeys overseas by air, unless to do so would impose unreasonable delay or would otherwise not be in the public interest.

Departmental Policy Reviews

Mr. Madden asked the Prime Minister how many policy reviews have been announced by Government Departments since June 1983; how many such reviews have been completed to date; how many management consultants have been retained by Government Departments since June 1983; and at what total cost to date.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.
I shall reply to the hon. Member shortly.

ENERGY

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Energy what recent representations he has received from industry urging that energy prices to industry should not be increased to cover increased costs to the energy supply industries arising from the miners' strike.

Mr. Goodlad: I have received a number of representations from trade associations and individual firms expressing their concern that the miners' strike might lead to higher electricity prices. I have informed these organisations that no decisions have been taken on how the costs arising from the strike will be met.

Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will provide information on the end-use of plutonium produced in Britain in the last year.

Mr. Goodlad: I can confirm that no plutonium derived from CEGB or SSEB power stations has been used other than for civil purposes in the last year; and, that Her Majesty's Government's policy in this area remains as given by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Moore) in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) on 4 February 1983, at column 206.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish a record of the amount of plutonium produced at Wylfa during the first three years of its existence.

Mr. Goodlad: I have nothing to add to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Moore) to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) on 9 March 1983, at column 401.

Nuclear Reactors (Safeguards)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will list the Central Electricity Generating Board power stations which are under International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards;

(2) if he will list the nuclear reactors in the United Kingdom which are under International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards.

Mr. Goodlad: The nuclear reactors in the United Kingdom, including those contained in CEGB and SSEB power stations, which are included in the list of facilities subject to the UK-Euratom-IAEA safeguards agreement are as follows:

Central Electricity Generating board
Bradwell Nuclear Power Station
Berkeley Nuclear Power station
Dungeness 'A' Nuclear Power Station
Dungeness 'B' Nuclear Power Station
Hartlepool Nuclear Power Station
Heysham I Nuclear Power Station

Hinkley Point 'A' Nuclear Power Station
Hinkley Point 'B' Nuclear Power Station
Oldbury Nuclear Power Station
Sizewell 'A' Nuclear Power Station
Trawsfynydd Nuclear Power Station
Wylfa Nuclear Power Station
Berkeley Nuclear labs zero energy research reactor
South of Scotland Electricity Board
Hunterston 'A' Nuclear Power Station
Hunterston 'B' Nuclear Power Station
Civil Research Reactors
University of Strathclyde: Scottish Universities research reactor, East Kilbride
Imperial College: Consort research reactor, Ascot
Universities Research Reactor, Risley
Imperial Chemical Industries: triga reactor, Billingham
United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority
Atomic Energy Establishment Winfrith
Zero Energy Breeder Reactor (ZEBRA)
Steam Generating Heavy Water Reactor (SGHWR)
Nestor
Dimple
Hector
Dounreay Nuclear Power Development Establishment
Prototype Fast Reactor (PFR)
Atomic Energy Research Establishment Harwell
Materials Test Reactor (Pluto)
Graphite Low Energy Experimental Pile (Gleep)

Under article 78(A) of the UK-Euratom-IAEA safeguards agreement it is up to the IAEA to designate from this list those facilities which it wishes to inspect. On this subject I would refer the hon. Member to my reply to his question on 3 December, at columns 23-24.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate how much nuclear waste is likely to be produced in the United Kingdom by the year 2000; and if he will indicate separately the quantities of high, intermediate and low-level wastes that will need to be accommodated.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have been asked to reply.

The cumulative volumes of radioactive wastes likely to exist by the year 2000 are:

	Number
High activity wastes	4,300 m^3
Intermediate activity wastes	90,000 m^3
Low activity wastes	500,000 m^3

These figures include wastes existing now and those likely to arise in future from existing nuclear installations and those currently under construction. They also include the wastes likely to arise from the new floc precipitation plant at Sellafield announced today. They do not include wastes that would arise from the CEGB's proposed power station at Sizewell in Suffolk if it were to be built. The totals include significant amounts of mainly low activity wastes (110,000 m^3) from the production and use of radioisotopes for medical and industrial purposes and from other miscellaneous activities.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Plastic Baton Rounds

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what instructions concerning the use of plastic baton rounds in England and Wales are currently in force.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 7 December, at columns 306-7.

Finnimore Wood Youth Custody Centre

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he will order an inquiry into the running of Finnimore Wood youth custody centre;

(2) what representations he has received from the Prison Officers Association concerning events at Finnimore Wood youth custody centre;

(3) whether he is satisfied with the recruitment and supervision of teachers in Finnimore Wood youth custody centre.

Mr. Mellor: At recent meetings with the prison department the Prison Officers Association made a number of assertions about misbehaviour by inmates at Finnimore Wood youth custody centre, and these are being fully investigated. We are satisfied with the recruitment and supervision of teachers at the establishment: the question of prison officer manning while evening education is taking place is under consideration.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of those individuals charged with offences arising out of the current miners' dispute have been office holders of the National Union of Mineworkers; and with what offences they were charged.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This information is not readily available.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give a breakdown by police force of the number of days of sick leave which serving police officers have been forced to take as a result of injuries sustained during the course of the miners' dispute.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give a breakdown by degree of seriousness and by police force of injuries sustained by serving police officers during the course of the current miners' dispute which have so far been brought to his attention.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information available centrally relates to the police force area in which injuries were sustained, rather than to the police forces from which the officers came, and does not distinguish between serious and less serious injuries. During the period 13 March to 13 December inclusive, the number of injuries was as follows:

Police force area	Number of injuries
Cleveland	2
Derbyshire	243
Durham	43
Dyfed-Powys	4
Essex	7
Greater Manchester	13

Police force area	Number of injuries
Gwent	3
Humberside	2
Kent	64
Lancashire	1
Merseyside	4
Metropolitan	4
Northumbria	37
North Wales	1
North Yorkshire	14
Nottinghamshire	130
South Wales	40
South Yorkshire	335
Staffordshire	18
Sussex	2
Thames Valley	2
Warwickshire	2
West Yorkshire	290
TOTAL	1,261

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give a breakdown by type of offence for which charges have been brought following incidents which have taken place in the course of the current miners' dispute, stating in each category (a) the total number of charges brought, (b) the number of individuals charged, (c) the number of cases tried, (d) the number of convictions made and (e) the number of custodial sentences which resulted.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information available centrally relates to the period from 13 March to 11 December inclusive, for which I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 14 December, at column 638. The total number of immediate custodial sentences imposed during that period, including sentences to youth custody or detention in a detention centre, imposed during that period was 118.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total additional cost to date of policing the miners' dispute in south Wales which has been borne by local authority expenditure; and what is the extent to which this additional expenditure, by local authority, will attract overspending penalty.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that up to 31 October the additional costs to the South Wales police authority resulting from the policing of the miners' dispute in the police area were some £370,000, 50 per cent. of which will be met by police grant from the Home Office. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has announced that additional costs resulting from the policing of the dispute will be disregarded for grant holdback purposes.

Drugs Offences

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people in Wales have so far this year been convicted of crimes associated with the possession of heroin or similar drugs;

(2) how many people in Wales in 1983-84 were convicted of drug-related offences.

Mr. Mellor: The latest available information relates to 1983, when 1,110 persons were found guilty in Wales of offences under drugs legislation or of other offences involving controlled drugs, 92 of whom were found guilty of offences involving class A drugs, as defined in the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. Corresponding statistics for 1984 will be published next summer.

Sports Sponsorship

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to ban the broadcasting on any television channel of programmes about sports events sponsored by tobacco companies.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the identity of the assistant secretary in his Department referred to by Lord Donaldson, Master of the Rolls, in Findlay v. Secretary of State for Home Affairs as having sworn an affidavit, the tenor of which was described as untrue;

(2) whether any disciplinary action has been taken against the assistant secretary in the Home Department referred to by Lord Donaldson, Master of the Rolls, in Findlay v. Secretary of State for Home Affairs as having sworn an affidavit which was described as untrue.

Mr. Brittan: The affidavit in question was sworn by Mr. A. H. Turney, an assistant secretary in my Department, and was a true statement. It was sworn in the context of evidence already before the court that, as I had announced to Parliament in my statement of 30 November 1983, at columns 513-15, four life sentence prisoners had before that date been moved from open to closed prisons because their release in the relatively near future would not have accorded with my view of the gravity of their offences. It was intended not to qualify that evidence in any way, but to explain that a move to open prison, especially without a provisional release date, does not import any commitment to release a life sentence prisoner. I recognise that there may have been some ambiguity, which I regret, in the wording both of my statement and of the affidavit; but the matter was elucidated by counsel to the satisfaction of the court. No question of disciplinary action against Mr. Turney arises.

"Drinking Sensibly"

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many copies of the Department of Health and Social Security leaflet, "Drinking Sensibly", are now in circulation; and what response has been received therefrom to date.

Mr. John Patten: I have been asked to reply.

The initial 5,000 published copies of "Drinking Sensibly"* have all been distributed and a further reprint of 2,500 copies took place in 1983. More than 1,000 copies were distributed to professional, voluntary and other organisations concerned in combating alcohol misuse. The purpose of this discussion document is to provide facts and present issues to help clarify public debate rather than to invite correspondence. Responses include the use made of the material in press articles and day conferences and some letters.

Elections (Impersonation)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide details of (a) the number of offences reported and (b) the number of prosecutions for voting more than once in the general elections of 1983, 1979 and 1974 in (i) Northern Ireland and (ii) Great Britain.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 26 November 1984, c. 349]: Further to the information given on 13 December, at column 567, in respect of England and Wales, I understand from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland that the following information for Scotland does not distinguish offences of personation from other voting offences nor offences committed at a general election from those committed at by-elections or local elections.

Crimes against the Representation of the People Act 1949 and 1983 recorded by the police and persons subsequently proceeded against for those offences in Scotland

Year	Offences reported	Persons proceeded against
1974	10	1
1979	3	3
1983	1	*8

* Eight persons involved in one offence.

I also understand from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland that the available information for Northern Ireland is that in 1983 149 persons were arrested for offences against the Representation of the People Act 1983, of whom 104 were subsequently prosecuted. Corresponding figures for earlier years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Longmoor Base, Hampshire

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Hampshire police as to how many persons have been arrested by the police at demonstrations outside and inside Longmoor camp and on which days; and how many were charged.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 22 November 1984, c. 264]: My right hon. and learned Friend has now received and considered a report from the chief constable. The chief constable reports that one person was arrested by the police outside military land on 16 November, and that 25 people were arrested by the police inside military land on 17 November. None has yet been charged.

SCOTLAND

New Towns

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the report of the working party on the transfer of housing in Scottish new towns will be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: The working party completed its report this summer. Printing difficulties delayed its publication but it is now available. I am arranging for copies to be sent to Scottish Members with new towns in their constituencies and to have a copy deposited in the Library. The working party included representatives of the Industry Department for Scotland, the new town development corporations and the district councils, nominated by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. The working party's terms of reference were to devise a model scheme for the transfer of rented housing owned by Scottish new town development corporations to the district councils for their areas. The scheme was to be applicable, with adjustments, to all five new towns when the wind-up process for each development corporation began. The working party was asked to take account of a number of factors, ranging from the financial implications of transfer to the possible need for legislation.

I welcome the working party's report which will be of considerable practical value when the time comes to begin the transfer process. This will not occur until a development corporation has begun to be wound up and as I announced on 14 November that wind-up will not begin before April 1990. In the meantime the working party has suggested that development corporations and district councils may be able to ease the eventual transfer process by taking preparatory steps in advance. These would include moving towards a common approach on rental structures, and in general matters of policy and administration where this is not already the case. The working party has also made a number of recommendations for legislation. We will be considering these carefully, with a view to ensuring that any necessary legislative provision is made in good time.

Nursery Education

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about Government policy concerning the benefits of providing and receiving nursery education.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Nursery education has to be seen in the context of other kinds of provision, including voluntary provision, for pre-school children. My Department is now carrying out a national study of provision for under-sixes. When the report of the study becomes available, we shall consider the policy implications for nursery education.

Pre-School Children

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what forecast his Department has made of the likely number of pre-school children in the foreseeable future.

Mr. John MacKay: A projection of the population of Scotland for the period 1983 to 2023 has recently been prepared by the Government Actuary in consultation with the Registrar General. A summary of the results including the projected numbers of children aged nought to four years was published in the Registrar General for Scotland's "Vital Statistics Return for Weeks 37 to 40, 1984", a copy of which is in the Library. A brief summary of the assumptions underlying the projection is also shown.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of pre-school children in Dundee and Scotland in each of the next three years; and what are the current figures.

Mr. John MacKay: The Registrar General makes estimates of population each year for the immediately preceding year. The current estimate is that for 1983. Projections of population over the succeeding years are made biennally by the Government Actuary in consultation with the Registrar General and are based on the most recent estimates available. The 1983 estimate and the latest projected population of children aged nought to four years in Scotland for the years to 1987 are shown in the table. A consistent projection for Dundee is not yet available. The previous projection for both Scotland and Dundee, based on the 1981 estimate, is also shown in the table. The 1983 based projection assumes a slower rise in fertility, following analysis of recent trends. Also the 1983 population base takes account of information from the 1981 Census of Population which was not available at the time of fixing the 1981 base and this obscures comparison between the two projections.

Council House Sales

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing, for Scotland, the gross receipts from selling council houses under the right-to-buy policy for the years 1979-80 to the latest available year.

Mr. Ancram: Receipts from the sale of council houses sold under the right to buy provisions of the Tenants' Rights Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980 cannot be separately identified in the returns submitted by local authorities. The following table shows the gross receipts which have accrued to district and islands councils from all sales of houses held on their housing revenue accounts — including sales to sitting tenants under voluntary sales policies and sales of vacant houses:—

Health Boards (Ancillary Services)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many Scottish health boards will meet the timetable set by him in June of obtaining tenders for ancillary services by 31 December.

Mr. John MacKay: Health boards have been asked to report by April 1985 progress made with testing the cost-effectiveness of their support services.

Parole

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any proposals for changing the parole arrangements in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: I share the public concern about the level of violent crime and of drug trafficking, and, in order to reinforce the deterrent effect of the longer sentences of imprisonment for such offences, I have made clear to the Parole Board for Scotland that I would be reluctant to exercise my discretion so as to authorise early release of a prisoner who is serving a sentence of more than five years for such offences any more than a few months before he would otherwise be released, except in cases where the circumstances are exceptional. I have, however, assured the Parole Board for Scotland that it will continue to see all the cases that it has hitherto scrutinised, following the initial review by the local review committees, so that the board will have the opportunity to bring to my attention in any such case circumstances which in its view are exceptional. The parole board recognises that it is for me, under the statute, to decide whether to accept or reject a recommendation by the parole board.

The release on licence of life sentences prisoners is at my discretion, subject to a favourable recommendation by the Parole Board for Scotland and to consultation with the Lord Justice General and (if he is available) the trial judge. While I am satisfied that the safety of the public has always been, and will continue to be, a paramount consideration for the Parole Board for Scotland as it is for myself, I am concerned to emphasise the deterrent effect of sentences of life imprisonment, especially those for the murders of police officers, murders by terrorists, sexual or sadistic murders of children or murders committed by firearm in the commission of crime. Accordingly I have made clear to the Parole Board for Scotland that only in exceptional circumstances would I feel that release earlier than 20 years would be appropriate for a prisoner sentenced to life imprisonment for such a crime; and indeed there will be cases where the gravity of the offence requires a still longer period; the same may apply to other murders. I do not, however, propose to make any changes in the procedures for the consideration for release of life sentence prisoners in Scotland, including those of the preliminary review committee which I introduced in 1980, which in my view sufficiently provide for me to obtain an initial judicial view on the requirements of retribution and deterrence, in addition to the later consultation for which statute provides. I have consulted the Lord Justice General in this matter, and have ascertained that he also is content with the present arrangements. I am, however, concerned that the Parole Board for Scotland should continue to see all those cases which would hitherto have been referred to it, so that it may have the opportunity of bringing to my attention any circumstances which it considers to be exceptional.

In forming my views on these matters, I have taken into account my discussion of them with the Parole Board for Scotland. I should add that they will not affect any case of a life sentence prisoner to whom a provisional release date has already been intimated, nor any determinate sentence prisoner concerning whom the parole board had made recommendations to me before my discussion with them. I am glad to have this opportunity to repeat that I have the highest regard for the assiduity with which the parole board undertakes its difficult task and the care with which it examines each individual case on its merits.

I have also considered most carefully whether there is a need, in Scotland, to reduce the minimum qualifying period for parole to a shorter period (it is now six months in England and Wales). I have decided not to do this. Our parole system in Scotland has developed along distinctive lines, and I am not aware of any general dissatisfaction in Scotland about the range of inmates who are covered by the parole scheme. In particular, I do not think that the additional resources that would be required, especially by regional social work departments to provide supervision for short periods of parole, could be justified. I am, however, concerned about the number of persons serving short terms of imprisonment for fines default. I am impressed by the results of the fines enforcement officer schemes in Airdrie and Edinburgh and now propose to extend the scheme on a more permanent basis to other sheriff courts in Scotland in order to assist those for whom the court regards a fine as the appropriate disposal to satisfy the sentence without being subjected to imprisonment.

Local Government Expenditure

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what changes he proposes in the system for the control of local authority capital expenditure.

Mr. Younger: I am broadly satisfied with the operation of the local authority capital control system in Scotland, but I propose two modest changes which will lead to more flexible management of the local authority capital cash blocks Scottish Office—local authority 1 and Scottish Office—local authority 2. At present my Department can carry forward to the following year an underspend on either cash block up to a maximum of 2 per cent. of the appropriate cash limit; in future the maximum will be 5 per cent. Furthermore if it appears that an overspend is likely on either block I will refrain from taking any mid-year corrective action unless the probable outturn looks like exceeding 105 per cent. of the appropriate cash limit.

THE ARTS

European Music Year

Mr. Murphy asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of Arts how Her Majesty's Government intend to mark European Music Year, other than on the European Day of Music itself, as outlined by the Prime Minister in her reply of 5 December.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. and noble Friend is to give a reception to mark the opening of the Handel festival in July. Arrangements for the festival, and for many other events to be held during the year, are in the hands of the European Music Year (UK) Committee.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Public Expenditure Programme

Mr. Lightbown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a breakdown of the housing public expenditure programme for 1985-86.

Mr. Gow: Following discussions with the local authority associations at the Housing Consultative Council on 30 November and with the Chairman of the Housing Corporation, I am able to announce decisions on housing capital and current expenditure for 1985-86.

Total provision for housing capital expenditure in 1985-86, including forecast housing capital receipts next year of £1,731 million, is £3,055 million. I have decided to allocate those resources as follows:

	£ million
Local authorities	2,324
Housing Corporation	685
New Towns	43
Home Loan	3

Capital resources next year for the Housing Corporation include net provision for £605 million plus estimated capital receipts of £80 million. This will maintain provision for a substantial level of investment by the corporation. I will announce the detailed breakdown of the corporation's approved development programme as soon as possible.

The New Towns' share of resources again reflects the fact that the publicly-rented building programme in the New Towns has virtually ended. The remaining investment is concentrated on providing sites for private development, on shared ownership and on repair and improvement of dwellings prior to transfer to local authorities.

The provision of £2,324 million for local authorities includes forecast capital receipts of £1,595 million. Details of those forecast receipts and of the underlying assumptions were given in reply to the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) on 12 December at column 500.

My right hon. Friend is announcing separately today the arrangements for local authority capital programmes in 1985-86 including proposed changes in the prescribed proportions of capital receipts and other measures to reduce the risk of overspending the cash limit.

The HIP allocation total for 1985-86 is £1,600 million. Authorities will be able to reinvest their capital receipts, albeit at the reduced prescribed proportions. On the basis of our forecasts, authorities will be able to undertake at least an extra £325 million of investment in addition to their HIP allocations, from receipts arising in 1985-86. I have discussed with the local authority associations the method of distributing that total between individual authorities. Each authority will be informed shortly of its allocation.

As regards housing current expenditure, I have considered carefully the views of the local authority associations on the consultation papers which I issued on reckonable income and on reckonable expenditure on management and maintenance for 1985-86.

I have decided to determine an increase in the local contribution for housing subsidy purposes of 60p a dwelling a week. It is for authorities themselves to decide how to finance that contribution. On management and maintenance, I have decided to increase the expenditure counting towards the subsidy calculation by 4 per cent. over the level assumed for 1984-85.

Sellafield (Discharges)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures are being taken to reduce liquid discharges of radioactivity from Sellafield.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The radiochemical inspectorate of my Department, jointly with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, has already put forward formal proposals for a variation of the authorisation under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960, so that the limits will reflect the substantial reductions in actual discharges that have been achieved in the past few years and place extra controls on the amounts discharged over short periods, and on solvent and particulates. This variation, which also contains a formal requirement that the best practicable means must be used to limit discharges, is expected to come into force early in the New Year.

The site ion exchange plant, constructed at a cost of £130 million, will come into operation next year and will make possible a further reduction in discharge of caesium, to one tenth of the maximum released in recent years. The new salt evaporator, also due to come into operation next year at a cost of £30 million, will make possible a parallel reduction in dischargess of plutonium and other alpha emitters, to about 200 curies a year. Formal proposals to replace the existing authorisation by a new and more stringent one will be put forward by the authorising Departments next year, and the opportunity will also be taken to set specific limits on a much larger number of individual radionuclides. The local authorities will be consulted about the new draft authorisation, as will the water and health authorities, and sea fisheries committees.

Beyond that, the achievement of a further significant reduction on a continuing basis depends on the construction of major new treatment plant. The Government, after a review of the options in consultation with the company, has approved the company's proposal to build a floc precipitation plant, costing £150 million, which would be in operation by 1991. The target is to reduce discharges to less than 20 curies a year of alpha activity and about 8,000 curies a year of beta/gamma activity (other than tritium). The latter figure is below the level currently achieved by the only plant in any way comparable, the newer French reprocessing plant at Cap de la Hague, and the alpha figure is approximately equal to the current figure for that plant. These figures include an allowance for the new reprocessing plant for oxide fuel. Further reductions will be obtained when the present reprocessing plant for magnox fuel goes out of operation in the early years of the next century. At that time the targets will be to reduce discharges to not more than 5 curies a year of alpha activity and not more than 2,000 curies a year of beta/gamma activity (other than tritium).

This programme of measures complies with the recommendation of the Paris commission on the prevention of pollution from land-based sources that contracting parties should take account of the best available technology at nuclear reprocessing plants, in order to minimise radioactive discharges to the marine environment. The Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee has confirmed that, in its view, this programme takes full account of all the scientific evidence, and is consistent with the United Kingdom's policy objectives for radioactive waste management, particularly the objective of reducing discharges to the lowest reasonably practicable. The estimated annual radiation dose to the small critical group of people eating large amounts of fish and shellfish will be reduced to well below 10 per cent. of the limit recommended by the International Commission on Radiological Protection, as compared with 54 per cent. in 1982.

The two authorising Departments plan to review the authorisation every three years, in line with a recommendation in the Black report. For the purposes of such reviews, they will draw upon the results from an expanded programme of environmental monitoring they have now required BNFL to carry out as from January 1985, as well as their own check monitoring and relevant research. They will also take full account of advice on the health aspects of discharges, and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health is considering, in the light of the Black report, how such advice can be best provided.

Metropolitan County Enterprise Boards

72. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the contribution to job creation and maintenance by the various metropolitan county enterprise boards; and if he will make a statement.

73. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the contribution of job creation and maintenance by the various metropolitan county enterprise boards; and if he will make a statement.

74. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent assessment he has made of the contribution by the Greater Manchester Economic Development Corporation Limited towards employment creation in Greater Manchester; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The establishment of enterprise boards and similar bodies is one means by which local authorities can make a contribution to local economic development. It is for the councils concerned to satisfy themselves as to its worth.

Rates

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he now expects to issue the consultation paper on the valuation of domestic properties for rating purposes.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) on 22 October at c. 491.

Sports Sponsorship

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much sponsorship money sport receives from the tobacco industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: Under the voluntary agreement on sponsorship of sport by tobacco companies in the United Kingdom the industry informs my Department of its expenditure on sports sponsorship in confidence. I cannot therefore make the information available. However, the agreement restricts companies' expenditure to the 1976 level with due allowance for inflation.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much additional money sport receives from sponsorhip from non-govermental sponsors, other than the tobacco industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: This information is not available. However, the Sports Council has estimated that sport received about £100 million last year in sponsorship from all sources.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the number of sporting events which were sponsored in 1983 and the number which were sponsored by the tobacco industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: Information on events sponsored by the tobacco industry is supplied to my Department in confidence by the industry. I cannot therefore make that information available. The further information sought is also unavailable.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consult the medical profession before considering any renewal of the voluntary agreement with the tobacco industry on the sponsorship of sport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The British Medical Association has recently asked to discuss sports sponsorship by the tobacco industry and the voluntary agreement with my right hon. Friend. As the Minister responsible for the agreement, I shall be pleased to meet a delegation from the BMA and hear at first hand their views. I shall, of course, take these into account when considering the voluntary agreement, which stands until at least 31 December 1985.

Prefabricated Reinforced Concrete Dwellings

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in discussions between his Department and the National House Building Council in respect of establishing agreed standards of repairs to the various types of prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. Gow: Discussions are continuing. I will reply fully to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

London (Housing)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has as to how many London boroughs operate special lettings schemes for key workers and for people with priority on medical grounds in the allocation of their housing stock;

(2) what information he has to which London boroughs operate a special housing register for engaged couples and for those who do not qualify for rehousing because they do not meet residence qualifications;

(3) what information he has to the proportion of applicants on housing waiting lists in inner London who require bedsits and as to what proportion need two or more bedrooms.

Sir George Young: I would refer the hon. Member to my answer to him about London waiting lists on 6 December 1984 at column 238.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has made to the recent report by Shelter Housing Aid Centre, the London Housing Aid Centre, a copy of which has been sent to him, in respect of the employment impact of a programme to tackle London's housing problems.

Sir George Young: I have nothing to add to my answer to the hon. Member on 10 December at column 392.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of how many new jobs would be created (a) in the construction industry and (b) in the wider economy for each additional 1,000 new houses built and for each additional 1,000 major renovations in the public and in the private sectors.

Sir George Young: The information specifically requested for these building activities is not available.

Squatting

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence he has of the extent of uncontrolled squatting in council dwellings in London.

Sir George Young: This is a matter for the local authorities which own the dwellings.

Fire Service, London

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the basis on which he determined the 1984-85 grant related expenditure for the fire service in London.

Mr. Waldegrave: Grant related expenditure for the fire service is calculated on the basis of a single national formula for all authorities comprising the following factors: population, total area, density of settlement, the average number of fire calls in 1981 and 1982, and the area of high fire risk, with adjustments for higher labour costs in and around London and special costs for the Isles of Scilly.

Asbestos Cement

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the policy of the Property Services Agency about safety aspects relating to the use of asbestos cement in the refurbishing of public buildings.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Block Grant Entitlements

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish for each authority designated under the Rates Act 1984 the estimated block grant entitlements he has taken into account in determining the provisional maximum rate; and what are (i) the assumptions made about that authority's expenditure in 1985-86 and (ii) the assumptions made about all non-designated authorities' expenditure in 1985-86, in determining that grant entitlement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984]: The calculation of the proposed maximum rate or precept for each designated authority includes the block grant I estimate will become payable to the authority, including any receipts from the London rate equalisation scheme where appropriate. It assumes that the same figure (in cash) as in 1984-85 will be disregarded for the purposes of implementing grant penalties in 1985-86. It makes no allowance for close-ending of block grant.

Rates Act 1984

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many letters he has received since 17 January concerning the provisions of the Rates Act 1984 from people living in the designated authorities, indicating how many letters have come from people in each constituency covered wholly or in part by the 18 authorities.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984]: The number of letters received in respect of each of the selected authorities is as follows:

	Number of letters received
Basildon	3
Brent	5
Camden	34
GLC	—
Greenwich	5
Hackney	3
Haringey	16
ILEA	1,115
Islington	16
Lambeth	9
Leicester	6
Lewisham	4
Merseyside	—
Portsmouth	1
Sheffield	33
Southwark	3
South Yorkshire	91
Thamesdown	2

Information as to the number of letters from each constituency is not available.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish for each authority designated under the Rates Act 1984 the assumptions he has made in respect of (i) exclusive penny rate products, (ii) expenditure for 1983-84 and 1984-85, (iii) rate fund revenue balances, (iv) special fund balances, (v) capital fund balances, (vi) (a) trading account balances in respect of public transport and (b) other trading account balances, (vii) housing revenue account balances and (viii) balances of other funds and other credit balances excluding those in respect of liabilities, capital discharged and capital receipts, in determining their provisional maximum rates.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: [Pursuant to his reply, December 1984]: Where information requested by me for the purpose of exercising my powers under Part I of the rates Act 1984 was not furnished by a designated authority, I have made such assumptions about matters relevant to the calculation of their proposed rate or precept limit as I have thought appropriate, as I am empowered to do under section 8(1) of the Act. I have also taken into account relevant financial returns made by each authority to my Department, any additional information supplied to me by authorities and further informtion available to me. Authorities have been informed that they have until 15 January, 1985 to comment on the rate or precept limit proposed.

St. George's Hall, Liverpool

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent action his Department has taken to secure the future of St. George's hall, Liverpool.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Further to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government's answer to the hon. Member for Liverpool West Derby on 22 November 1984 my officials are meeting Liverpool City Council today to discuss what progress the Council has made. [Vol. 68, c. 282.]

DEFENCE

Territorial Army

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will give a breakdown by rank of the numbers of individuals serving in each regiment within the Territorial Army in Cheshire;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report those units of the Territorial Army and their respective strengths which are based in Cheshire.

Mr. Lee: A breakdown by rank of the number of individuals serving in each Territorial Army unit based in Cheshire, together with the respective strengths of those units as at 11 December 1984 is as follows:

Notes:

* A detachment of C company is based at Northwich.

† These figures represent numbers of Territorial Army soldiers only, and do not include Regular Army staff, non-Regular permanent staff or civilians attached to these Territorial Army units.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will outline his plans for the future strengths of those units of the Territorial Army currently based in Cheshire.

Mr. Lee: As part of our phase II expansion of the Territorial Army, plans for which we announced in March, we intend to begin raising a new battalion in the Cheshire area in 1986, which will be called 3rd (Volunteer) Battalion The Cheshire Regiment. This will be based on two existing companies of 2nd Battalion Mercian Volunteers at Ellesmere Port and Stockport. A headquarters for the new battalion will be raised initially at Northwich and will move to Runcorn. A new company will be raised at Macclesfield and the detachment of B Company, 2nd Battalion Mercian Volunteers at Crewe will expand and become D Company of the new battalion. We also plan to expand 207 (Manchester) general hospital, Royal Army Medical Corps (Volunteers), which recruits partly in Macclesfield, by about 100 posts. In addition, we intend to raise new home service force companies based in Warrington and Runcorn, and a platoon of a company based in Liverpool will be raised at Widnes.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state the average annual training time undertaken by individuals serving in the Territorial Army.

Mr. Lee: During the training year 1983-84 the average number of training days undertaken by the whole of the Territorial Army was 35·9 per man.

NATO

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Defence if Her Majesty's Government will make it their policy to seek to ensure that public statements made by, and the military doctrine of, the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation reflect its character as a defensive alliance.

Mr. Lee: NATO's public statements, such as its communiqués, and NATO military planning already reflect the defensive nature of the Alliance.

Service Personnel (Industrial Disputes)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Defence why he does not give guidelines to service men on their off-duty involvement in industrial disputes such as the current miners' dispute.

Mr. Lee: I have nothing further to add to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces to the hon. Member on 11 December, at column 409.

FH70 Programme

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for defence if any companies involved in the Federal Republic of Germany are experiencing difficulties in reaching production deadlines in the FH70 programme.

Mr. Butler: Not that I am aware.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many jobs are expected to be lost, both directly and indirectly, as a result of giving the FH70 order to the Federal Republic of Germany.

Mr. Butler: The current order for FH70 ammunition to meet British Army requirements has, in accordance with international working agreements, been allocated to the Federal Republic of Germany. Had this work been awarded in full to the ROFs, in contravention of the relevant memorandum of understanding, it is estimated that it would have given rise to 640 man years of work. It is not possible to estimate the amount of any further work which this would have produced elsewhere.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will indicate how much work has been received by (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the Federal Republic of Germany and (c) the Republic of Italy under the agreement concerning the FH70 programme.

Mr. Butler: The latest trilaterally agreed position is as follows:

	Value of work £ million	Percentage of total Per cent.	Workshares entitlement Per cent.
UK industry	204	38·1	36·3
FRG industry	185	34·7	36·3
Italian industry	145	27·2	27·4
	534	100	100

Crown Proceedings Act 1947

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the operation of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947.

Mr. Lee: Section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 is currently under review.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions since 1947 section 10 of the Crown Protection Act 1947 has been invoked.

Mr. Lee: Section 10 of the Crown Protection Act 1947 applies to all cases of death or injury to members of the armed forces occurring in the circumstances described in the section and where DHSS certifies that the relevant incident or circumstance is regarded as attributable to service. Available records do not allow us to determine the total numbers concerned since 1947.

General Belgrano

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his reply of 11 December, Official Report, columns 432-33, if he will list the course and position of the General Belgrano on all those occasions when it was reported to the Flag Officer Submarines at Northwood.

Mr. Heseltine: I have nothing to add to what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in her letter to the hon. Member on 19 September.

Commercial Shipping (Hire)

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the Vote and subhead under which his Department's costs for the hire of commercial shipping is included.

Mr. Lee: Expenditure on the chartering or hiring of commercial shipping is borne on Class I, Vote 1, subheads, E1, E2, F4, H1, I1 and L6 and Class I, Vote 2, subhead F1, depending on the purpose for which it is required. Except for F4 these subheads also cover other forms of expenditure.

United States Nuclear Bases

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is aware of the current rules of engagement which are operative for United States service men guarding United States nuclear bases.

Mr. Lee: Yes.

Nuclear Installations

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the rules of engagement issued to soldiers guarding nuclear installations.

Mr. Lee: No. The guidance issued to armed service men is classified.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the rules of engagement for soldiers guarding nuclear establishments were last changed; and if he is planning any changes in the immediate future.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) on 3 November 1983, at column 1004. No changes are planned.

Eastern Europe (Deep Targets)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in the event of conflict in central Europe, ministerial authorisation is needed before conventional forces can be used against deep targets in eastern Europe.

Mr. Lee: Yes. Overall political control of military activity is a fundamental principle of Alliance policy.

38 REME Workshop, Chilwell

Mr. Lester asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give an up-to-date costing for the installation of replacement test facilities at Boughton and Bicester following the proposed closure of 38 REME workshop at Chilwell.

Mr. Lee: Both during the period of consultation with the work force and trade unions — following the announcement on 28 June of our proposals for restructuring the REME static workshops in the United Kingdom — and prior to that date, we were not in a position to make detailed surveys and seek tenders for re-siting equipment and modifying existing workshop facilities. The published cost figure of £2½ million for moving equipments from Chilwell and Newark workshops and relocating or reproviding them at Bicester, Bovington, Donnington or Old Dalby workshops had therefore to be based on in-house estimating. We are now producing detailed costings as we are able to proceed with substantive planning. Although I would not expect these to vary significantly from the original estimate, my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Armed Forces will write to my hon. Friend in due course to let him know the results.

Written Answers

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if it is his practice personally to sign all written answers he gives to hon. Members.

Mr. Butler: In common with all Ministers in this Department, it is the practice of my right hon. Friend to approve personally the terms of all written answers given by him in reply to the questions from hon. Members.

EMPLOYMENT

Health and Safety (Industrial Plants)

Mr. Watson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what further action he proposes to control the potential hazards to the health and safety of workers and the public arising from major industrial plants.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend has today laid before the House the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984, S.I. No. 1902, which implement the European Community directive on the control of major accident hazards, known as the Seveso directive. These new regulations are part of a framework of controls for industrial major hazards which has been developed in Great Britain over the past decade by the Health and Safety Commission, assisted by its advisory committee on major hazards, and Departments with responsibility for town and country planning. These new controls, which will be enforced by the Health and Safety

Executive, aim further to reduce the likelihood of major industrial accidents and to minimise the consequences of any incident. Their provisions will protect both people and the environment.

The main impact of these regulations in Great Britain will be on larger chemical and petro-chemical installations handling more than specified amounts of certain flammable, explosive or toxic substances. Such installations will be required to notify the Health and Safety Executive of details of their activities and to submit a written report, or safety case, about their operations. They must also prepare adequate emergency plans for use on their sites and tell the people who live nearby, and who might be affected by an accident, about the nature of the hazard and what to do if an accident did occur. The local (county) authorities are similarly required to prepare an emergency plan to deal with any off-site consequence. Finally, any major accidents which occur must be reported to the Health and Safety Executive which will report them, in turn, to the European Commission for the mutual benefit of all member states.

These regulations implement a European directive which is also being put into practice in all the other member states of the Community. The co-operation between member states, in which Great Britain is playing a full part, should help to share knowledge and experience so that our countries can reap the benefits of advanced, technological industries without running undue or unnecessary risks.

Labour Statistics

15. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been unemployed for over 12 months; and what was the comparable figure for May 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On 11 October 1984 the number of claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over one year was 1,276,883. The corresponding figure for April 1979 was 366,711, although this relates to registrants at jobcentres and is not directly comparable. The May 1979 figure is not available.

16. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for the number of men and women, above retirement age, who are in work.

Mr. Alan Clark: The labour force survey shows that there were 264,000 men and 517,000 women above retirement age in work in Great Britain in the second quarter of 1983.

20. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons have reached pensionable age over the past five years; how many school leavers have become available for employment over the same period; and what have been the implications for the labour market.

Mr. Alan Clark: Between 1978 and 1983, 2·9 million people reached pensionable age in Great Britain. Over the same period 3·3 million people left school not intending to go into further full-time education.

These were two of the factors which contributed to a growth of a quarter of a million in the labour force over that period.

24. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest number of unemployed in the United Kingdom.

39. Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest level of unemployment.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 8 November 1984 the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,222,586.

29. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those industries in which there has been most growth in jobs in the latest 12-month period for which statistics are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The industries in which there was the greatest numerical increase in employees in employment in Great Britain between June 1983 and June 1984 are as follows:

Activity Heading of the 1980 Standard Industrial Classification

Food retailing (AH 6410)
Social welfare, charitable and community services (AH 9611)
Hotel trade (AH 6650)
Sport and other recreational services (AH 9791)
Research and development (AH 9400)
Public houses and bars (AH 6620)
Banking and bill-discounting (AH 8140)

49. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will place in the Library a list of all redundancies and job losses, relating to all firms and industries, on a weekly basis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information on confirmed redundancies is published monthly in tables 2.30 (by region) and 2.31 (by industry) of the labour market data section of Employment Gazette; copies of which are available in the Library. Other regularly produced unpublished analyses, by industry within region, are placed in the Library.

The extra costs of compiling weekly information cannot be justified.

The names of firms suffering redundancies cannot be disclosed, as this information is treated in confidence by the Department.

52. Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Employment which region of the United Kingdom currently has the highest level of unemployment.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 8 November 1984 there were 121,025 unemployed claimants in Northern Ireland with a corresponding unemployment rate of 20·9 per cent., which is higher than for all other regions of the United Kingdom.

53. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his current estimate of the number and rate of unemployed in the city of Leicester.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 8 November 1984 there were 20,238 unemployed claimants in the city of Leicester. Travel-to-work areas are the smallest areas for which unemployment rates are calculated. The corresponding figure for the Leicester travel-to-work area was 27,458, representing an unemployment rate of 11·0 per cent.

Skillcentres

17. Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for Employment following the recent meeting of the Manpower Services Commission, if he will make a statement on the future of skillcentres.

25. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the future of skillcentres.

Mr. Tom King: Proposals for updating and streamlining the skillcentre network are currently being considered by the Manpower Services Commission and I have yet to receive the commission's advice.

40. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average percentage of unemployment in the areas in which it is proposed to close skillcentres; and how this compares with the average percentage in areas where skillcentres are to remain.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The average unemployment rate in the travel-to-work areas in which it is proposed to close skillcentres was 13·2 per cent. at 8 November 1984. The corresponding figure for the areas where skillcentres are to remain was 13·1 per cent.

68. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what consultations he has had recently on the closure of skillcentres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission, which has represented on it employers, trade unions, local authority and education interests, is considering proposals for the future of the skillcentre network. We have yet to receive the commission's advice.

Jobcentres

18. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received about the Manpower Services Commission's proposals for the size of the jobcentre network.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Four thousand organisations and individuals were consulted on the proposals for the jobcentre network. Replies were received from almost 3,000, including Members of Parliament, area manpower boards, local authorities, trade unions, trades councils, and Manpower Services Commission staff and their representatives.

51. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many employment service jobs will be lost as a result of the Manpower Services Commission's plans to change the jobcentre network.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The proposals for a revised jobcentre network involve a staff reduction of 530 posts over three years.

A further 450 posts will be saved over the same period as a result of the introduction into jobcentres of a more efficient computerised system for handling job vacancies.

Disabled Persons

19. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the Manpower Services Commission's code of good practice on the employment of disabled people.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Manpower Services Commission's code of good practice on the employment of disabled people was formally launched by the Prime Minister on 14 November and copies have been placed in the Library.

The Government have welcomed and endorsed the code; my right hon. Friend has written to 150 leading companies enclosing a video about the code; and has received a most encouraging response. We believe that the code will be important in ensuring that the abilities of disabled people are recognised and fully utilised.

70. Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Employment if the Government intend to promote legislation to make discrimination in employment against disabled persons illegal.

Mr. Alan Clark: No.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

21. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the progress of the enterprise allowance scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: We are very encouraged by the continued success of the enterprise allowance scheme, which has so far helped 60,000 unemployed people start their own business.

42. Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many places will be available on the enterprise allowance scheme in 1985.

Mr. Alan Clark: As my right hon. Friend announced on 12 November, at columns 445-46, the number of places available on the enterprise allowance scheme will be increased by 25 per cent. in 1985-86 and will offer over 62,000 unemployed people the chance to start their own business.

46. Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many jobs have been created by businesses started under the enterprise allowance scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) earlier today.

Equal Opportunities Commission

22. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on his meeting with Lady Platt, the chairman of the Equal Opportunities Commission, on Tuesday 4 December.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I met Lady Platt on 4 December to discuss the change from 1 October in the eligibility criteria for the community programme. I explained why we think those long-term unemployed people most in need should have priority for available places on the programme, and I undertook to consider further the concerns which Lady PLatt raised with me.

Health and Safety Commission and Executive

23. Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to change the role of the Health and Safety Commission and Executive.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The functions and responsibilities of the Health and Safety Commission and Executive are set out in the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. We have no plans to change them.

Home Workers

26. Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his Department's estimate of the numbers of home workers; if he is satisfied with their employment conditions; and when the Home Working Advisory Committee last gave him any advice.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There are estimated to be 285,000 people working at home in the United Kingdom. Their conditions of employment is one of the areas under scrutiny in the current programme of research into home working. The Home Working Advisory Committee last met in January 1979.

67. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to improve the enforcement of minimum pay rates for home workers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The current arrangements for checking the pay of home workers covered by wages councils are considered to be adequate. Last year 3 per cent. of those whose pay was checked were found to be paid less than the legal minimum.

Wages Inspectorate

27. Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are employed by the Wages Inspectorate at the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On 3 September 1984 the Wages Inspectorate had a total of 222 staff in its 15 divisional offices.

Apprenticeships

28. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will increase the availability of assistance to employers for taking on apprentices to a level such that any young person who wishes to take a formal apprenticeship can get as much financial support for the duration of the apprenticeship as he or she would get if employed on Manpower Services Commission job creation schemes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Widespread support for the first year of recognised apprentice training is already provided by the Government under the youth training scheme.

Responsibility for the level of recruitment of apprentices and for training beyond the first year rests with employers, as set out in the White Paper "Training for Jobs" (Cmnd. 9135).

Industrial Relations

30. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what further proposals he has for legislation within industrial relations.

43. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to restrict the right to strike in essential services.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have no definite plans for further legislation on industrial relations at this stage. The strike ballot provisions of the Trade Union Act have been in force only since 26 September and the other two parts of that Act will come into effect during 1985. We shall, however, be considering what further steps might usefully be taken both to deal with the special problems of industrial action in essential services and more generally.

Departmental Costs

31. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Employment what further action he is taking to control the total running costs of his Department.

Mr. Tom King: The plans to improve control of the Department's running costs were set out in the White Paper on financial management in Government Departments, which was published in July 1984 (Cmnd. 9297). Substantial progress has been made in implementing the Department's programme, including new arrangements for the involvement of myself and the other Ministers in the final stages of the review. I also receive periodic reports from the Manpower Services Commission and Health and Safety Commission on progress in implementing the financial management initiative and have discussed this with their chairmen.

Information Technology Centres

32. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the future of the information technology centres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The arrangements for information technology centres which I announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) on 7 November 1984, at columns 2-3, should encourage centres to consolidate and widen their involvement in business generation and training activities.

Employees (Assaults)

33. Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Employment what action the Health and Safety Executive is currently taking to deal with the problem of assaults suffered by employees in the course of their work.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Health and Safety Executive has recently established a committee with interested parties and departments to consider existing measures taken by employers and possible future measures to combat the problem of violence to employees at the workplace from members of the public. The committee in particular aims to stimulate joint consideration of the problem by employers and unions in the sectors most affected. As a result, the problem is now being examined by the Health and Safety Commission's joint advisory committees on railways, education and the National Health Service; and the Department of Transport has convened a special working group to consider the problem in road passenger transport.

Wages Councils

34. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Employment what estimate he makes of the effect of wages councils on employment in the industries covered.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are continuing to consider evidence and opinion on this subject.

44. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many employees are covered by wages councils at the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The estimated number is 2·7 million.

58. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to abolish the wages councils.

Mr. Evenett asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he now has any plans to abolish the wages councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I would refer my hon. Friends to my hon. Friend's reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) on 12 December 1984, at columns, 496-97.

Community Programme

35. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many long-term unemployed people have become ineligible for community programme schemes since 1 October as a result of not being in receipt of benefit.

37. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment why the Manpower Services Commission is restricting community programme places to those dependent on benefits.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Members to my reply to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) on 9 November at columns 27-28.

38. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received concerning the recent changes in community programme regulations.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We have received some 200 letters concerned with the change to the eligibility criteria for the community programme. I have also met Lady Platt, chairman of the Equal Opportunities Commission, and I would refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) earlier today.

56. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take steps to expand the numbers of people within the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply by my right hon. Friend on 30 July, at columns 121-22.

59. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement on the progress of the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The community programme continues to make good progress. At the end of October some 126,000 people were taking part.

65. Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about training in the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend announced on 30 July, at column 122, the Government's decision that, as part of the adult training strategy, participation in the community programme, which provides temporary jobs for long-term unemployed people, would be linked with short courses of work preparation and basic skills training. The Manpower Services Commission has begun to set up such courses and we anticipate that some 50,000 community programme clients annually are likely to benefit when the arrangements are fully developed.

Youth Training

36. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he will next meet the Confederation of British Industry to discuss youth training.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We frequently discuss training, including youth training, with representatives of the Confederation of British Industry.

Youth Training Scheme

41. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Employment how much the Government are currently spending on the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The estimate provision for expenditure on youth training in 1984-85 is £801·4 million.

47. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement on the level of take-up of the youth training scheme at the end of November 1984.

55. Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the take-up of the youth training scheme since September.

Mr. Peter Morrison: There were about 327,000 entrants to the youth training scheme between the beginning of April and the end of November this year, including some 70,000 entrants since the end of September. I am most encouraged by the response to the scheme in its second year, which shows that young people recognise the advantages of participating in a high quality training programme.

The continuing tremendous support from employers and other sponsors means that there will be more than sufficient places to meet the needs of all eligible youngsters in the second year.

57. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of the level of training allowance which would have been paid to trainees on the youth training scheme if that allowance had been increased since April 1978 by either the rise in the retail price index or the rise in average industrial earnings.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The youth training scheme did not come into operation until April 1983. Between April 1978 and October 1984 the general index of retail prices increased by 83·8 per cent., and between April 1978 and September 1984 the average earnings index increased by 105·1 per cent. If the youth opportunities programme allowance of £19·50 in April 1978 had been increased by the former amount, it would now be £35·84 and by the latter it would now be £39·99.

Young Persons (Wages)

45. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will take steps to prevent wages councils deciding the minimum wages of young people.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government are considering whether changes should be made to the Wages Councils Act. At present, we are prevented from removing young people from scope by obligations under International Labour Convention 26.

Adult Training

48. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he is taking to ensure that the provision of adult training responds to employers' needs.

Mr. Peter Morrison: As part of the Government's adult training strategy the resources available to the Manpower Services Commission are being directed to support training which is adaptable and responsive to employers' needs and which stimulates employers' own efforts. For example, steps have been taken to ensure that the commission's programme of skill supply training for unemployed people relates closely to known employment needs. The commission is also piloting some new pump-priming grant schemes for employers designed to contribute towards the costs of identifying employers' needs, upgrading and updating the skills of employees and training new recruits in skills which are in short supply locally. We are also funding a local collaborative projects programme jointly with the Education Departments, to help employers and training providers to work together to define training needs and explore possible ways of meeting them.

Industrial Disputes (Lost Working Days)

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his Department's latest figures for the number of days lost through industrial disputes this year.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is provisionally estimated that in the first 10 months of this year 18·8 million working days have been lost through stoppages of work due to industrial disputes in the United Kingdom. About 80 per cent. were lost in the mining dispute.

Job Creation

54. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to reduce unemployment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 13 December 1984, at column 557.

Professional and Executive Recruitment Service

60. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied with the Professional and Executive Recruitment Service; and whether he has any plans to privatise it.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Professional and Executive Recruitment was put on to a full cost recovery basis from 1 April 1983. The service met its self-financing objective for the 1983-84 financial year and current indications are that this year's objective will also be met. I am pleased to say that the service therefore now operates at no cost to the taxpayer. There are no plans for the moment to change the basis of operation of the service, but its future is being kept under review.

Robotics and Microprocessor Controls

61. Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Employment what conclusions were reached by the recent study by Her Majesty's Factories Inspectorate of the safety aspects of robotics and microprocessor controls.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The study of the prevention of risks in the use of microprocessor controls and robotics is continuing. I am advised by the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission that the Health and Safety Executive is to issue guidance documents on both topics. A guidance document on the safeguarding of industrial robotics is being prepared. A draft will be circulated to those in industry with an interest in the subject. Their views will be taken into account before the guidance is published. A draft of a three part document "Guidance on the Safe Use of Programme Electronic Systems" has already been circulated to industry for comment. Publication is intended for 1985, and again the opinions expressed at the consultation stage will be taken into account. Copies of the draft have been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Disabled Persons

62. Mr. Cunliffe asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps the Government intend to take to monitor the implementation by employers of the code of practice on the employment of disabled persons.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about employers' first impressions of the code will be obtained in the first half of 1985. This will be followed by an in-depth evaluation of the code, probably in two to three years' time, when employers will have had time to adjust their policies and practices, where necessary, to its guidance.

Coal Industry Dispute

63. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will seek a meeting with the general secretary of the Trades Union Congress to consider fresh conciliation measures to settle the dispute in the mining industry.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy met the general secretary and other representatives of the Trades Union Congress on 14 December. The Government wish to see an early and constructive settlement to this dispute, but until the NUM shows a genuine desire to reach such a settlement we cannot see any fresh conciliation attempts being successful.

64. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the effect on employment of the industrial dispute in parts of the coal industry.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: All strikes put employment at risk. In the short term output is lost and orders go to competitors. In the longer term customer confidence may be irreparably damaged. Apart from the effects on the industry itself, the coal dispute is affecting employment throughout the economy, partly because of its general effects on interest rates and market confidence.

The individual causes of changes in the level of employment cannot be identified in the Department's statistics. However, the Association of British Mining Equipment Companies has estimated that if the dispute continues into next year, the work force employed by its members and their subcontractors will have been substantially reduced through redundancies and short-time working.

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in Scotland, and in which travel-to-work areas, have lost employment as a result of the miners' strike.

Mr. Alan Clark: All strikes put employment at risk. In the short term, output is lost and orders go to competitors. In the longer term customer confidence may be irreparably damaged. Apart from the effects on the industry itself, the coal dispute is affecting employment throughout the economy, partly because of its general effects on interest rates and market confidence.

However, the individual causes of changes in the level of employment cannot be identified in the Department's statistics and it is not possible to assess any effects particular to Scotland.

Unemployed Persons (Training)

66. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what further plans he has to provide training for the unemployed.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The youth training scheme is now firmly established and sufficient places are available this year for all youngsters likely to come forward.

This year about 85,000 unemployed adults are expected to enter the Manpower Services Commission's training opportunities scheme. As part of our adult training strategy, major changes are underway to make the Manpower Services Commission's adult training programmes more effective, and we plan to substantially increase to 125,000 the number of unemployed adults trained each year. In addition around 125,000 employed adults will be helped to train each year.

Young Workers Scheme

69. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the operation of the young workers scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: Since the young workers scheme started in January 1982, it has helped provide employment for over 350,000 young people at more realistic rates of pay. Some 70,000 young people are currently supported and my right hon. Friend announced on 12 November, at column 644, that the scheme is to continue until March 1986.

Closed Shop Agreements

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list instances since 1 November when and where, in accordance with employment legislation, secret ballots have been held to confirm the continuation of closed shop agreements; and what have been the results of these secret ballots.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The employment legislation imposes no specific obligation on employers to hold secret ballots on the continuation of closed shop agreements. However, if no ballot is held the effect is exactly the same as if a ballot is held and the required majority is not achieved; dismissal for non-membership of a trade union becomes automatically unfair. Details of ballots which have been reported in the press as having been held since 1 November are as follows.

It is clear that only a very small proportion of the 4 million or so employees covered by closed shops have so far been given the chance of a ballot and that the vast majority of closed shops have therefore lost all legal protection. In addition, a number of major employers—including the water authorities, the National Bus Company, United Biscuits — have terminated their closed shop agreements; and others, including British Gas, have made it clear that they are not prepared to dismiss employees on grounds of non-membership of a trade union.

Trade Union	Employer	Result (for or against continuance of the closed shop)	Number of employees
National Union of Public Employees	London Ambulance Service	Against	2,113
Transport and General Workers Union (TGWU) Confederation of Health Service Employees General, Municipal and Boilermakers Union
Electrical, Electronic Telecommunication and Plumbing Trade Union	Cossor Electronics (Essex)	For	695
Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers (USDAW)	Kays Mail Order (Leeds, Bradford)	For	1,500
TGWU	Kays Mail Order (Worcester) manual employees	For	not known
	non-manual employees	Against	not known
USDAW	British Mail Order Corporation (Lancashire)	For	not known
USDAW	Rank Hovis McDougall (Leeds)	For	not known
National Graphical Association SOGAT '82	Reuters International News Agency (London)	Against	854

Trade Unions (Ballots)

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list instances of pre-strike ballots held in accordance with the Trade Union Act 1984 and the result of those ballots.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Press reports indicate that since the strike ballot provisions of the Trade Union Act 1984 came into effect on 26 September one ballot has been held as a direct result of legal proceedings brought under the Act. In that instance a majority of the union members voting expressed their willingness to take part in industrial action. However, in three other reported cases — including Austin Rover — employers have obtained injunctions which required the trade unions concerned to desist from organising industrial action because they had failed to hold ballots in accordance with the Act.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Employment which trade unions have informed his Department of their acceptance of public money for postal ballots.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am informed by the Certification Officer that 26 trade unions have applied for public money since the inception of the funding scheme in 1980. Press reports suggest that for the first time a number of unions affiliated to the TUC are either intending to make applications for funding or are pressing the TUC to change its policy of boycotting the scheme. Unions mentioned in these reports include:

The Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers, (Engineering Section)
The Association of Scientific Technical and Managerial Staffs
The Electrical Electronic Telecommunication and Plumbing Union and
The United Road Transport Union.

Trade Union (Rule Books)

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information his Department has received about the number of trade unions which are looking at ways of bringing their rule books into line with the provisions of the Trade Union Act 1984; and if he will list them.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Trade unions with political funds which intend to hold review ballots under the provisions of the 1984 Act in order to continue spending money on party political matters will need to adopt new rules for the holding of these ballots. Reports suggest that most of the 60 trade unions with political funds will choose to do so. The provisions of the 1984 Act relating to elections and ballots before industrial action place no specifc obligations on trade unions to alter their rules. However, press reports suggest that a number of trade unions are contemplating rule changes as a result of one or both of these provisions, including

The Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers (Engineering Section)
The Engineers and Managers Association
The General Municipal Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union
The Union of Communication Workers
The United Road Transport Union.

The provisions of the Act concerning union elections do not come into force until 1 October 1985.

Manufacturing Industry (Statistics)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the United Kingdom and the United States of America the increase in prices and earnings in manufacturing, taking account of changes in working hours, over the past 12 months together with the increase in take-home pay as a result of changes in taxation; whether he will include figures showing hours worked and the change in unit labour costs in both cases; and if he will compare the latest monthly change in the employment figures in the two countries for manufacturing and for other industries.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest information for comparable periods is as follows:

	Percentage change
(a) Percentage change in retail prices in the 12 months to October 1984
United Kingdom (Retail Prices Index)	+5·0
United States (Consumer Price Index)	+4·2
(b) Percentage change in average gross hourly earnings in manufacturing industries in the 12 months to September 1984
Great Britain (estimated underlying increase)*	About 8·25
United States (production workers)	3·7
(c) Percentage change in average weekly hours in manufacturing industries (seasonally adjusted) in the 12 months to September 1984
Great Britain (operatives)	+0·3
United States (production workers)	−0·5
(d) Percentage change in manufacturing unit wage and salary costs in the 12 months to August 1984
United Kingdom	+5·1
United States	+0·7

	Manufacturing†	Other industries and services
(e) Change in employees in employment between March and June 1984 (thousands, seasonally adjusted)
Great Britain	+3	+7
United States (non agricultural payrolls)	+163	+914

* The estimated underlying increase for Great Britain is based on the underlying increase in average weekly earnings in manufacturing industries of 8·75 per cent. and the information on average weekly hours of operatives.

† The change between August and September, available only for manufacturing employees, was +13 thousand in Great Britain and −124 thousand in the United States.

Changes in taxation are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Industrial Training Associations

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps are taken by the Manpower Services Commission to liaise with those industrial training associations which have replaced training boards, now abolished, over matters relating to training content, work place supervision, and levy on grant arrangements; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission maintains contact with training organisations, which replaced industrial training boards, through appointed liaison officers, and by regular provision of information on training issues, national training policies and publicly-funded training assistance. These contacts also provide opportunities for consultation and discussion. Such bodies of course do not have a statutory right to impose levy on their members.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether Manpower Services Commission area boards have introduced arrangements to pay grants direct to individual firms, thereby bypassing industrial training associations; and whether he will discuss with the chairman whether the practice should continue.

Mr. Peter Morrison: As set out in the White Paper, "Training For Jobs" (Cmnd. 9135), the adult training strategy aims to improve and strengthen opportunities for meeting the needs of local industry and commerce. This will include provision of publicly funded local training grants available via Manpower Services Commission area offices. A limited number of pilot schemes are being run in the 1984-85 financial year.

Grant schemes which meet nationally identified priorities, such as computer and other priority skills training, continue to be available to employers through industry training organisations. In cases where companies approaching Manpower Services Commission area offices for local grant aid appear eligible for such national grants, they are first invited to contact the appropriate industry training organisation.

Training Grants

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether the Manpower Services Commission has any proposals currently under consideration to disqualify companies employing over 200 people from any training grants; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No such proposals are under consideration. The Manpower Services Commission has a number of schemes which are directly aimed at assisting the creation and growth of new firms and therefore assist only small firms. While there are not any grant schemes that disqualify companies of a particular size, there are conditions in a number of schemes that give priority to small firms.

New Training Initiative

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the air transport and travel industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(2) if he will report, for each region and each training year 1979-80 to 1984-85, on the level of recruitment to first-year apprentice training in the carpet industry, the ceramics, glass and mineral products industry, the chemical and allied products industry, the cotton and allied textiles industry, the furniture and timber industry, the iron and steel industry, the printing and publishing industry, the rubber and plastics industry, the shipbuilding industry and the wool, jute and flax industry, respectively.

(3) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the shipbuilding industry industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(4) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the wool, jute and flax industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(5) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the carpet industry industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(6) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the man-made fibres industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(7) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the printing and publishing industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(8) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the iron and steel industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(9) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the knitting, lace and net industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(10) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the furniture and timber industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(11) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the hotel and catering industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(12) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the food, drink and tobacco industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(13) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the distributive industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(14) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the cotton and allied textiles industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(15) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the chemical and allied products industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(16) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the clothing and allied products industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

(17) if he will detail the training arrangements which replaced the ceramics, glass and mineral products industrial training board and make a statement concerning progress towards the objectives of the new training initiative in that sector;

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall write to the hon. Member over the recess and place a copy of my letter in the Library.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Pension Funds

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost in the present and in the next financial year of tax relief to pension funds.

Mr. Moore: Measurement of the revenue cost of tax reliefs available to occupational pension schemes and contributors depends upon the choice of an alternative tax regime against which the present arrangements are to be compared. The Inland Revenue's consultative paper of September 1983 "Cost of tax reliefs for pension schemes: appropriate statistical approach" set out five possible bases for such a comparison. At 1984-85 levels, the revenue cost of reliefs under these five approaches would range from £900 million to £3,400 million. I regret that it is not possible to provide figures for 1985-86.

GDP and Consumer Spending

Mr. Maples asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the figures for gross domestic product and consumer spending at 1980 prices and current prices for each of the years 1978 to 1983, and the latest available estimates for 1984.

Mr. Peter Rees: Current and constant price figures for consumers' expenditure and gross domestic product to the end of 1983 were published in the 1984 edition of "United Kingdom National Accounts". The Government's latest forecasts for gross domestic product and consumers' expenditure at constant prices in 1984 were published in the autumn statement.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Maples asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the figures for total public expenditure, including debt interest and before deducting the proceeds of asset sales, for each of the years from 1978-79 to 1983-84, with the estimated figures for 1984-85 and 1985-86, all at 1980 prices.

Mr. Peter Rees: The figures requested are:

	£ billion (1980 cost terms)
1979-80	101·0
1980-81	102·0
1981-82	105·3
1982-83	107·6
1983-84	109·2
1984-85	111·4
1985-86	110·6

These figures represent the public expenditure planning total and general government gross debt interest with receipts from the sales of special and fixed assets added back, deflated to 1980 cost terms. Figures for 1978-79 are not available on a consistent definition.

Mr. Maples asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the figures at constant prices for total gross public capital expenditure, before deducting the proceeds of asset sales, for each of the years 1973-74, 1978-79 to 1983-84, and the latest estimates for 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Rees: The latest available figures for total gross public sector capital spending were published in table 1.13 of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1984-85 to 1986-87" (Cmnd. 9143). In 1982-83 cost terms they were:

	£ billion
1978-79	21·8
1979-80	22·0
1980-81	21·6
1981-82	20·7
1982-83	21·4
1983-84	22·2
1984-85	21·7

These figures are expressed before deducting the proceeds of asset sales and also include other adjustments to the public expenditure planning total as explained in the footnotes to the published table.

Figures for 1973-74 and 1985-86 are not available on consistent definitions. Revised figures for recent years to 1985-86 will be published in the next public expenditure White Paper.

Mr. Maples asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in considering the job creation effects of various forms of public expenditure, what estimate he uses of (a) the gross cost in public expenditure terms and (b) the net cost in public sector borrowing requirement terms of the job creation effects of home improvement grants.

Mr. Peter Rees: There are a number of technical difficulties in making a precise estimate of the cost per job resulting from various public expenditure programmes. However, in broad terms, the net cost per net person off the employment register of public expenditure on home improvement grants is estimated to be more than 10 times that of the average such net cost for special employment measures.

Manufacturing Employment

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the peak employment in manufacturing in the United Kingdom since 1960 compared to the present; and what was the peak, and what is the present employment, in manufacturing in other industrial countries.

Mr. Peter Rees: Index numbers for the employed labour force in United Kingdom manufacturing from 1960 to the present are provided in the annual supplement of Economic Trends (1984 edition) and in the November 1984 edition of Economic Trends. Similar estimates for other industrial countries can be found in the OECDs "Main Economic Indicators".

Taxpayers (Tourism)

Mr. Hirst asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the present number of self-employed taxpayers whose income wholly or principally arises from tourist-related activities.

Mr. Moore: I regret that this information is not available, as such taxpayers are not identified by the occupational classification used when the statistics are collected.

Pay and Jobs (Links)

Mr. Maples asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what links the Treasury model assumes between real wages or total real employment costs and total employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Rees: The estimate of the relationship between real wages and employment, which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given the House on 30 October at column 1183, was based on a survey of academic studies and on the results of simulations of the Treasury model. Details of the evidence, including the simulation results, will be published in the new year.

Mr. Maples asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the link between total employment costs and total employment in terms of jobs created or lost for decreases or increases in such costs.

Mr. Peter Rees: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has already given the House his estimate of the additional jobs that would result, over a period of years, if real wages had been held constant between 1981 and 1984—30 October, column 1183. It was based on evidence that a sustained 1 per cent. fall in the average level of real employment costs will, in time, lead to an increase of between 0·5 and 1 per cent. in employment.

EC (Contributions)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the sum which the United Kingdom will have paid to the Common Market, net of any repayments, during the calendar year 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

EC (Refund)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the refund which the United Kingdom has secured in discussion within the Council of Ministers of £600 million in respect of the year 1985 is subject, before actual payment, to the approval of the Common Market Assembly; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Fontainebleau European Council of Heads of State and Government agreed that the United Kingdom should receive in 1985 a refund of 1,000 million ecu in respect of its excessive budgetary burden in 1984. The Council agreed that this should be paid by deduction from the United Kingdom's VAT share in 1985. The payment will not be dependent on the approval of the European Parliament.

EC (Expenditure)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the limit on the sum of total expenditure which the Common Market Council of Ministers will, by qualified majority, be able to determine when the additional own resources and budgetary restraint mechanism come into effect.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Woodcock asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received concerning the effect of the introduction of value added tax on the fish and chip business; and whether there are any plans to alter the rate of value added tax on hot-take away food.

Mr. Hayhoe: Treasury Ministers continue to receive letters and the Hot Take-Away Action Group has also recently made further representations. As regards the second part of the question, I cannot anticipate the Budget.

Privatisation (Fees and Commissions)

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in the Official Report (a) updated figures for fees paid, including fees to auditors in respect of the first share issues for Amersham International Ltd., Associated British Ports, British Aerospace, British Railways Board Hotels, Britoil, Cable and Wireless and the National Freight Corporation and (b) all the fees and commissions paid to primary underwriters, sub-underwriters, financial advisers, legal advisers, auditors and stockbrokers in respect of the second Cable and Wireless issue, the second Associated British Ports issue, Enterprise Oil, Sealink, Jaguar, British Telecom and the 1979 and 1983 BP issues; and if he will name each firm concerned.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Non-residents (Taxation)

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to authorise the issue of a consultative document covering the taxation of non-residents operating in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Ian Stewart: It is proposed that a consultative document on the taxation of non-residents operating in the United Kingdom will be issued next year. However, in advance of consultation on the wider issues, I have authorised the Inland Revenue to publish today a consultative paper on the tax treatment of non-resident investors who use the services of United Kingdom investment managers. Comments are invited by 1 February 1985.

I have arranged to have copies of the document placed in the Library of the House.

Customs Controls (Staff)

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what response he is making to the claim by the Customs and Excise Council of Civil Service Unions for 500 additional staff for the operation of customs controls.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have written to the secretary of the council as follows:

"When you and your Trade Union Side colleagues came to see me on 21 November, and I am grateful for the constructive points you made, I promised to report our discussion to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which I have done, and then to let you have a written reply to your claim.

Government policy is that Civil Service manpower should match the needs of the work to be done. This means that staffing levels are decided only after careful consideration of the number of staff required to do the necessary work and to achieve the required results. This approach is applied to Customs and Excise work as it is to the generality of Government Departments.

The approach does not, of course, work in one direction only. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and I have been concerned to ensure that, taking full account of the scope for efficiency and other savings, Customs and Excise are allocated the appropriate level of resources to undertake their essential functions. For 1985-86 the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced on 10 October that Customs and Excise manpower would be increased by 185 posts above previous planning levels. This included 160 extra staff for customs preventive controls: the making permanent of 60 temporary posts allocated to enhance controls of both passengers and freight in 1984-85 and 100 new posts for the fight against drugs smuggling in 1985-86. These posts will be used in areas where they are most likely to yield results, for example, in increased intelligence gathering and targeted operations and in improving selective controls. Their deployment will be the subject of formal management proposals in due course, so that there will be a proper opportunity for the Trade Union Side to make any detailed points in the context of the Civil Service Whitley machinery.

I believe your claim underrates the very considerable successes achieved by Customs and Excise against drugs smuggling in recent years. For example, in the first 10 months of this year Customs and Excise seized over 250 kilos of heroin which is a considerable increase over the 212 kilos seized in the whole of 1983 and the 40 kilos seized in 1979. Over 200 persons have been arrested in relation to heroin offences so far this year, of whom more than 60 were principals or organisers rather than mere carriers. On 4 October Customs, assisted by police, seized almost five tonnes of cannabis from a ship in the River Crouch — one of the largest-ever seizures in Britain. These achievements reflect favourably on the Customs and Excise service and on the success of the intelligence-based approach to targeted operations which account for most of the larger seizures. I do not accept the implication in your claim that increased Customs seizures derive from no more than a pro rata increase in the rate of drugs smuggling.

To sum up, the new allocation of resources reflects our determination, as part of the Government's co-ordinated strategy against drugs abuse, to reinforce Customs' efforts and to build on their successes. I assure you that I shall continue to take a close interest in Customs' assessment of the drugs smuggling situation and the results achieved. Equally, the adequacy of Customs' resources will be carefully watched and will be reviewed as part of the 1985 public expenditure survey."

Capital Allowances

Sir William Clark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement about the consultations that have been taking place concerning the date on which capital expenditure is deemed to have been occurred for capital allowance purposes.

Mr. Lawson: The consultations announced by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary at Report stage of the Finance Bill on 11 July 1984 at column 1082 have been completed. In the light of those exchanges, I propose to bring the date on which expenditure is incurred for the purpose of capital allowances into line with the date on which it is treated as incurred for normal accountancy purposes. Broadly speaking, this will mean that allowances will be due to the purchaser of an asset on the date on which the obligation to pay arises, and at the rate prevailing on that date, which will normally be the date when title passes to him. There will, however, be a rule to prevent this basis being exploited for the purpose of artificially accelerating entitlement. The existing provisions under which allowances may in certain circumstances be available earlier (for example, in the case of stage payments or deposits) will be retained. Legislation to this effect will be included in the next Finance Bill. Where accounts for past periods have been drawn up in accordance with normal accountancy practice, the Inland Revenue will not seek to adjust them, whether or not the assessments are still open.

Pension Funds (Taxation)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in any consideration of additional taxation of pension funds, he will take into account the possible effects on the solvency of those funds or of the institutions which have guaranteed the payment of the benefits.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 13 December 1984, c. 574]: If such a change were contemplated I should naturally give very careful consideration to all the factors involved.

Pension Schemes

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people have contributed to pension schemes for which income tax is reclaimable on contributions in each of the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 13 December 1984, c. 574]: It is estimated that there are currently some 11·5 million employees contributing to occupational pension schemes and about 0·75 million people paying premiums under retirement annuity contracts. Relief from income tax is available in respect of these payments. I regret that figures for individual years are not available.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many pension schemes have been in operation for each of the last five years for which figures are available, from which, under present regulations, lump sum payments would be tax-free.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 13 December 1984, c. 574]: Virtually all occupational pension schemes and retirement annuity contracts allow for the payment of a lump sum on retirement (within certain limits) which is tax-free under present arrangements. There is no precise definition of what constitutes a "scheme"; but the sixth survey of occupational pension schemes by the Government Actuary estimated that there were about 90,000 employee-based schemes in 1979.

Lump Sum Retirement Payments (Taxation)

Mr. Roger King asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue would be raised in a full year if lump sum pension entitlements were taxed.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the tax yield from taxing lump sum payments on retirement.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984, c. 65]: Lump sum payments on retirement in 1984-85 are currently estimated at around £3 billion. If lump sums were brought into tax, the yield would depend, amongst other things, on the form of the tax and the rate at which it was charged.

Sterling Balances

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy towards official sterling balances.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984, c. 64]: Following the 1977 Basle agreement official holders of sterling were asked to restrict their balances to working levels, but I have concluded that it is no longer appropriate to continue with a restriction which applies to one class of sterling holder only. This change does not imply any desire to influence the level of official balances, which will be determined by the market.

Coins (Abolition)

Mr. David Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what savings would be obtained by abolishing the penny;

(2) what annual savings would be secured by abolishing the 1p and the 2p pieces.

Mr. Lawson [pursuant to his reply, 17 December, 1984, c. 64]: The costs saved by abolishing the 1p and 2p coins using current figures would be £0·9 million and £1·2 million respectively.

Mr. David Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures showing the real value of today's 5p and 2p pieces in 1930, 1940, 1950, 1960 and 1970; and which coins at the relevant dates would have come nearest to representing these values.

Mr. Lawson [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984, c. 64]: The values and nearest coins to today's 2p and 5p pieces are as follows:

November	Value at date shown		Nearest coins
	p	p	p	p
1984	2	5	2	5
			Old pence
	p	p	d	d
1970	0·41	1·02	1	*3
1960	0·27	0·68	*½	*1
1950	0·18	0·46	½	*1
1940	0·15	0·37	¼	1
1930	0·13	0·31	¼	*1

* Nearest single coin.

Single Parent Families

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government have any proposals to enable working women who are single parents to recover income tax relief in respect of necessary payments by them to child minders and nannies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Moore [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984, c. 65]: No. Single parents already qualify for the additional personal allowance, which is worth £1,150 in 1984-85.

Nationalised Industries (Shares)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the study he conducted on the free distribution of shares in nationalised industries.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984, c. 65]: The possibility was examined in depth in 1979 and 1980 and ruled out for reasons which still apply. Any such scheme would be extremely complex and the costs would significantly reduce the benefit that could be distributed. The work that led to these conclusions is not suitable for publication.

Caravan Sites (Taxation)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Inland Revenue has turned down any applications from owners of touring caravan pitches and third party static caravan pitches to be taxed under Schedule D clause 1 since the implementation of the Finance Act 1984.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984, c. 66]: This information is not available centrally. Decisions on the appropriate basis of assessment in individual cases are taken at local office level.

National Insurance Pensions (Taxation)

Mr. Higgins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people have been charged income tax on their national insurance pensions before the pension has been paid because of the industrial action in the Department of Health and Social Security.

Mr. Lawson [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984, c. 66]: The information on which to base an estimate of the number of persons who have been charged income tax on their national insurance pensions before the pension has been paid is not available. However, the emergency arrangements introduced by DHSS for the payment of retirement pensions during the industrial action should ensure that all pensioners receive their pensions without undue delay. If my hon. Friend is aware of any pensioner who is experiencing particular difficulty in obtaining payment of his pension, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security would be glad to look into it.

Alcoholic Beverages (Taxation)

Mr. Gardiner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue effect per penny of reducing total tax charges, excise duty plus value added tax on beer, spirits and low, medium and high strength wines, respectively, expressed in £ million at 1985-86 prices.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984, c. 66]: The estimated revenue losses are:

	Price reduction (duty plus consequential VAT)	Full year net revenue cost at 1985-86 prices (£ million)
Beer	1p per pint	90
Spirits	1p per bottle	1
Wine and Made-Wine
low strength*	1p per bottle	5
medium and high strength†	1p per bottle	1·5

Notes:

* Less than 15 per cent. alcohol by volume.

† 15 per cent. to 18 per cent. and over 18 per cent. alcohol by volume.

Within limits the revenue estimates shown here can be scaled up to give a reasonable guide to the effects of larger duty reductions, although the margins of uncertainty become progressively larger as the size of reduction increases.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Asbestos Cement

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the quantity of asbestos cement imported into the United Kingdom for each year since 1981; and how these figures compare with the quantities imported for each of the previous five years.

Mr. Channon: Asbestos cement is not separately identified in the statistics of overseas trade.

Imports of articles of asbestos cement, cellulose-fibre cement and the like (the bulk of which is believed to have been of asbestos cement) have been as follows:

	Quantity (MT thousands)
1977	33·7
1978	41·5
1979	55·1
1980	66·9
1981	56·7
1982	61·5
1983	101·9
1984 January to October	89·3

Phoenix 2

Mr. Duffy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to make a statement on the Phoenix 2 joint venture.

Mr. Butcher: Final proposals received from BSC and GKN in November are now under appraisal. My right hon. Friend intends to make a statement in due course.

Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many firms to date have benefited from the loan guarantee scheme;

(2) what is the total money guaranteed so far under the loan guarantee scheme;

(3) how much money the Government have received to date in premiums;

(4) what percentage of loans from the loan guarantee scheme has gone to start-up firms.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Trafalgar House

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether there have been any cash payments to Trafalgar House, directly or indirectly, in respect of its purchase of Scott-Lithgow since the answer of 9 April, Official Report, column 19; and whether any additional payments are now anticipated.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the right hon. Member as soon as possible.

Exchange Risk Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of the exchange risk guarantee scheme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry announced on 3 November 1983 that the exchange risk guarantee scheme was being extended until 31 December 1984.

The scheme provides exchange risk cover for loans advanced by the European Investment Bank and the European Coal and Steel Community, mainly to firms in the assisted areas. The Government have decided to extend this part of the scheme until 31 March 1985 to enable its future to be reviewed in the light of the changes in regional industrial policy that I announced to the House on 28 November.

The scheme also provides exchange risk cover for lending to small firms under the new community instrument. The Government have now concluded that taking account of rising costs and the availability of alternative sources of finance, this cover outside the assisted areas should come to an end on 31 December 1984. Suitable transitional arrangements will be worked out with the new Community instrument's agents.

I shall make a further statement when the Government have completed their review of cover for the lending of the European Investment Bank and European Coal and Steel Community.

Norton Villiers Triumph Ltd.

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will report on the negotiations to sell the Government's shareholding in Norton Villiers Triumph Ltd.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am pleased to report that negotiations have now been completed and the Department's remaining shareholding of 1 million A and 1·372 million B preference shares in Norton Villiers Triumph Ltd. have been sold to Manganese Bronze Holdings plc for a consideration of £0·375 million.

Shipbuilding Redundancy Payments Scheme

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he intends to extend the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme beyond its present expiry date of 30 June 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Yes. The Government will shortly introduce a Bill to extend the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme, and the parallel scheme for Northern Ireland, on the same terms as at present. The extension will be for a final period of 18 months ending on 31 December 1986.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Sir. David Price asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how successful international contributions to Ethiopian hunger relief have been to date; how far these contributions have reached the starving people concerned; what more is required of the international community to stave off famine in Ethiopia; and what more the United Kingdom proposes to do.

Mr. Raison: Contributions made by the international community and the public are having a definite impact, as I saw on my recent visit. Food aid shipments from present pledges now look sufficient until the end of February, and there is more to come. I believe the vast bulk of these contributions have reached those in the greatest need, though it is difficult to supply the areas where civil strife continues. We expect help to be needed until the end of 1985, but the assessment of what is required will have to be done primarily by Mr. Jansson, the United Nations special co-ordinator. We will decide what more we should do, alone or through the European Community and other agencies, in the light of his reports.

Philippines

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Commonwealth Development Corporation has decided on any additional investment in the Philippines.

Mr. Raison: The proposed project at Loreto, in which CDC were interested, was dependent on road access, the finance for which has not been forthcoming. CDC is therefore proceeding no further with the project at the present time. The CDC has no other plans for new projects in the Philippines.

TRANSPORT

M25 Motorway (Accident)

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in his examination of data about the M25 disaster, he will inquire into (a) the number of police cars deployed at the time and (b) whether the road signals were working and were conveying the appropriate information.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) on 12 December 1984 at column 528.

Railway Investment

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport what sums of public money have been invested in the railways in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. David Mitchell: Investment by the British Railways Board is shown in the table. Railways in Northern Ireland are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

1983	276	(290)	105	(110)	381	(400)

Note:
Figures for 1974, 1982 and 1983 have been provided by the British Railways Board. Figures for 1975 to 1981 have been derived from table 8.1 of the "Report of the Review of Railway Finances (Vol. 1), 1983." Figures are converted to 1984 prices using the GDP market price deflator.

Motorway Warning Signs

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will instruct officials responsible for motorway signs to introduce immediately a temporary high visibility sign system on motorways showing recent accidents and the number of fatalities at the site of such accidents to remind motorists of the dangers.

Mrs. Chalker: No. Motorways generally are much safer than other roads and such signs would be distracting.

Speed Limits

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the cost of accidents on non-built up roads with (a) speed limits of 60 mph and (b) speed limits of 70 mph in each case where there is no street lighting.

Mrs. Chalker: In 1983 the total costs of accidents in darkness on unlit non-built up roads with a speed limit of 60 mph is estimated at about £200 million. The equivalent figure for such roads with a 70 mph speed limit is £44 million.

These figures comprise resource costs and an allowance for pain, grief and suffering.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of non-built up roads come under his jurisdiction; and if he will give the figures for those with speed limits of 50 mph, 60 mph and 70 mph respectively.

Mrs. Chalker: The proportion of non-built up roads in England that are under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State for Transport was 6·2 per cent. at 1 April 1984.

Of these roads 1·5 per cent. had a speed limit of 50 mph, 49·5 per cent. had a speed limit of 60 mph and 49 per cent. had a speed limit of 70 mph.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the cost of accidents on non-built up roads with a speed limit of 50 mph where there is no street lighting.

Mrs. Chalker: In 1983 the total cost of accidents in darkness on unlit non-built up roads with a speed limit of 50 mph is estimated at about £3 million.

The figure comprises resource costs and an allowance for pain, grief and suffering.

Roads (Lighting)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the reduction in accidents which would arise from the installation of lighting on the unlit non-built up roads with a 50 mph speed limit.

Mrs. Chalker: The only research in this area relating specifically to roads with a 50 mph speed limit gave an inconclusive result. A copy of the research report, TRRL Report LR 586, is in the Library.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the likely reduction in accident costs should lighting be installed on the unlit sections of non-built-up roads with (a) 60 mph speed limits and (b) 70 mph speed limits.

Mrs. Chalker: Research results show the reduction in injury accidents to be extremely variable. Further studies are in hand to try to improve the information. There are no estimates of likely reductions in the costs of accidents were lighting to be provided on all these roads.

GLC (Lorry Ban)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria he will adopt in deciding whether to retain the Greater London council's current night time lorry ban if, as proposed in his latest transport consultation paper, he takes over responsibility for the Archway road from the Greater London council.

Mrs. Chalker: Our policy is to encourage an support local lorry management measures where they are justified. Policy on this matter was set out in my Department's circular 2/82 "Lorry controls." It is against those criteria that we would judge the case for continuing the present night-time Archway lorry ban if, as proposed, the Secretary of State assumes responsibility for that part of the A1 to which the current ban applies.

London Transport

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what improvements have been initiated to the arrangements for interchange between London Regional Transport and British Rail, other than those already in hand or being planned, since the London Regional Transport Act came into effect.

Mrs. Chalker: While the London Regional Transport Bill was before Parliament, the operators began work on a review of interchanges. That work is now being carried forward under the auspices of the London Passenger Transport Group set up by my right hon. Friend after the London Regional Transport Act 1984 came into force. A number of interchange points are being examined with a view to identifying those where improvements could be of most benefit to travellers.

Railways (Accidents)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents there have been on British Rail during 1984; how many people were killed and injured on each occasion; and what was found to be the cause of each accident.

Mr. Ridley: So far during 1984 there have been 64 significant accidents on British Rail involving passenger trains. Significant accidents, as defined in the Department's published annual report on railway safety, are those which are actually or potentially hazardous to passengers. The accidents during 1984 have resulted in 20 deaths — 17 passengers and three railway staff — 16 serious injuries and 259 minor injuries. The causes of each accident are subject to investigation and will be covered in published reports. The total number of significant accidents in 1984 is likely to be no greater than in recent years, and considerably below the number recorded during the 1970s.

Motorways (Signs)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport at what intervals it is his Department's policy to place speed warning signs on motorways where such signs are used.

Mr. Ridley: Flashing amber lights operated at the roadside by the police are provided at 3-km intervals for the opening of individual sections of new motorway. They are superseded at the same locations by remotely controlled matrix signals in the central reservation. Where there is a need to display different restrictions over individual lanes, such as on the approaches to motorway/motorway interchanges, on an elevated motorway, or on the approaches to motorway tunnels, the matrix signals are mounted at closer intervals on gantries.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the cost of (a) a flashing motorway speed warning sign, (b) a motorway digital speed warning sign sited in the central reservation and (c) an overhead motorway speed warning system.

Mr. Ridley: Typical costs are as follows:

(a) £600 for each sign;

(b) £46,000 for back-to-back post mounted signals at a nominal 3-km spacing;

(c) £231,000 per carriageway for a system of three gantries, which is usually the minimum required for an overhead system.

London Underground

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport in each of the last 10 years, how many fires have occurred on London Transport Underground, which had some effect on passenger service; and what information he has as to the cause of each fire.

Mr. Ridley: The full information to reply to this question is not readily available. I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents there have been on London Transport Underground in each of the last 10 years; and, in each year, how many deaths and how many injuries have been caused.

Mr. Ridley: Details of all serious accidents on London Regional Transport's railways, including the number of deaths and injuries, are given in the Department's published annual reports on railway safety, copies of which are in the Library.

Lorries (Accident Statistics)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people have been killed by lorries in Greater London in each of the last five years.

Mr. Ridley: It is not possible to say how many fatalities have arisen from direct collisions with lorries. However, the following data are available:

Fatalities in Greater London in accidents involving lorries

	1982	1983
Lorry drivers	1	1
Others (including pedestrians)	67	55

Figures for earlier years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will define the term "severely injured" in relation to road accident statistics.

Mrs. Chalker: The term "severely injured" is not used by the Department to describe road accident severity. The categories used are fatal, serious and slight, and the definition of each of these terms is given on page 37 of "Road Accidents Great Britain 1983", a copy of which is in the Library.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Stokes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his current estimate of the evasion of vehicle excise duty.

Mr. Ridley: A report prepared by the Government Statistical Service and published today by my Department gives an estimate of some £70 million to £110 million for the annual revenue loss; 3·5 to 5 per cent. of vehicle excise duty revenue due in Great Britain in 1984-85. The best estimate of the amount of revenue that will be lost due to evasion this financial year is £90 million—just over 4 per cent.

This estimate is based on a roadside survey in June 1984. The survey identified higher than average rates of evasion in London and also indicated a particular problem relating to motor cycles. I have placed copies of the report in the Library.

I am now considering what further action is required in the light of both this report and that of the Public Accounts Committee published on 2 May.

London Regional Transport (Grants)

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce his proposals for the levy on London's ratepayers in support of his grants to London Regional Transport for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to the reply, 17 December 1984, c. 68]: The following is a fuller reply.

Under section 13 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984, I am empowered to make a levy on London ratepayers to cover up to two thirds of the cost of my total grants to London Regional Transport for 1985-86. Accordingly, I have today laid before Parliament a draft levy order, which is subject to affirmative resolution. This provides for a levy of 10·80 pence in the pound, estimated to raise £212 million. This is equivalent to 65·6 per cent. of my estimated expenditure on grants to LRT in 1985-86 of £323 million; the balance of £111 million comes from the Exchequer.

The Government have set LRT the primary task of securing better value for money through improved efficiency. LRT's specific financial objective is to reduce the revenue support requirement to half the 1984-85 level of £190 million by 1987-88. This will enable the Government to continue to reduce the burden upon taxpayers and ratepayers, while providing for continuing substantial levels of capital investment.

Substantial progress is already being made towards these goals. The element of grant for revenue support—about £125 million—is £65 million below the GLC's 1984-85 provision. At the same time, the capital element of the grant—about £200 million—is £50 million more than the GLC's budgeted capital grant for this year. Yet in 1985-86, the ratepayer will have to find only £212 million towards this programme—some £50 million less than in 1984-85 on a comparable basis.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has made an adjustment to the grant-related poundage schedule for London authorities in the rate support grant settlement to ensure that London ratepayers, and those elsewhere, are treated fairly following the transfer of LRT financing from local to central Government.

Improving efficiency has enabled LRT to contain its proposed fares increase in January to an average of 9 per cent. which will still leave fares about 10 per cent. lower, in real terms, than they were in May 1981 when the present GLC administration took office. LRT plans to maintain underground services at their present level for 1985-86 and to reduce bus services slightly, in line with falling demand.

The increase in resources for investment will enable LRT further to improve efficiency and to make public transport facilities more attractive to passengers, including, for example, a substantial programme of station modernisation on the underground.

Further details of LRT's proposals for 1985-86 will be given in its annual business plan, which I understand has been published today. Copies will be made available to hon. Members.

British Transport Police

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is his policy for the future of the British Transport police;

(2) if he will list the sites at which British Transport police are currently employed and those sites at which they were employed in 1979, giving the numbers employed at each site in both cases;

(3) what procedures there are for vetting private security firms where they are to take over the work of the British Transport police;

(4) what consultations he has had with employers and warehouse owners at the sites on which staff reductions are proposed for the British Transport police;

(5) whether he is satisfied that reductions in the numbers of British Transport police will have no adverse affect on Her Majesty's Government's ability to combat drug smuggling.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to the reply, 17 December 1984, c. 70]: The future of the British Transport police force is entirely a matter for the British Railways Board—its employer—in consultation, where necessary, with other users. The responsibility for the detailed deployment of the force rests with the chief constable, and it would be for him to produce information on this subject if he saw fit.

I have no doubt that those responsible for preventing crime, including drugs trafficking, will continue to ensure that these commitments are met. The vetting of private security firms is for those who wish to employ them.

DEFENCE

RAF Basic Trainer

71. Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many jobs will be created by the combined Royal Air Force and anticipated overseas sales of each of the contenders for the Royal Air Force basic trainer contract.

Mr. Butler: It is not possible to give precise estimates for the number of jobs which would be likely to be created in connection with each of the four aircraft under consideration, taking into account prospects for overseas sales. However, in view of the fact that the bulk of the airframe and equipment work would fall to United Kingdom firms, regardless of which aircraft was chosen, the number of direct job opportunities would be substantial and run to some hundreds.

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is in a position to announce his decision on the selection of the future Royal Air Force basic trainer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: The four competing tenders have been thoroughly evaluated by the Ministry of Defence. The evaluation has shown that two of the contenders have clear-cut advantages over the others in terms of cost and performance, which are the critical factors involved in the decision. I have therefore decided to invite best and final offers from British Aerospace and Shorts in order to clarify and amplify certain aspects of their present tenders, so that I may reach a final decision between the options, which still include the possibility of refurbishing the Jet Provost.

RAF Stations (Asbestos Cement)

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Air Force stations are currently being refurbished by the Property Services Agency using asbestos cement.

Mr. Lee: This information is not held centrally and its collation may take some time. My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write to the hon. Member in due course.

Aircraft Contracts

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the value of aircraft contracts which have been awarded to (a) Short Brothers, (b) British Aerospace and (c) Westlands by his Department since January 1978.

Mr. Butler: It is not our practice to reveal commercially sensitive information of this kind, but annex F of volume 1 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984" (Cmnd. 9227-I) gives an indication of the order of payments to these contractors in 1982-83.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of the aircraft business carried out by (a) Short Bros., (b) British Aerospace and (c) Westlands has been provided by his Department's contracts between January 1978 and December 1983.

Mr. Butler: Precise information of this kind could be provided only by the companies themselves.

Royal Ordnance Pension Schemes

Sir Antony Buck asked the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the composition of the boards of trustees of the royal ordnance pension schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: The funds of the two royal ordnance pension schemes will be vested in corporate trustees. The boards of directors of each trustee company will comprise, in addition to a chairman who will at least in the first instance be the chairman of the Royal Ordnance plc, five directors representing the management of the company and five directors representing the work force. This variation from the previously intended composition announced by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement during the Committee stage of the Ordnance Factories and Military Services Bill—3 April 1984, column 657—has been developed jointly as a result of proposals made by the trades unions.

Lemnos (NATO Troops)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there are any North Atlantic Treaty Organisation troops stationed on the island of Lemnos.

Mr. Stanley: I cannot add to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to my hon. Friend on 14 December 1984 at column 629.

General Belgrano

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence how long it was before HMS Conqueror's sighting of the General Belgrano was relayed to the task force from Northwood.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 30 November 1984, c. 598]: It appears about half an hour.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence at what time the request from Admiral Woodward that the General Belgrano be sunk was received by Northwood.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 30 November 1984, c. 598]: I cannot add to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 22 October at column 471.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence how long the elapse of time was between the drafting of the sighting report by HMS Conqueror on 1 May 1982 and its receipt by Northwood; and whether there were any communications difficulties between HMS Conqueror and Northwood.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 30 November 1984, c. 598]: The time between drafting and receipt is not known precisely. It is likely to have been less than half an hour.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Gibraltar

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will take steps to ensure that the entry of Spain to the European Economic Community does not lead to the lowering of wage rates and standards of living of citizens of Gibraltar.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 13 December at column 600.

Lausanne Treaty

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice his Department has sought from international lawyers outside his Department as to the effect of the Salonika agreement upon the provisions of the treaty of Lausanne in so far as that treaty affects Britain's obligations.

Mr. Renton: In the time available it has not been possible to establish definitely whether such advice has ever been sought. But in view of the answer I gave my hon. Friend on 14 December, at column 628, such consultation is most unlikely to have been necessary.

Lemnos

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will now make representations to the Government of Greece about the militarisation of the island of Lemnos.

Mr. Renton: No. I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 11 December at column 450.

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will discuss with the Secretary General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation the possibility of making representations to the Greek Government about, or raising in the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Council, the issue of the militarisation of the island of Lemnos by Greece.

Mr. Renton: No. The matter is already the subject of consideration by the Secretary General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.

Diplomatic Service

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is now in a position to give details of the Diplomatic Service posts which are to be closed; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The posts are as follows:

Santo Domingo, Vientiane, Antwerp, Blantyre, Cagliari, Gothenburg, Halifax, Salonika, Vigo and Zagreb.

In addition, I have decided to postpone the planned reopening of an embassy in Conakry and to merge the posts of ambassador to Austria and head of delegation to the MBFR talks in Vienna.

These closures will inevitably mean that Diplomatic Service coverage in the political and consular fields and our support for exporters will not be as comprehensive as in the past, but I am satisfied that overall British interests are better protected by concentrating resources on slightly fewer areas where they are most needed.

We shall be making arrangements for non-resident representation in Santo Domingo and Vientiane.

We are also considering the appointment of honorary consuls where appropriate. An honorary consul gives on-the-spot assistance to British nationals who are in serious difficulties or involved in emergencies; and can also provide useful contacts with local authorities, commerce and industry.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk Production (Super Levies)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, why the United Kingdom has to pay super levies to the EEC when the aggregate present level of milk production is below the national quota.

Mr. MacGregor: First-hand purchasers — where formula B is applied—or wholesale producers—where formula A is applied—and producers who sell direct are liable to levy if they exceed their own quotas. Even when national milk production is below the United Kingdom quota, therefore, some individual United Kingdom purchasers or producers may thus be liable for levy if they have not cut back enough.

Badgers

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many badgers were slaughtered in response to tuberculosis outbreaks in cattle in Cornwall in each of the last 10 years.

Mrs. Fenner: No realistic estimates can be made of the number of badgers slaughtered when gassing was the main method of badger control as the setts were sealed after gassing. Since the introduction of live trapping from July 1982 the number of badgers taken in official investigations in Cornwall are as follows:

	Number
1982 (July to December)	73
1983	167
1984 (January to October)	310

Synthetic Alcohol

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give details of the wine settlement agreed at the last meeting of the European Community Heads of Government; and what safeguards have been incorporated to protect the position of British producers of synthetic alcohol.

Mrs. Fenner: Details of the wine settlement were laid in the Library of the House on 10 December. There will be no change in the existing provisions protecting synthetic alcohol producers, but the introduction of an effective guarantee threshold, a restrictive price policy and aids for grubbing up vineyards will have a significant effect on the wine surplus and reduce the output of wine alcohol.

Food Legislation (Review)

Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the review by officials of food legislation in the United Kingdom has been completed; and what further action the Government propose to take.

Mrs. Fenner: The review by officials of the relevant Departments has been completed and a report submitted to Ministers. My right hon. Friends and I have studied this report and agreed that a consultative document which discusses many aspects of the legislation should be published. Interested organisations representing consumer, manufacturing, retail, health, enforcement and many other groups will be invited to comment on the proposals contained in the document, and on the basis of the representations received we shall consider whether any changes in the law would be desirable.

Agricultural Arbitrators

Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will announce the date for the transfer of responsibility for the appointment of agricultural arbitrators in England and Wales from Agriculture Ministers to the president of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors.

Mr. Jopling: Section 8 of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1984 provides for the transfer of the Agriculture Ministers' current responsibilities for the appointment of agricultural arbitrators in England and Wales to the president of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors. I indicated during the passage of this legislation that the transfer would not take place for at least a year after Royal Assent. Following consultations with the president, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I are proposing to give effect to the transfer as from 1 January 1986. We have decided to announce this now so that the industry will have sufficient notice. I will be making a further statement relating to the detailed arrangements for the transfer towards the end of 1985. These arrangements will be fully discussed with the industry beforehand.

Three statutory instruments will be required to give effect to the transfer and these will be laid before Parliament during the autumn of 1985.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

College-Employer Links Project

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a progress report on the college-employer links project.

Sir Keith Joseph: Good progress is being made in this important venture, which has the support of employer associations, local education authorities and colleges, the further education examining and validating bodies, MSC, HMI and other bodies.

Project directors, supported by local steering committees of employer, college and other interests, are at work in the eight local education authority areas invited to participate in the project — Birmingham, Bradford, Cleveland, Ealing, Hertfordshire, Lancashire, Leeds and Wiltshire. Their inquiries of employers and colleges in their area about the effectiveness of links and the appropriateness of college courses to employers' needs are continuing, but a number of key issues have been identified: for example, the problems in serving small businesses; successful integration of in-house company training and college provision, both college-based and "in-plant"; the effectiveness of the advisory machinery in colleges and of employer input and appraisal of courses at both college and LEA level; and staff development needs in colleges and the contribution employers can make to meeting these. In most areas it has been agreed that the studies should concentrate on particular subject areas—examples are engineering, electronics, textiles, information technology, hotel and catering, robotics—and/or particular colleges in the project area. Close contact is being maintained with related initiatives sponsored by the Department and the Manpower Services Commission, particularly in the field of post-experience vocational education and training.

Interim reports are expected by about Easter and final reports by about the end of next year. The department will then consider what action may be required to extend good practice.

Secondary Schools

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what criteria are applied when examining local education authority proposals to cease to maintain a secondary school.

Mr. Dunn: The criteria which my right hon. Friend applies are set out in the Department's circulars 2/80 and 2/81 and in "Administrative Memorandum 4/84", copies of which I am sending to my hon. Friend.

Secondary School Reorganisation (Liverpool)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the future of Aigburth Vale girls' school and other schools affected by secondary school reorganisation in Liverpool.

Mr. Dunn: On 6 August 1984 my right hon. Friend approved Liverpool city council's proposals, published on 4 November 1983, for the reorganisation of county secondary schools with modifications to retain Holly lodge county secondary school for girls and West Derby county secondary school for boys and to defer implementation until August 1985. The authority is now required to implement these proposals as modified, including the establishment of a new school by amalgamation of Aigburth vale girls' school and Quarry bank high school.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the provision of resources and facilities in the reorganised Roman Catholic secondary schools in Liverpool.

Mr. Dunn: Total grant aid in the order of £2·52 million to £3 million will have been paid by the Department on capital building projects arising solely from Roman Catholic secondary reorganisation over the period since 1982-83; and my right hon. Friend will continue to afford what priority he can within the resources available nationally to support the work required to allow the full implementation of the Liverpool Roman Catholic secondary reorganisation. As the hon. Member is aware, the Department has taken up with Liverpool local education authority the question of the provision of furniture and equipment at the St. Francis Xaviers school in the light of the authority's refusal to purchase those items which are the property of the Society of Jesus, the former proprietor of the school

Single-sex Schools (Liverpool)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what single-sex school provision will be available to parents in south Liverpool from September 1985.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend excluded Holly lodge girls school and West Derby boys school, in order to retain an element of single-sex provision in the county secondary sector, when he approved Liverpool city council's proposals under section 12 of the Education Act 1980 to reorganise county secondary provision. These proposals did not affect the voluntary sector where single-sex provision also continues to be available.

Dyslexic Children

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied that local education authorities possess adequate resources for providing improved learning facilities for dyslexic children.

Mr. Dunn: Yes. Provided that cost increases can be contained, the Government's plans will allow the great majority of authorities in aggregate to make some improvement in pupil teacher ratios in special education and to maintain their non-teaching costs per pupil at 1982-83 levels. It is, however, for LEAs to determine the allocation of their resources.

Books and Periodicals (Prices)

Mr. Crouch asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the change in price levels of books and periodicals of the type purchased by educational establishments since 1980; if he has any information on the effect of these price changes on the level of purchases; and what account he takes of expenditure incurred by educational establishments on books and periodicals in formulating his general education policies.

Mr. Dunn: Various indices can be used to measure changes in the price of books and periodicals. They include the Publishers Association's index of school book prices, the books, periodicals and binding element of the index of changes in university recurrent costs and the books element of the retail price index. These indices show increases between 1980 and 1984 of some 40 per cent., 70 per cent., and 80 per cent., respectively. The overall retail price index—all items except food—rose by some 50 per cent. over the period. The Department does not collect information on the number of books and periodicals purchased by educational establishments—the measure most clearly affected by price changes. Actual expenditure is subject to a large number of factors. The Government believe that the purchase of books is an area to which priority should be given, within the resources available, in all sectors of education.

16-plus Examination

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how his curricular objectives of breadth and balance may be encouraged through the new single system of 16-plus examinations; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I are issuing today a consultation paper setting out our proposals for distinction and merit certificates within the general certificate of secondary education examination. Our objective is to encourage the abler pupils, in particular, to pursue broad and balanced examination courses in the fourth and fifth years of secondary education. Copies of the consultative paper have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. Comments are invited by the end of April 1985.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the level of parental contributions to the fees of pupils in the assisted places scheme in 1985-86.

Sir Keith Joseph: Subject to the usual consultations and to parliamentary approval, the parental contribution scales will be adjusted upwards for the school year 1985-86 in line with earnings, as follows:

Part of relevant income to which specified percentage applies	One assisted pupil per cent.	Each of two assisted pupils per cent.	Each of three assisted pupils per cent.
That part which exceeds £6,210 but does not exceed £6,750	9	6·75	5·25
That part (if any) which exceeds £6,750 but does not exceed £7,300	12	9	7
That part (if any) which exceeds £7,300 but does not exceed £8,400	15	11·25	8·75
That part (if any) which exceeds £8,400 but does not exceed £10,080	21	15·75	12·25
That part (if any) whicl. exceeds £10,080 but does not exceed £12,280	24	18	14
That part (if any) which exceeds £12,280	33	24·75	19·25

Higher Education

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is able to announce his decisions on local authority higher education provisions in 1985-86 and on the distribution of the advanced further education pool for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have today written to the chairman of the committee of the National Advisory Body (NAB) accepting in its entirety its advice on the planned disposition of academic provision and of students in local authority higher education (LAHE) in 1985-86, and on the basis for distributing the advanced further education (AFE) quantum of £620 million for the financial year 1985-86 which I announced in the House on 12 November at column 57.

These plans provide for a further 3 per cent. growth overall in student numbers in LAHE compared with the targets set for 1984-85 and for maintenance of the thrust of the policies embodied in those targets; most notably, the preservation of student access and a continued shift in the balance of provision towards science, engineering and other vocational disciplines, and towards sub-degree and part-time provision.

As I announced on 12 November, the AFE quantum for 1985-86 is over 7·5 per cent. higher than that for 1984-85, when allowance is made for the abolition of the national insurance surcharge. Provided that costs can be contained, the increased quantum should permit broadly the same resources per student in LAHE to be made available in 1985-86 as planned in 1984-85. But, compared with the latest actual levels of expenditure, this still entails continuing reductions in unit costs and in lecturer numbers, and attainment of the 12:1 average student-staff ratio adopted by the NAB as a target for local authority higher education.

The greater part of the £620 million total is being allocated to local education authorities in relation to target student numbers for 1985-86 by institution, mode of attendance and subject. The allocations are being made in such a way as to continue the pressure of high spending institutions to reduce their costs and to afford increased protection to the more economical institutions. The allocations announced today also include, for a few selected institutions, sums to a total value of £280,000 in support of a biotechnology initiative. A sum of £2·5 million has been set aside for selective support of research in a number of major institutions. I shall announce my decision on the distribution of that sum in the light of further advice from the NAB early in the new year.

Letters are today being sent to local education authorities and institutions notifying them of my decisions. Copies of my letter to the NAB committee chairman, of a note explaining the method by which the AFE quantum for 1985-86 is being distributed, and full details of the allocations—excluding the selective research element—have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Generic Prescribing

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the cheapest drug tariff, part V A and V D, price for each of the following drugs and for the most expensive branded form of the drug currently available to National Health Service practitioners: Amitriptyline, Ampicillin, Diazepam, Frusemide, Imipramine, Indomethacin, Methyldopa, Nitrazepam, Propanolol and Temazepam; and if he will estimate the total annual difference in cost to the National Health Service if all prescriptions for the above drugs were dispensed in generic forms rather than branded forms.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The following comparisons are given of the most commonly prescribed strength and pack sizes at current prices.

Strength mg	Pack Size	Drug	Drug Tariff Price (£)	Branded Price (£)
25	500	Amitriptylin	3·84	10·28
250	100	Ampicillin	2·56	7·34
5	1,000	Diazepam	2·32	13·62
40	500	Frusemide	2·80	27·14
25	500	Imipramine	2·71	15·75
25	500	Indomethacin	5·66	24·85
250	1,000	Methyldopa	19·71	59·40
5	500	Nitrazepam	2·20	12·02
40	1,000	Propanolol	5·57	39·70
10	100	Temazepam	not listed	4·88

Drug tariff prices are those included in part VIII (formerly part V) categories A and S of the tariff.

If all prescriptions for these drugs had been dispensed in their generic form rather than branded form it is estimated that the difference in cost would have been £24·8 million (gross). This estimate relates to family practitioner services in England only in 1983, the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the aggregate annual savings which would be made if Mogadon, Valium, Lasix, Panadol and Aldomet were to be prescribed in their therapeutical equivalents by generic names.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: If all prescriptions for the drugs named had been dispensed in their generic rather than proprietary form it is estimated that the difference in cost would have been £16·7 million (gross). This estimate relates to family practitioner services in England only in 1983, the latest year for which figures are available.

Clinical Psychologists

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many clinical psychologists are employed within each regional health authority; and how those figures compare with the norms recommended by the Trethowan report in 1977.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Provisional numbers of clinical psychologists employed within each regional health authority as at 30 September 1983 are given in the table. In addition, a further 16·3 whole-time equivalents were on the staff at London postgraduate teaching hospitals, giving a total for England of 1306·6 whole-time equivalents.

The Trethowan report (1977) on the role of psychologists in the health services recommended that the number of clinical psychologists employed be increased to about 1,100 for England and Wales over a period of six to seven years, as a minimum target for the shorter term. This minimum target has been exceeded.

NHS Clinical Psychologists as at 30 September 1983 (Provisional Figures)

Doctors (Training)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many doctors are currently training in the National Health Service and what were the figures for 1960, 1970, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983, respectively.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: All doctors below consultant grade in the main hospital grades are undergoing further and often highly specialised training prior to obtaining full clinical autonomy although, they are all qualified doctors and some are senior and experienced. On that basis there were 24,255 qualified doctors in NHS training grades in England, including locums and university staff in honorary NHS contracts at 30 September 1983. More recent information is not yet available. Exactly comparable figures for earlier years are not available, but the table gives the numbers in the training grades of the hospital service, in community medicine and in the general medical services (excluding locums in each case) for the years 1963, 1970, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

‡ Trainees in post at 1 October each year.

Debendox

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what investigations the Committee on Safety of Medicines has made into the possible teratogenic effects of the drug Debendox; and what its findings were.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The committee considered the safety of Debendox on eight occassions, the last being in March 1983. On each occasion the committee's advice was that there was no acceptable scientific evidence that Debendox caused harm to the foetus.

Doctors (Retirement)

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the retirement age for general practitioners.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) on 17 May, at column 258.

Wellfield Site, Hatfield

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations his Department will be making regarding the planned development of the Wellfield site in Hatfield for the expansion of geriatric and other patient care by the health authority to the forthcoming inquiry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I understand the chairman of the East Hertfordshire health authority will be presenting the health authority's case for the proposals at the forthcoming inquiry on behalf of my right hon. Friend. I am not aware that the chairman has requested any representative of the Department to attend or submit formal evidence.

Death Grant

Mr Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many men born before 5 July 1883, and how many women born before 5th July 1888, are ineligible for the full death grant;

(2) what was the total number of deaths in Great Britain in each of the last 10 years; and whether he will estimate for each of those years the number of cases where no payment or payment at a reduced rate of the death grant was made;

(3) whether he will publish in the Official Report the present rates of the death grant for an adult, on full benefit, for a child aged under three years, for a child between three to five years and for a child aged between six and 17 years;

(4) what rate of grant is payable for the death of people who were within 10 years of pension age in July 1948 and born between 5 July 1883 and 4 July 1893 in the case of a man and between 5 July 1888 and 4 July 1898 in the case of a woman.

Mr. Whitney: The present rates of the national insurance death grant are as follows:

Child under 3	9·00
Child 3-5	15·00
Child 6-17	22·50
Adult 17 and over	30·00
Man born 5 July 1883-4 July 1893 or woman born 5 July 1888-4 July 1898	15·00
Stillborn child or man born before 5 July 1893 or woman born before 5 July 1888	No grant

Information on deaths in the past 10 years is as follows:

Year	1 Total no. of deaths	2 Grants paid at full rate	3 Grants paid at reduced rate	4 Deaths, where no grant was paid
1974	650	381	163	106
1975	646	408	153	85
1976	664	419	146	99
1977	638	435	132	71
1978	651	458	125	68
1979	659	474	119	66
1980	645	482	111	52
1981	642	*487	*104	51
1982	647	505	92	50
1983	643	514	86	43

Notes:

1. All figures are in 1000s.
2. Figures annotated * are estimates only owing to industrial action.
3. Column 4 includes cases where no claim was made.

In June 1983 in England and Wales there were an estimated 1,500 men born before 5 July 1883 and 28,500 women born before 5 July 1888. (Figures for Scotland are not available in this form).

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) on how many occasions, in what years and by what amount the death grant has been increased since it was first introduced;

(2) by what amount the purchasing power of the death grant has decreased since 1967;

(3) by what amount the existing death grant would need to be increased to restore it to the 1967 value of the grant;

(4) by what amount the existing death grant would need to be increased to restore it to its 1949 value.

Mr. Whitney: The standard rate of the death grant was introduced at £20 in 1949. It was increased to £25 in 1958 and to the present rate of £30 in 1967.

The grant would need to be raised to £175 to restore its 1967 value or £225 to restore the 1949 value. The purchasing power of the grant has declined by 82·7 per cent. since 1967.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Service (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report the names of the organisations which made representations to his Department in response to the consultative document "The Death Grant", of March 1982;

(2) whether he will publish in full in the Official Report the foreword by the Minister for Social Security to the consultative document "The Death Grant".

Mr. Whitney: A copy of "The Death Grant, A Consultative Document" containing the foreword published in March 1982 is available in the Library. The names of the organisations who made representations to the Department in response to the consultative document on the death grant are as follows. Where a national organisation or trades union is listed, local or regional branches may also have made submissions. Representations were also received from a number of health authorities, local authorities, councils of social service, councils of voluntary service, welfare committees, war pensions committees, funeral directors, community health councils, constituency parties, academics and private individuals:

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will estimate, for the latest year for which figures are available, the total expenditure on the death grant; whether he will estimate the cost represented by administration; and whether he will estimate comparable figures for the costs of supplementary benefits.

Mr. Whitney: In 1983-84, the latest date for which figures are available, the estimated cost of the death grant was £29·2 million, including administrative costs of approximately £12·5 million. For the amount of supplementary benefit paid in respect of funeral expenses I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him on 17 December, at column 47. The administrative cost of making such payments in 1982 was somewhat over £100,000.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether the foreword by the Minister for Social Security to the consultative document, "The Death Grant", still represents Government policy; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether he is satisfied with the workings of the Social Security Act 1975, section 32, schedule 3, paragraph 7 and Schedule 4, part II; and whether he will make a statement;

(3) whether he will bring forward proposals for the payment of a death grant to those parents on supplementary benefit who have suffered the loss of a stillborn baby; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The existing provisions operate satisfactorily in that there is a take up of death grant of more than 90 per cent., although it is recognised that this no longer represents a significant contribution towards funeral costs. The purpose of the consultative document issued in 1982 was to determine whether there was a consensus in favour of a scheme which directed the available resources towards those most in need of assistance. None of the proposals in the document received popular approval and the future of the death grant, including the categories to be covered, is now being considered in the context of the formulation of wider Government proposals for the future of social security.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how his Department monitors claims for attendance allowance when the recipient moves from private accommodation to a local authority supported private home.

Mr. Newton: Notes in payment order books require a claimant to notify the Department of any change in circumstances which may affect his entitlement to attendance allowance. Entry into residential accommodation which is provided by or with the help of a public or local authority is one such change which is specified to be reported.

National Insurance Contributions

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what total contributions were made to the national insurance system in money terms by a male and a female employee retiring at the most convenient recent date, after a career in full employment at the national average wage; and what the total figures would have been if each year's contributions had been upvalued at compound interest of 2½ per cent. per annum and at the rate of increase of the retail price index.

Mr. Whitney: From 1948, when the national insurance system started, to April 1984, the total figures are as follows:

	Males £	Females £
Total actual NI contributions	4,728·36	3,178·76
Total actual NI contributions compounded each year by 2·5 per cent.	5,490·59	3,748·43
Total actual NI contributions uprated by the RPI	9,803·21	7,087·10

NOTES:

1. National insurance contributions are at the non-contracted out rate.
2. Graduated retirement benefit contributions are not included because the average earnings, whole economy, are not available for the period graduated contributions were payable.
3. Earnings related national insurance contributions were introduced in April 1975. From that date to April 1983 average earnings estimates are in respect of full-time adult workers—males aged 21 and over; females aged 18 and over—and have been derived by using the index of average earnings (whole economy-seasonally adjusted). From April 1983 the average earnings estimates are in respect of all adult workers.
4. Yearly contributions have been assessed by using the derived earnings obtained for the October of each year on the assumption that average weekly earnings for that month represent the average for the whole of the tax-year.
5. The retail price index revaluation is based on the movements in the retail price index every year from October 1948 until October 1983.

Population Statistics

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the official figure of females over 60 years of age and males over 65 years of age in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Patten: The estimates for 30 June 1983 are:

	Number
Females aged 60 and over	6,793,600
Males aged 65 and over	3,300,000

Housing Benefit

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take to ensure that local authorities which are eligible to operate a high rent scheme under the system of housing benefit but have not yet applied for authorisation are encouraged to apply.

Mr. Newton: The conditions for authorisation of high rent schemes have been brought to the attention of all local authorities. Whether to apply is entirely a matter for local decision.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to introduce the amendments to the housing benefit regulations referred to in his reply to the hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale) on 16 November, Official Report, column 381.

Mr. Newton: The Housing Benefit Amendment (No. 4) Regulations were laid before the House today. The regulations close the unintended loophole in the housing benefit regulations which allowed a grown-up son or daughter living at home to receive a rent allowance for the rent element of any board and lodging payment made to his or her parents. They also introduce measures to prevent abuse of the scheme by the creation of joint tenancies and correct a defect in the regulations which prevented former licencees from receiving help with payments they have to make if they continue to occupy their accommodation after the licence to occupy has been terminated.

Limited List Prescribing

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to announce a final decision about the number and scope of the limited list of pharmaceutics announced in the debate on the Queen's Speech.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take to ensure that National Health Service patients affected by his proposals to limit the drugs prescribable for them are adequately informed of the changes before 1 April 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We will draw up and announce the lists of the drugs which will, and will not, be prescribable under the National Health Service as soon as possible after the consultation period ends on 31 January 1985.

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, when he considers his proposal to limit the range of drugs which may be prescribed under the National Health Service, he will take account of allergies exhibited by some patients to certain generic prescriptions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The consultations which we are undertaking with the medical profession and other interested parties are designed to ensure that, within the categories of drugs to be included in the limited list, prescribers will be able to choose from an adequate range of alternative generic drugs to meet their patients' needs.

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further representations he has received from pharmaceutical companies resultant upon his statement of 8 November; and what has been the tenor of his replies.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have so far arranged two meetings with representatives of the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry. In addition, our officials have had discussions with several companies affected by the proposals.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, on the basis of his current draft of the drugs to be included on the limited list, he will estimate company by company and in total the effect on each of the pharmaceutical companies whose relevant products are currently planned to be excluded; if he will publish the estimates in the Official Report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. We do not have sufficient data to make accurate estimates of this kind.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a comparison of the prices of those products which he is currently considering placing on the limited list of medications which may be prescribed by doctors for patients under the National Health Service with the cost of their most widely-prescribed brand-name equivalents.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 10 December 1984, c. 383]: In 1983 the average net ingredient cost per prescription for branded products in the therapeutic categories covered by our proposals was three-and-a-half times that of prescriptions for the generic alternatives set out in the provisional list we published on 8 November. We cannot list those drugs which will remain available on NHS prescription after 1 April 1985, nor those which will not, until after the completion of our consultation with the professions and the industry.

Geriatric Beds

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many National Health Service beds for geriatrics are occupied; and what percentage this represents of the average daily occupied beds.

Mr. John Patten: The average daily number of occupied beds in the specialty of geriatric medicine in 1983 was 50,797. This represents 18 per cent. of all occupied beds in NHS hospitals in England. As I explained to my hon. Friend in my reply on 4 December at column 174, aggregated bed occupancy is not a good indicator of efficient bed use.

Psychiatric Hospitals (Beds)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patient beds are unoccupied in psychiatric hospitals and units due to shortage of nursing staff; how many wards have had to be closed for this reason in each of the last two years; how many nurses would have to be recruited and trained to correct current understaffing; if, in addition to total figures, he will give the figures for each region separately; and what action he is taking.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not held centrally.

The right hon. Member's suggestion concerning current understaffing should, however, be seen against the information in paragraph 4.52 of "The Health Service in England", which was published this year, which, among other things, showed that over five years the number of nursing staff in mental illness per 100,000 population has improved by about 22 per cent.

Blindness Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further representations his Department has received in the last year in support of a blindness allowance; and if there is any action he will be taking now or in the foreseeable future.

Mr. Newton: We have received over 200 representations in the last year, mainly from right hon. and hon. Members, referring to the recent campaign for a blindness allowance organised by the Royal National Institute for the Blind, the National Federation of the Blind and the National League of the Blind and Disabled. As regards meetings with deputations, I refer the right hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) on 29 November at column 575.

On the question of the introduction of a blindness allowance, I refer the right hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) on 22 October at column 514.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations his Department has received to extend eligibility for mobility allowance to blind people in the past year.

Mr. Newton: In the past year we have received nine representations, mainly from right hon. and hon. Members, on behalf of blind people and a further twenty-nine representations on behalf of people who are deaf and blind.

I also met during the year with representatives of the Deaf-Blind Helpers' League and the North Regional Association for the Blind.

Prescriptions

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what has been the total number of prescriptions issued under the National Health Service in each of the last 10 years;

(2) what has been the total cost to the National Health Service of prescriptions in each of the last 10 years; and what his figure is as a percentage of the total National Health Service expenditure in each of those years;

(3) what has been the total revenue from prescription charges in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available; and what this figure is as a percentage of total National Health Service expenditure in each of those years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is set out in the table:

Financial year	Number of NHS prescriptions dispensed (millions)*	Gross cost of prescriptions† (£ million)	Cost as proportion of total NHS expenditure Percentage	Income from FPS prescription charges (£ million)	Income as proportion of total NHS expenditure Percentage
1974-75	288·8	296·7	8·6	23·1	0·7
1975-76	304·3	380·7	8·4	22·7	0·5
1976-77	305·2	477·5	9·3	23·1	0·4

1983-84	339·1	‡1,430·6	11·1	‡110·0	0·9

* All figures relate to prescriptions, including hospital prescriptions, dispensed in England by community pharmacists, drug stores and appliance contractors, prescriptions dispensed by dispensing doctors (excluding those dispensed under capitation fee arrangements) and items personally administered by prescribing doctors.

† Includes the cost of fees and allowances paid for dispensing.

‡ Provisional.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report all those dates on which the National Health Service prescription charge has been raised; and what was the new value of the charge on each of those dates.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Since its introduction in 1952, the charge paid on drugs dispensed by community pharmacists against NHS prescription has changed as follows:

Date	—
1 June 1952	—	1/- (5p) per form
1 December 1956	—	1/-(5p) per item
1 March 1961	—	2/- (10p) per item
1 February 1965	—	prescription charges abolished
10 June 1968	—	prescription charge reintroduced at 2/6d (12½p) per item

Date	—
1 April 1971	—	20p per item
16 July 1979	—	45p per item
1 April 1980	—	70p per item
1 December 1980	—	£1·00 per item
1 April 1982	—	£1·30 per item
1 April 1983	—	£1·40 per item
1 April 1984	—	£1·60 per item

Ionising Radiation

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council's interim report on diseases induced by ionising radiation is to be published; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The council's interim report is being published today. It describes its investigation to date and explains that there is insufficient evidence at present to enable it to make any recommendations. The council proposes to look at this matter again when results from studies currently in progress are available.

NHS (Charges)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the gross income to the National health Service from charges made for pathology and radiology work, respectively, carried out for private patients of consultants; what is the net income from each; and what is the current scale of charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 11 December 1984, c. 475.]: We do not collect this detailed information centrally.

The current scale of charges for private non-resident patients is set out in appendix C of HC (84) 6 and supplementary guidance on radiological unit values for various procedures is contained in appendix C of HN (79) 28. Copies of both documents are available in the Library.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 19 December 1984

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Security Forces, Northern Ireland

Miss Maynard asked the Attorney-General if he will make it his policy to require, in cases of major public concern involving the security forces in Northern Ireland, that when a case is considered by the Director of Public Prosecutions and a decision is made not to bring a prosecution, the Director of Public Prosecutions should state the reasons for his decision.

The Attorney-General: No. When a decision is reached not to bring a prosecution against an individual it is a long-established and well-founded practice in Northern Ireland, as in England and Wales, not to give detailed reasons. Cases involving members of the security forces cannot be treated differently from other cases.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Surveillance Equipment

Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet completed the review of the use of equipment in police surveillance operations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: The review has recently been completed, and I have today placed a copy of the revised guidelines in the Library of the House. The new guidelines contain more detailed and rigorous procedures than those in the previous guidance which was issued in 1977 and placed in the Library of the House in February 1982. The main changes are as follows:

(1) The criteria for the authorisation of the use of listening devices, and of certain types of visual surveillance, are considerably tightened. In general such devices are henceforth to be used only when an investigation concerns serious crime; normal methods of investigation have been tried and failed or must, from the nature of things, be unlikely to succeed if tried; and there is good reason to think that the use of the equipment would be likely to lead to an arrest and a conviction, or to the prevention of acts of terrorism;

(2) Authorisation levels and procedures are laid down for both aural and visual surveillance. The range of circumstances is extended in which the Chief Constable's personal authority is required for the use of surveillance devices;

(3) More detailed records are to be kept of the occasions on which both aural and visual surveillance equipment is authorised, issued and used. These records are to be made available for inspection by Her Majesty's inspectors of constabulary;

(4) Guidance is given on the retention of the product of surveillance; its use in court proceedings and outside the police service; and its destruction when no longer needed;

(5) The new guidelines explicitly rule out the use of surveillance devices in circumstances (such as in a public telephone box) where the sole purpose or only foreseeable result of their use is to overhear speech transmitted by telephone.

The guidance issued in 1977 recommended that records should be kept of the use of aural surveillance devices, and the new guidelines will require records to be kept for both aural and visual devices. Whilst these records will be made available for inspection by Her Majesty's inspectors of constabulary it is not intended to record this information centrally on a continuing basis, since the use of surveillance devices is, subject to the advice given in the guidelines, an operational matter for individual chief officers.

I am satisfied from the inquiries I have made in the course of this review that the scale of use of surveillance devices, particularly in circumstances where most sensitive questions of privacy arise, is not excessive. The guidelines make clear that a range of surveillance devices is used for a wide variety of purposes, and all forces make use of surveillance devices to a greater or lesser extent. In view of this wide range of devices and circumstances, statistical information would be meaningful only if it were broken down to indicate different types of device and operation, but it would not be in the interests of the prevention and detection of crime for information to be made public in this degree of detail.

I am confident that the revised and tightened guidelines, coupled with the attention that will continue to be given to these matters by Her Majesty's inspectors of constabulary, will ensure that surveillance devices of all kinds are used only where strictly necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of police operations, and with due regard for the intrusion of privacy that may result in particular circumstances.

Yasser Arafat

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received any inquiries since 29 November, whether oral or written, that Yasser Arafat should be granted a visa to enter the United Kingdom in the near future, notwithstanding the abandonment of his recent proposed visit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: We have received no such inquiries.

Detained Persons

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were held in custody in metropolitan police stations for the latest available date; and, of those, how many were subsequently (i) charged and (ii) released without charge.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This information is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will supply in relation to section 62 of the Criminal Law Act 1977 for the Metropolitan police district (i) the total number of notices to prisoners handed to people in custody in metropolitan police stations for the latest available period and (ii) a breakdown of the total by (a) notification of arrest given to person named, (b) notification of arrest not requested and (c) notification of arrest delayed.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information available centrally relates to the total number of people arrested and the number of cases in which there was a delay in excess of four hours, or of 24 hours, before action was taken to notify a person nominated under section 62 of the Criminal Law Act 1977. Statistics for 1983 by police force area were published in Home Office "Statistical Bulletin", issue 9/84 on 19 April 1984, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide for the latest available date (i) a breakdown of the number of police officers in the Metropolitan police by division and rank, (ii) a breakdown of the number of civilian personnel in the Metropolitan police by division and type of work, (iii) a breakdown of the number of police officers currently working at district level by district and rank, (iv) a breakdown of the number of police officers currently working at area level by area and rank and (v) a breakdown of the number of police officers currently working at headquarters level by branch and rank.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide in relation to the proposed reorganisation of the Metropolitan police (i) a breakdown of the number of police officers working at headquarters level by department and rank after initial reorganisation in January 1985 and (ii) an indication of the proportion of Metropolitan police officers to be employed at headquarters level, area level and divisional level after the reorganisation is complete.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Initial reorganisation will involve changes in lines of command but no redeployment of officers within headquarters or from headquarters to areas or divisions. There will thereafter be a progressive redeployment from headquarters to areas and divisions over a period of at least two years. The details of this reorganisation will be subject to consultation and it is not possible to give figures at this stage.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue a statement in the light of the proposed reorganisation of the Metropolitan police and of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act consultation procedures, advising London local authorities as to whom in the Metropolitan police they should consult within each borough during and after reorganisation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Under section 106 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act it will be the Commissioner's duty to make consultative arrangements in the metropolis. In doing so he will be required to consult London borough and district councils as to the particular arrangements that would be appropriate for each borough or district, or part of a district which falls within the Metropolitan police district. The Commissioner will consult the councils in the light of the progress that has been made with the force reorganisation at the time, and of the need to avoid unnecessary disruption to existing consultative groups which conform to the guidance which my right hon. and learned Friend will be issuing to him under the Act. In the meantime, councils should continue to liaise with district commanders.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the average overtime payment made to individual officers of the Metropolitan police by rank for each tour of duty worked on mutual aid during the miners' dispute;

(2) what was the total amount of overtime payments paid to officers of the Metropolitan police on mutual aid duties during the miners' dispute, by month.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This information is not readily available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Attacks on Women (Statistics)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of attacks on women in the Metropolitan police area for each year since 1979 and for each month to date in 1984 by category of (a) rape, (b) indecent assault by age group and (c) incest; and what is the number of successful prosecutions.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the latest available annual information is published in appendix 4ii of his annual report for 1983 (Cmnd. 9268). The number of notifiable offences recorded by the police in the first nine months of 1984 is given in the following table. I shall write as soon as possible about the number of prosecutions.

Notifiable offences recorded by the police
Metropolitan police district

1984	Rape	Indecent assault on a female	*Incest
January	22	109	5
February	29	148	3
March	17	118	4
April	27	126	—
May	25	160	1
June	32	143	4
July	42	165	2
August	37	173	2
September	37	149	5

* These figures may include some offences where the victim was male.

Animal Experimentation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will detail the sources of supply of non-purpose bred cats and dogs to laboratories registered under the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: I do not have the information requested. There are currently no statutory controls over the sources of supply of cats and dogs to laboratories except for the prohibition in the Dogs Act 1906 on the disposal of stray dogs in this way by the police.

Guernsey

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding the extension to Guernsey of the Exchange Control Act 1947; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: As yet my right hon. and learned Friend has received no such representations.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Open University

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action is in hand to review the financial position of the Open University; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The Government's grant to the Open University is reviewed annually. My right hon. Friend will consider the position in the light of the recent public expenditure survey and the report of the visiting committee, which he expects to receive shortly.

Vandalism

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many cases of vandalism and theft have occurred in west midlands schools during the last five years; what has been the total cost to the ratepayers resulting therefrom in each single year during the same period; and what additional resources he is prepared to allocate to local education authorities for the purpose of installing adequate alarm systems in secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: Information about the incidence and cost of vandalism and theft in schools is not collected centrally. The Department last year issued a broadsheet entitled "Vandalism in schools and colleges: some possible ways of reducing damage" which recognised that the problems of vandalism are best tackled locally in the light of needs and circumstances. It is for individual local education authorities to meet the cost of any preventive measures they take within the resources available to them.

Private Contractors

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many private cleaning firms have had their contracts with local education authorities cancelled resulting from lack of provision of satisfactory cleaning standards in primary and secondary schools; and what steps he intends to take to monitor standards of such work performed by private contractors.

Mr. Dunn: Detailed information is not collected centrally. It is the responsibility of a local education authority to monitor any work undertaken for it by private contractors.

Youth Provision (Finance)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what level of finance he has assessed that local education authorities should spend on youth provision in 1985 as part of their grant-related expenditure assessment figure; and if he is satisfied that local education authorities will possess adequate resources to devote funding sufficient for youth provision.

Mr. Brooke: The figure for aggregate local authority expenditure on the youth service underlying the 1985-86 RSG settlement is £104 million. This compares with a figure of £92 million underlying the 1984-85 settlement. This level of provision should allow authorities to continue to support the particular role of the youth service in overall provision for young people. It is, however, for individual authorities to decide on their expenditure priorities within the overall level of resources available.

Students (Financial Support)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if the forthcoming review of financial support for students will cover postgraduate and mature students; and if it will invite evidence from individuals with views on the matter.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) on 10 December, at column 333.

Non-human Primates

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many non-human primates were used for whatever reason during the last period of 12 months for which figures are available in places of further or higher education; and what was the comparable figure for each of the last five years.

Mr. Brooke: This information is not collected by the Department. Limited information is, however, available from statistics maintained by the Home Office in the exercise of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department's responsibilities under the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876. I suggest my hon. Friend gets in touch with the Home Office direct about that information.

ENERGY

Coal Industry

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the net saving to the taxpayer of phasing out uneconomic coal pits.

Mr. David Hunt: It is a matter for the National Coal Board to decide which pits are uneconomic, but in the financial year 1983-84 the 10 per cent. of capacity which was most uneconomic lost over £350 million.

Mr. Concannon asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will place in the Library a copy of the report by the auditors of the National Coal Board, submitted to him by the board, into increases in provision for surface damage arising from subsidence in the north Nottinghamshire coalfield.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand that the National Coal Board, in making copies of this report available to the Select Committee on Energy, has requested that it be treated in confidence.

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Energy what sums of public money have been invested in the coalmining industry in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. David Hunt: Investment expenditure by the National Coal Board in each of the last 10 years has been as follows:

	£ million
1974-75	145
1975-76	217
1976-77	279

	£ million
1977-78	350
1978-79	481
1979-80	661
1980-81	807
1981-82	812
1982-83	842
1983-84	702

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total of all grants paid to the coal industry, expressed as a figure per employee in the industry, in (a) 1980-81, (b) 1981-82, (c) 1982-83 and (d) 1983-84; and what is the estimated equivalent for (e) 1984-85 and (f) 1985-86.

Mr. David Hunt: Subsidy—defined as grants plus expenditure on the redundant mineworkers payments scheme—per employee in the coal industry was £922 in 1980-81, £2,242 in 1981-82, £2,257 in 1982-83 and £5,412 in 1983-84. Figures for 1984-85 and 1985-86 are not available.

Coalfields (Ministerial Visits)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many times since March 1984 he and other Energy Ministers have visited coalfields in the United Kingdom.

Mr. David Hunt: In October I visited two National Coal Board area headquarters and the National Coal Board's mining and research establishment at Bretby. There have been no other visits to coalfields by Energy Ministers since March.

Combined Heat and Power Scheme (Belfast)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Energy when a decision will be made on the application by Belfast to be accepted as one of the three United Kingdom cities to qualify for grant aid towards the provision of a combined heat and power scheme.

Mr. David Hunt: The 10 proposals received, including two for London, covering all the nine towns recommended for further study by the Atkins report, are being evaluated by my Department. A statement will be made in due course.

Gas Industry

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Energy what sums of public money have been invested in the gas industry in Great Britain in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: BGC's annual accounts show that, over the last decade, new capital investment has been as follows:

	New Capital Investment £ million
1974-75	239
1975-76	347
1976-77	244
1977-78	201
1978-79	235
1979-80	343
1980-81	514
1981-82	515
1982-83	801
1983-84	1,096

Oil Exploration and Development

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will now institute a review of the methods under which oil exploration and development licences are granted, with a view to considering methods by which the owners of property under which oil and gas is found can share in the returns.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I do not propose to review onshore licensing. Property in petroleum is vested in the Crown by virtue of section 1 of the Petroleum (Production) Act 1934. Licences granted under the powers conferred by the Act do not carry any rights to access to property, and individual owners are free to negotiate appropriate terms for access and use of land.

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what studies he has made of onshore oil and gas drillings and development procedures in the United States of America, and of the incentives and returns available to the owners of the land under which oil or gas is found; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Title to property in petroleum in the United States of America is different from the United Kingdom where that title rests in the Crown. Owners of land are free to negotiate appropriate terms for access or other use of land.

Electricity Industry

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the financial objectives of the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: In agreement with the Electricity Council, I have set a new financial target for the electricity supply industry in England and Wales which will involve an average return on net assets over the three years 1985-86 to 1987-88 of 2·75 per cent. I have also set the electricity supply industry a performance aim of reducing controllable unit costs by the end of 1987-88 by 6·1 per cent. as compared with 1983-84.

Nuclear Repositories

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he proposed to announce the criteria for the establishment of nuclear repositories in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have been asked to reply.

I assume my hon. Friend has in mind the final version of the assessment principles which will be used by the authorising Departments for evaluating proposals for nuclear waste disposal facilities on land. These will be published shortly after Parliament returns.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Divisions

Mr. Best asked the Lord Privy Seal approximately how many hours during the last parliamentary Session were spent on Divisions of the House.

Mr. Biffen: There were 482 Divisions in Session 1983-84. No record of the exact timings of the length of Divisions is kept. On the assumption that each Division lasted 11½ minutes—the average time established from a sample of 36 Divisions in last Session—the House spent 92 hours 23 minutes on Divisions during the Session.

THE ARTS

Arts Council

Mr. Arnold asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts, in the light of the decision of the House on the Vote on Account for 1985-86, what is the total forward financial commitment made to date by the Arts Council in respect of the financial year 1985-86 (i) that has been discussed with arts bodies (ii) that is a firm contractual commitment and (iii) that is in any respect provisional; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: All discussions so far have been provisional and without commitment.

WALES

Tourism

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will collect and publish accurate statistics on an annual basis, showing the number of people employed in the tourism industry in Wales.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: In view of the impracticability of identifying those people whose employment depends solely upon tourism detailed information could not be produced on the basis requested. However, the triennial census of employment gives details of employment in catering and other tourist-oriented trades as well as figures for many other industries which serve tourists as well as local customers. While a research study on behalf of the Wales tourist board published in 1977 provides a basis for the board's current estimate that at least 90,000 are employed either directly or indirectly in tourism in Wales.

Population Projections

Mr. Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if his Department liaises with area health authorities when producing population projections for the counties of Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No, but the Welsh Office discusses the migration assumptions used in such projections with the planning officers of the county councils. Summaries of the projections, with the offer of greater detail, are sent to health authorities.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales on how many occasions in the years 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84 each of the Forestry Commission's regional advisory committees in Wales examined applications for grant or felling licences to which objections have been received; and in how many cases in each year in each conservancy the commissioners sought his views, following the regional advisory committee's failure to reconcile the views of the parties concerned.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: No applications for grant or felling licences were considered by Regional Advisory Committees in Wales in 1981-82 or in 1982-83. In 1983-84 two grant applications and one felling licence application were considered.

No case was referred to my right hon. Friend during the three years in question.

EMPLOYMENT

Skillcentres

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many people are currently waiting for a place on a skillcentre course in Mersey and the north-west; and what is the average time involved in each case;

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the current waiting time for a place on each separate course run at each skillcentre in Merseyside and in the north-west.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The following tables list the average waiting times and the number of people on the waiting list for each course in the four Merseyside skillcentres, and in the eight other skillcentres in the north-west region.

Note:

Merseyside, Liverpool (Kirkdale)

The Merseyside Advisory Training Unit in Kirkdale serves both adults and young people. It provides specialist assessment packages to assist jobseekers to prepare for work or for further training, and provides employers with suitable recruits at below full skills level.

A number of short courses are run and waiting times vary from 1 week to 2 months. The role of the centre would change significantly if Liverpool skillcentre were closed.

There are 60 on the waiting list at the moment.

Code Key: Z = Recruitment closed indefinitely
* = Course closed

Recruitment is temporarily suspended when the waiting list equals the numbers on a course.

Recruitment is closed indefinitely if a class is to be closed or transferred to another skillcentre. In those cases where a waiting list exists for a class which is closing, arrangements will be made to absorb those waiting elsewhere.

Tobacco and Cigarettes

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will set out in the Official Report for each of the last 10 years a table showing the tobacco index, the all-items index and the percentage amount by which cigarette prices have been increased above the general rate of inflation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is as follows:

	Retail prices index (January 1974=100)			Differential increase in price of cigarettes†
	Tobacco* (a)	All items (b)	Cigarettes (c)
January
1974	100·0	100·0	100·0	—
1975	124·0	119·9	123·5	3·6
1976	162·6	147·9	161·8	7·7
1977	193·2	172·4	192·4	2·3
1978	222·8	189	222·2	5·6
1979	231·5	207·2	230·9	−5·4
1980	269·7	245·3	269·9	−1·5
1981	296·6	277·3	296·9	−3·0
1982	392·1	310·6	393·2	20·4
1983	426·2	325·9	426·7	3·6
1984	450·8	342·6	451·3	0·6
October
1984	504·0	357·7	486·3	3·3

* Includes other tobacco products in addition to cigarettes.

† Percentage amount by which the increase for cigarettes since previous January exceeds that for 'all items.'

The suggestion has been made from time to time that cigarettes should be excluded from the index, but a fundamental principle of its construction is that the coverage includes the whole range of goods and services on which households spend money. This principle has been followed since the inception of the index in 1947, and follows the recommendations of the Retail prices Index Advisory Committee. We accept that recommendation.

Enterprise Allowance

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons in (a) Northamptonshire and (b) Corby are in receipt of the enterprise allowance.

Mr. Alan Clark: The figures are not available in the form requested. However, in the Northampton area, which includes Corby, 306 people were receiving the enterprise allowance on 11 December 1984.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many youth training scheme places have (a) been filled and (b) remain vacant in Northamptonshire and in the Corby area at the latest convenient date.

Mr. Peter Morrison: At the end of November, 1,742 youth training scheme places were filled in the county of Northamptonshire, of which 192 were in the Corby local authority district.

There were about 920 unfilled places in Northamptonshire at the same date, of which 160 were in Corby.

Wages Councils

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a list of the present members of the wages councils and their occupations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Each wages council has up to three independent members, appointed by my right hon. Friend, and a number of representative members, appointed in most cases by employers' associations and trade unions nominated for that purpose by my right hon. Friend.

Most representative members are either actively engaged as employers or workers in the industry concerned, or employed by the relevant employers' associations or trade unions. The names and occupations of the independent members are as follows:

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Awards coming into effect on or after 1 May 1981, for the main negotiating grades for each specified council are as follows. No awards have yet been agreed for implementation at future dates.

Departmental Information Service

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those categories in which the information service of his Department no longer provides statistics; why this change was made; if he will reconsider it; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) on 6 December at columns 259-60.

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has any plans to change the rules of procedures upon which the industrial tribunals operate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Yes. Regulations containing revised rules of procedure will be laid before both Houses of Parliament early in 1985, to come into operation on 1 March 1985.

The principal change in the rules will be to allow industrial tribunals to issue some written decisions in summary form, thus saving tribunal time, accelerating tribunal procedures and reducing legalism. However, this revised procedure will not apply where one of the parties to a case requests a full decision and in certain types of case specified in the rules such as those involving sex or race discrimination. In those cases, full decisions will continue to be provided as now.

The opportunity will also be taken to make certain minor technical amendments to the rules that experience has shown to be desirable and to consolidate the rules on the procedure to be adopted in equal value cases.

TRANSPORT

Members' Correspondence

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report the text of the letter from his Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to selected Members of Parliament regarding the treatment of letters sent to him at the Department regarding the Government's policy on bus services.

Mr. Ridley: Following is the text of the letter:

"BUSES

Our proposals to introduce competition into local bus services will bring a major shift from the present, operator-orientated system, to one which puts the bus passenger and the customer first.

Not surprisingly many operators, their representative organisations and a number of councillors—particularly those with municipal bus undertakings—are agitating against our proposals. A substantial amount of ratepayers' money is now being spent on campaigns to discredit our plans, and there has already been a good deal of distortion. Some opponents, for example, have even stooped to frightening the elderly by saying that concessionary fares will end, and that rural dwellers will be cut off from their bus services.

In the light of this I thought that you might like to have a personal copy of the Department's leaflet which explains the new policy. You may already have had one for passing on to a constituent. Further copies are available from the Vote office.

You might also find the enclosed article useful in preparing speeches, press handouts or features for your local paper.

No doubt when your local press carry reports of any speech which you have made there will be opposing articles, or letters to the Editor, some of which you will want to reply to. If you need further information for that purpose, please let my know by writing to me at the Department of Transport. I will try to reply personally more quickly than I would normally be able to so that you can answer what has been written while it is still in readers' memories. If you need such an urgent reply, it would help if you could say so at the beginning of your letter.

I hope this will be helpful to you in winning the argument in your constituency."

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his practice in replying to letters from Members of Parliament on matters for which he is responsible; and what are his criteria for deciding priorities in replying to such letters.

Mr. Ridley: All letters sent to Ministers are dealt with as expeditiously as possible.

Transport Supplementary Grant

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total amount paid to metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council in transport supplementary grant in the current financial year for services and capital expenditure in categories which will not qualify for transport supplementary grant under the regulations which will apply in 1985-86 and subsequent years.

Mrs. Chalker: It is not possible to relate a particular amount of transport supplementary grant to particular categories of expenditure. This is because transport supplementary grant is a block grant and was paid in 1984-85 on the amount of accepted expenditure for each council which exceeded a threshold of £25·03 per head. The total amount of grant paid to the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council in 1984-85 was £247·72 million. The total of accepted expenditure was £902·8 million of which about £233 million relates to public transport in London, which is no longer the responsibility of the Greater London council, and £522 million relates to expenditure which would no longer be eligible for transport supplementary grant.

Road Communications (Birmingham—East Coast)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has made for improving road communications between Birmingham and the east coast ports.

Mrs. Chalker: The Government's trunk road programme contains a number of schemes for improving routes between Birmingham and the East Anglian ports. The most important is the proposed M1-A1 link road, into which a public inquiry is in progress, and which would complete a high-standard dual carriageway route from the M1-M6 junction to Ipswich. In addition, the western section of the Ipswich bypass is expected to open late in 1985; and a number of planned improvements to the A47 east of Leicester and the A11 north of Newmarket would cater for traffic to Great Yarmouth.

Buses (Deregulation)

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria can be used by local authorities to determine the scope for and scale of bus services which cannot be provided on a commercial basis if the policy outlined in the "Buses" White Paper is applied.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Government propose to give local authorities powers to subsidise any bus service which they believe socially necessary but which is not provided commercially. It will be for local authorities to decide within their overall financial constraints which services they wish to support.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give figures under the headings: killed, severely injured and all severities, of the number of people, aged between 16 and 21 years, male and female, involved in road accidents while driving motor cycles and cars, respectively, for the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mrs. Chalker: The information is as follows:

Male and female two-wheeled motor vehicles and car drivers aged 16 to 21: Casualties in 1983

	Two-wheeled motor vehicle driver			Car driver
	Male	Female	All	Male	Female	All
Fatal	437	14	451	188	34	222
Serious	9,541	1,037	10,578	2,551	699	3,250
Slight	20,708	3,128	23,836	8,497	3,629	12,126
All severities	30,686	4,179	34,865	11,236	4,362	15,598

Taxis and Minicabs (Accidents)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many taxi drivers and minicab drivers, and how many passengers in taxis and minicabs, have been killed and injured, respectively, in each of the last five years for which records are available.

Mrs. Chalker: In road accident and casualty reports, vehicle types are identified by their construction and not by their use at the time of the accident. Separate data of minicab driver and passenger casualties are therefore not available as private cars are generally used for this purpose.

The number of driver and passenger casualties reported to the police in vehicles constructed as taxis in the last three years was:

Driver and passenger casualties in taxis; 1981-83

	1981	1982	1983
Drivers
Fatal	2	3	5
Serious	63	67	64
Slight	372	375	423
Passengers
Fatal	5	6	1
Serious	99	109	117
Slight	813	854	947

I regret that data for further years could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Forum Hope (Lost Cargo)

Viscount Cranborne asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied that enough is being done to recover the lost drums containing dangerous chemicals that fell off the general cargo vessel Forum Hope during 24 and 25 October, many of which have been washed up on British shores, and to ensure that cargoes are properly secured in British and European waterways.

Mr. David Mitchell: It was not until 19 November that it was possible to establish that the loss of some dangerous cargo from the Forum Hope, whilst entering the Bay of Biscay in severe weather conditions, could positively be linked to dangerous goods arriving on the south coast. By this time many containers had already washed up although not all have yet been identified as Forum Hope cargo. In situations such as this it is not normal practice to attempt to find and recover lost packages at sea. Local authorities have been given advice on the identity of the contents and the source of the packages both to assist them in their responsibility for disposal and to enable them to attempt to recover their costs from the shipowners should they so wish.

The proper securing of cargoes on board ship is the responsibility of the master. In the United Kingdom this duty is covered by the Merchant Shipping (Load Lines) (Deck Cargo) Regulations 1968 which are enforced by my surveyors during spot-check inspections. However, the majority of ships in British and European waterways are of foreign flag and have loaded their cargoes in other than British ports. A review of cargo securing methods and equipment is presently under discussion at the International Maritime Organisation. It is expected that internationally agreed improved guidelines will be published in the coming year.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport, further to the statement in section 8.9 of the review in "Road Accidents Great Britain 1983", on what basis his Department is considering a reassessment of road accident costs for pain, grief and suffering.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department is considering whether recent studies which sought to establish what people are willing to pay to reduce their risks of injury or death provide a basis for costing accidents.

Vehicle Testing

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish figures for each year since 1979 relating to (i) the number of Ministry of Transport tests carried out on cars, (ii) the number of cars which failed the Ministry of Transport test, (iii) the number of cars which failed the Ministry of Transport test partly or wholly as a result of having illegal tyres and (iv) the number of persons prosecuted for being in possession of a car with illegal tyres.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall answer the question shortly.

GLC (Transport Surveys)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many times during the last year consultants working for his Department and research workers funded by his Department have used (a) information collected by the Greater London council in its 1971 and 1981 transport surveys; and (b) forecasts of travel by public and private modes produced by the Greater London Council transport studies section.

Mrs. Chalker: The Department does not keep, and I do not believe that we could justify keeping records in a form that would provide an answer to the hon. Member's question.

Car Test Centres

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated value of the capital assets of his Department's car test centres.

Mrs. Chalker: I regret that the information which my hon. Friend asks for is not available. The national network of L test centres has not previously been valued in this way. I am considering this matter at present.

Stay Low Campaign

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what discussions took place between his Department and representatives or agents of the drinks industry prior to the introduction of the Stay Low campaign on drinking and driving;

(2) what discussions took place between his Department and representatives of temperance organisations prior to the introduction of the Stay Low campaign on drinking and driving.

Mrs. Chalker: There were no such discussions.

Drink-Driving Campaigns

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what statistical or other evidence is available to his Department regarding the success or lack of success of previous campaigns designed to discourage drinking and driving during the festive season.

Mrs. Chalker: The Department has two main sources of information available to assess the effect of previous campaigns on this subject. Specially designed surveys have been conducted before and after each campaign to determine any changes in peoples' attitudes to drinking and driving and the risks involved, while casualty figures have also been analysed for any changes

An assessment of the campaigns' effect has been made in "Road Accidents Great Britain" each year since 1977. Copies are available in the Library.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions took place between his Department and the drink industry in 1983 and 1984 on the issue of the participation of that industry in campaigns designed to curb the consumption of alcohol by drivers; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: In 1983 my Department met the Brewers Society on a number of occasions to advise on the technical content of three road safety films to which the society was providing financial support. These films, developed by the road safety education unit at Reading university with the assistance of ROSPA, are designed to make young people more aware of the dangers involved in drinking and driving.

In May this year I attended the Brewers Society's press launch of these films where I expressed my hope that the drinks industry as a whole would continue to lend its support to efforts aimed at reducing the incidence of drinking and driving. I am glad to say that the society yesterday launched a nationwide campaign "Don't gamble with your licence", the theme of which is designed to support the Department's own campaign.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consultants have been appointed to consider London's road network in the period after the proposed abolition of the Greater London council.

Mrs. Chalker: I sent the hon. Member details of the consultants appointed to carry out assessments of the long-standing problems of four major traffic corridors in London at the time these studies were announced. I am unclear what other studies he has in mind.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to introduce legislation providing relief from capital gains tax on an exchange of interests in land in the joint beneficial ownership of two or more persons.

Mr. Moore: There have been representations over a long period that the tax charge in these circumstances can give rise to hardship. I have therefore authorised the Inland Revenue to introduce an extra-statutory concession which will enable the capital gains tax to be deferred until the disposal of the interest in land acquired as a result of the exchange. This will apply to exchanges which are made after today. The detailed terms of the concession are included in an Inland Revenue press release published today.

It may be possible in due course to legislate on this matter, but in the meantime this is an appropriate way of ensuring that relief is not denied to a very small group of taxpayers where the present law operates unfairly. Detailed information is not available to estimate the cost of this concession, but it is likely to be small.

Customs and Excise Staff (Weymouth Port)

Viscount Cranborne asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many persons on the staff of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in Weymouth port have particular responsibility for matters that might endanger public health, such as the smuggling of live animals from abroad; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: None. The total number of officers employed on customs work in Weymouth port is 35·5 including eight Customs/VAT staff employed seasonally. Their duties embrace all customs duties, including the enforcement of a number of import restrictions and prohibitions of which the prevention of smuggling of live animals from abroad is one. It is impossible to attribute specific numbers of staff to enforcement of these restrictions and prohibitions.

Viscount Cranborne asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has recently received from the Weymouth port health authority concerning the manning of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise service in Weymouth.

Mr. Hayhoe: None, although the Weymouth port health authority wrote in January 1980 and April 1984 to the local management of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise. On both occasions reassurance was given that the possibility of animals being illegally imported was a factor taken into account in fixing staffing levels and controls at Weymouth.

Viscount Cranborne asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will outline the staffing levels of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in Weymouth port in each of the last five years.

Mr. Hayhoe: The staffing levels on 31 March for the last five years were:

Year	Staff	Including Customs/VAT staff
1980	47	12
1981	47	12
1982	47	7
1983	35·5	8
1984	35·5	8

Because there are seasonal fluctuations in work, a number of the staff as shown work on customs duties in the summer and VAT in the winter.

Tax Yields

Mr. Proctor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total tax yield, specific ad valorem and value added tax, in terms of European currency units in each of the EEC countries per 1,000 cigarettes as at 1 October; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The nearest date to 1 October for which information is available is 11 November 1984. I understand the situation to be as follows:

Excise duty

(ECUs)

	Specific	Ad valorem*	VAT*	Total tax yield
Belgium	1·88	32·69	3·01	37·58
Denmark	66·68	30·16	25·13	121·97

* Calculated on the selling price of cigarettes in the most popular price category for each country.

Mr. Proctor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the tax yield to the Exchequer including value added tax, on the taxation of tobacco products in each financial year since 1979-80 in real terms; what is his estimate for 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is estimated that the yield from excise duties and value added tax on tobacco products, at 1983-84 prices, was as follows:

	£ million
1979-80	4,400
1980-81	4,300
1981-82	4,650
1982-83	4,400
1983-84	4,600

The estimate for excise duty on tobacco products for the year 1984-85 is £4,100 million. An estimate for value added tax is not available.

VAT

Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further representations he has received about the value added tax treatment of children's shoes.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 13 December to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King). A number of further letters have been received since then.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the yield of value added tax on advertising in books, periodicals and newspapers.

Mr. Hayhoe: Advertising in periodicals and newspapers is zero-rated. Advertising in books is taxable at the standard rate of 15 per cent.

If value added tax were to be applied at the standard rate to advertising in newspapers, journals and periodicals, it is estimated that the net revenue yield would be up to £25 million in 1984-85. The current yield from advertising in books is negligible.

Excise Products

Mr. Proctor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out in the Official Report the budgetary increases, in retail terms, imposed on excise products, cigarettes, petrol, beer, spirits and wine, and the changes in consumption in 1979 and in the latest year for which he has figures, in real and percentage terms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The increase in the prices of typical retail packs, including consequential value added tax, resulting from the June 1979 and March 1984 Budgets, were of the following order:

(pence)

	1979*	1984
Cigarettes (packet of 20)	+6	+10
Petrol (gallon)	+10	+4½
Beer (pint)	+3	+2
Spirits (75cl bottle at 40% vol.)	+30	+10
Wine (70cl bottle of table wine)	+10	−18
(70cl bottle of sherry)	+11	+10

* Increase due to raising the rate of VAT.
No effective duty changes.

For consumption, I assume my hon. Friend refers to changes compared to the previous 12 months for the years in question. The information, derived from Customs and Excise statistics of quantities charged with excise duty released into domestic consumption, is as follows:

Change in quantities released into consumption over the previous 12 months

	1979 Actual change	Percentage change	1984* Actual change	Percentage change
Cigarettes	−1·2 (billions)	−0·9	+3·3 (billions)	+3·3
Light oil (mainly petrol)	−0·6 (billion litres)	−2·3	+0·6 (billion litres)	+2·4
Beer	+0·4 (million hectolitres)	+0·7	−0·4 (million hectolitres)	−0·6
Spirits	+97·7 ('000 hectolitres of alcohol)	+10·2	+24·5 ('000 hectolitres of alcohol)	+2·7
Wine of fresh grapes	+0·3 (million hectolitres)	+9·5	+0·6 (million hectolitres)	+12·1

* Provisional figures for year ending 30 September.

Cigarettes

Mr. Proctor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out in the Official Report for each of the last 10 years a table showing the number of home produced cigarettes, the number of imported cigarettes and total consumption and the budget/regulation increase in cigarette taxation in pence per 20 cigarettes excluding value added tax and ad-valorem taxation payable on manufacturers' price increases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Following is the information:

Cigarettes released for home consumption and cigarette taxation increases

Sterling Exchange Rate

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, for each month since May 1979, the rate of exchange between pound sterling and the central reference point of the exchange rate mechanism together with its percentage deviation from that point.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information required is as follows:

*Sterling/European currency unit exchange rate (end-month rates): percentage change from notional central rate

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984

Savings Ratio (Statistics)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the annual increase in the savings ratio since 1982 for the United Kingdom, Germany and Sweden; and what has been the corresponding increase in manufacturing output, the money supply and retail prices.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Figures from national sources for personal saving ratios in United Kingdom, Sweden and Germany in 1982 and 1983 are shown in the table. It should be noted that definitions vary widely across countries. Data on manufacturing output, money supply and retail prices for the United Kingdom are published in the CSO's Economic Trends. Comparable figures for Germany and Sweden are available in the OECD's monthly "Main Economic Indicators".

Personal Savings Ratio

United Kingdom	13·0	11·0
Germany	14·0	12·5
Sweden	0·5	0·0

Tobacco and Related Industries (Taxation)

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the implications for employment in the tobacco and associated industries of an increase in taxation of 5p, 10p, 15p, 20p, and 25p, respectively, per packet of 20 cigarettes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Increases of this kind could be expected to lead to reductions in the consumption of cigarettes and thus to a lower level of production for the home market. But taxation of cigarettes is only one of a number of factors involved and it is not possible to determine the precise effects of such increases on employment in the tobacco and associated industries.

Royal Mint

Mr. Merchant asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated value of the Royal Mint as a trading concern.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Bank Interest

Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the implications for Scottish partnerships of the composite rate scheme for bank interest introduced by the Finance Act 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Yes. The composite rate scheme introduced by the Finance Act 1984 comes into effect on 6 April 1985. From that date, banks and other deposit-takers are required to account to the Inland Revenue for tax at the composite rate on interest paid or credited on "relevant deposits". Broadly, these are deposits where the person beneficially entitled to any interest on them is an individual or, where two or more persons are so entitled, all of them are individuals.

The Inland Revenue has recently received legal advice to the effect that where interest arises on deposits belonging to a Scottish partnership, it is the partnership which is beneficially entitled to the interest, and not the individual partners, and the partnership is not "an individual". This means that the interest of a Scottish partnership would not be subject to composite rate tax, unlike interest belonging to partnerships of individuals elsewhere in the United Kingdom. As the intention is that the composite rate scheme should apply uniformly throughout the United Kingdom, we propose to put Scottish partnerships on to the same statutory footing as other partnerships for composite rate purposes, with effect from the start of the scheme on 6 April 1985.

Civil Service Dispute (Cost)

Mr. Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the final cost to the Treasury in interest paid on money borrowed to make good the revenue delayed during the Civil Service dispute of 1981; for how long an interest cost was incurred; and what estimate he has made of revenue permanently lost.

Mr. Lawson: It is estimated that interest on extra borrowing resulting from the Civil Service dispute amounted to about £700 million up to the end of March 1983. Reasonable estimates of interest costs beyond March 1983 cannot be made because it is not possible to distinguish revenue "recovery" directly associated with the dispute, on which the interest cost depends, from delays due to other factors.

Revenue permanently lost as a result of the dispute cannot be separately identified within the totals of revenue written off as irrecoverable for other reasons.

Mr. Jack Lacey

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Her Majesty's Government were (a) aware of, (b) consulted about and (c) agreed to the visit made by Mr. Jack Lacey, who claimed to be from United States Customs, to Plasma Technology in Avon on 16 July.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984, c. 65]: (a) No; (b) No; (c) No.

Oil Taxation

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the average percentage tax take per barrel of oil in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Norway.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984, c. 66]: Tax—including royalties—payable on oil and gas production in 1983 from the United Kingdom sector of the North sea is estimated to have been about 55 per cent. of gross revenues. I regret that this figure cannot be apportioned between oil and gas. Comparable figures for Norway are not available.

EC (Payments)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the sum which the United Kingdom will have paid to the Common Market, net of any repayments, during the calendar year 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 18 December 1984]: The Government's latest estimate of the United Kingdom's net payments to European Community Institutions in 1984-85 and later years will be published in the next public expenditure White Paper. The calendar year is not an accounting period for purposes of United Kingdom expenditure and annual figures for United Kingdom payments by calendar year are therefore available only in arrears.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Law of the Sea Convention

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those countries which have (a) not signed the law of the sea convention and (b) signed but not yet ratified the convention.

Mr. Rifkind: (a) The following countries have not signed the United Nations law of the sea convention:

Albania, Ecuador, Federal Republic of Germany, Holy See, Jordan, Kiribati, Israel, Peru, San Marino, Syrian Arab Republic, Tonga, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Venezuela, Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

(b) The following countries have signed but not ratified the convention:

Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Belgium, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei, Bulgaria, Burkina, Burma, Burundi, Byelorussia, Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Cambodia, North Korea, Democratic Yemen, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominica, Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Gabon, German Democratic Republic, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Iceland, Italy, Japan, Kenya, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libya, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Monaco, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nauru, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Republic of Korea, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Christopher and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands, Somalia, South Africa, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Switzerland, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Tuvalu, Uganda, Ukraine, USSR, United Arab Emirates, United Republic of Tanzania, Uruguay, Vanuatu, Viet Nam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zaire, Zimbabwe.

Other entities which signed the convention are Cook Islands, the European Economic Community and Niue.

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the votings at the review conference under the United Nations convention on the law of the sea 15 years after commercial mining commenced is proposed to be by simple majority or some other system.

Mr. Rifkind: It is proposed that no voting should take place until all efforts of achieving a consensus have been exhausted. If there is no consensus, decisions on adoption of amendments are to be taken by a three fourths majority.

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will identify every proposal and idea that Her Majesty's Government have put forward to improve the United Nations convention on the law of the sea giving the date on which this was done.

Mr. Rifkind: At the 1984 spring session of the Preparatory Commission, the United Kingdom delegation put forward our general position in four statements. These were made on 21 March, 22 March, 23 March and 5 April.

At the 1984 summer session of the Preparatory Commission the delegates of the United Kingdom, Belgium, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan and the Netherlands put forward more specific proposals and suggestions.

I have today placed copies of the relevant statements and documents in the Library of the House.

Treaties and Conventions (Ratification)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all treaties and conventions which Her Majesty's Government have signed but not ratified, giving in each case the reason for non-ratification.

Mr. Renton: The information is not readily available and could be extracted from the records only at disproportionate cost. If my hon. Friend can indicate a particular subject or period to be researched, I shall be pleased to see what can be done to provide the information.

Namibia

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, as a member of the Contact Group, Her Majesty's Government are currently involved in discussions with the other four member states in the group to seek a solution of the Namibian independence problem.

Mr. Rifkind: We keep in close touch with our Contact Group partners over developments in the current negotiations towards a Namibia settlement. Although we are not actively involved at present, we will, of course, take any further action which we consider would contribute constructively to the negotiations and hasten implementation of Security Council resolution 435.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the exact cost of the recent United Nations Namibia conference held in Bangkok, Thailand; why it was held in Thailand; and if Her Majesty's Government supported this conference in any way.

Mr. Renton: The additional cost resulting from holding the United Nations Namibia conference in Thailand in May this year is estimated by the United Nations Secretariat to be US$570,000. The United Kingdom was opposed to additional financial provision for the conference in Bangkok, on the grounds that this would result in unacceptably high costs, and constituted a departure from the principle that United Nations bodies should normally meet at their established headquarters.

Yasser Arafat

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received any request, since 29 November, either orally or in writing, that Yasser Arafat should be permitted to enter the United Kingdom in the near future, notwithstanding the abandonment of his recent proposed visit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no such request.

BBC External Services

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the report he has recently received on the efficiency and effectiveness of the British Broadcasting Corporation external services.

Mr. Renton: I have nothing to add at present to the reply I gave my hon. Friend on 12 December at column 513.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the 17-18 December Foreign Affairs Council.

Mr. Rifkind: With my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade I represented the United Kingdom at the Foreign Affairs Council which met in Brussels on 17-18 December. Ministerial conferences with Portugal and Spain and a meeting of the EC/Cyprus Association Council were held in the margins.

The Council agreed to sign pre-accession and automobile protocols with Portugal. Ministers approved declarations on fisheries and wine for presentation to Spain and Portugal.

At the ministerial conference with Portugal, the Community and Portugal reviewed progress.

At the ministerial conference with Spain, considerable progress was made in settling the outstanding industrial questions. Agreement was finally reached between Spain and the Community on arrangements for the dismantlement of Spain's protectionist tariff regime. Spanish tariffs will be cut by 52 per cent. by the end of the first three years of a seven years' overall transitional period. In addition, there will be a reduced duty quota for cars, set at 32,000 units in the first year rising to 40,000 in the third year, at a tariff of 17·4 per cent. The new quota for cars will in its first year be more than twice the size of the existing quotas — which is at higher rates of duty — and offers considerable further improvements in the later years. The settlement will offer substantially improved opportunities to United Kingdom exporters.

The Community and Spain also reached agreement on arrangements aimed at ensuring that Spain's plans for restructuring its steel industry enable it to become viable without state support no more than three years after accession. For as long as aid to the Spanish industry continues, Spanish sendings of steel to the Community will continue to be restrained. Disruption to the Community's steel market will thus be prevented. Agreement was also reached with Spain, ad referendum on the Spanish side, on the institutions chapter.

Ministers discussed arrangements for implementing the Fontainebleu conclusions in respect of new own resources. Work will continue on the text of the new own resources decision.

There was a further discussion on Community action in response to the famine in Africa. Commission proposals for financing the commitment made at the European Council in Dublin to supply 1·2 million tonnes of cereals to drought affected African countries between now and the next harvest were approved.

As not all member states will ratify the treaty amending Greenland's status by 1 January 1985, the Council considered the need for interim arrangements. The Council reaffirmed its commitment to give effect to Greenland's withdrawal from the Community from 1 January. Fisheries aspects are being considered further at the Fisheries Council on 19 December.

Ministers briefly discussed the proposal for integrated Mediterranean programmes — IMPs. A number of member states, including the United Kingdom, reiterated their view that the existing proposals were inappropriate and contrary to the conclusions of the March European Council. The Commission agreed to reflect on the need for an amended proposal.

The Commission reported to that Council that agreement had been reached with Canada for a revised EC/GATT-bound newsprint quota of 650,000 tonnes.

The Commission also reported on the ministerial discussions between the Community and the United States of America, which were held on the 13-14 December.

At the EC/Cyprus Association Council meeting, the Community confirmed its commitment to eventual customs union with Cyprus and told the Government of Cyprus that it intends to define negotiating directives in 1985.

PRIME MINISTER

Liverpool Philharmonic Hall

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister what representations she has received from the deputy chairman of the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Society concerning the future of the Liverpool philharmonic hall; what reply she has sent; and if she will make a statement.

The Lord Privy Seal: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend has received a letter from the Deputy Chairman of the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Society on Friday 7 December. My right hon. Friend has asked my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for the Arts to consider the issues raised in that letter. He will reply in due course.

Stansted Airport

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her answer to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe, on 13 December, Official Report, column 546, whether she has anything to add to that reply in respect of the role to be played by the Secretary of State for the Environment in determining the Stansted applications.

The Lord Privy Seal: I have been asked to reply.

Only to repeat that, although legally and constitutionally the decisions about Stansted will be taken jointly by my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport, because my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has a home near Stansted, my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction will act for him in the decision-making process.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authorities (Staff)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the number of people employed by local authorities in (a) England and (b) Wales on administering the rent and rates rebates in June 1982 and the number of people employed by local authorities in (i) England and (ii) Wales currently employed on administering the housing benefit scheme for the most recent month available.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information requested is not available centrally.

Housing Associations

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to amend the way in which the general needs index is used as the formula for establishing funding levels for housing associations.

Sir George Young: The composition of the generalised needs index and the way it is used to allocate resources to local authorities is reviewed each year with the local authority associations. The level of funding for housing associations within their allocations is a matter for individual local authorities.

The Housing Corporation uses a modified form of the generalised needs index to allocate 70 per cent. of the resources for new fair rent projects each year to its regions. The Housing Corporation and the National Federation of Housing Associations are both conducting major reviews of the way the generalised needs index is used by the corporation.

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has yet completed his examination of the scope for restoring eligibility for housing association grant (mini-HAG) to short life properties in local authority ownership; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement made on 14 December, at column 1338, by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction in the course of his speech in the debate on homelessness.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the purpose and timetable of the review of housing association management allowances.

Sir George Young: The management allowance is one of a number of allowances made to housing associations intended to meet their costs in the management, maintenance and development of properties. The appropriateness of all allowances is considered annually. The special review of the management allowance, which is being conducted in collaboration with the National Federation of Housing Associations is considering among other things, whether the allowance should reflect the effects of the scale of associations' operations.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the number of jobs estimated to be lost or gained following the review of housing association management allowances; and what he estimates will be the impact on services following the review.

Sir George Young: The effect and benefits of any changes in the current allowances are among the issues which will be considered by the review, which is not yet completed.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many letters he has received criticising the time scale of the review of housing association management allowances; and if he will allow more time for consultation in the review.

Sir George Young: None.

Housing Action Areas

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he intends to take, under the Housing Act 1974, against authorities which have declared and established housing action areas but have subsequently not provided a full home improvement grant to owners of properties in such areas.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has no powers to take such action. It is for individual local authorities to decide how much to allocate to home improvement grants from within the total resources available to them.

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what services residents of housing action areas and general improvement areas can normally expect as a result of their declaration and over what period; and what are the overall objectives of such declarations.

Sir George Young: The overall objectives are to secure a significant improvement in resident's living conditions by concentrating resources within defined areas. Special measures available to local authorities are powers to carry out or assist environmental works, powers of compulsory acquisition and improvement, enhanced rates of improvement grant and, in HAAs, enveloping. General improvement areas have no time limit, but local authorities are expected to consider termination when conditions are substantially improved. HAAs have a five-year life; this duration may be extended for two years, provided my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State does not intervene.

International Garden Festival Site, Liverpool

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is yet in a position to indicate what will be the future of the International Garden Festival site in Liverpool.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The Merseyside Development Corporation's long-term plans for the International Garden

Festival site remain unchanged. Forty five acres of parkland and gardens, together with the promenade, Britannia inn, festival hall and arena are to be retained for public use. The development corporation is currently considering how this commitment can best be implemented should the city council decide it is unable to take over the site itself as orginally envisaged. I hope that a firm decision will be forthcoming from the city council very soon.

In addition, for 1985 only, the MDC is finalising plans to open a substantial part of the remainder of the site. This land will ultimately be developed in accordance with the development corporation's strategy for the Riverside area.

Local Government Elections (Candidates)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider introducing legislation to disqualify local authority employees and employees of organisations obtaining more than 50 per cent. of their funding from local government from being eligible to stand as candidates in local authority elections.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary have at present no plans for legislation in this particular area.

Housing Improvement (Rugby)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the number of houses in Rugby in urgent need of modernisation; and what funds his Department has made available in the current year for housing improvement in Rugby.

Sir George Young: Rugby borough council provided details about the conditions of the housing stock as at 1 April 1984 in its housing investment programme return, which is available in the Library.

The district council has received an enhanced housing investment programme allocation of £5·1 million in 1984-85; this is in recognition of particular problems present in a substantial proportion of the council's housing stock. The single block system for local authority expenditure allows authorities flexibility in ordering priorities in the use of their capital allocation.

Liverpool Philharmonic Hall

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the future of the Liverpool Philharmonic hall if Merseyside county council is abolished; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The deputy chairman of the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Society copied to me the letter he sent to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on this matter, and I have received a number of other copies forwarded by hon. Members. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him today by my right hon. Friend the Lord Privy Seal.

Corby

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many schemes have been approved for the clearance of derelict land in the Corby development area in 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date; what was their area; and how much grant was payable.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In addition to ongoing works, 100 per cent. grant has been agreed for the acquisition by Corby district council for reclamation of further areas of the former steelworks—8 hectares in 1983-84 at a cost of £107,000 and 15 hectares in 1984-85 costing £190,000. The continuing scheme, including these approvals, to reclaim part of the former steelworks site, and to provide basic on-site infrastructure now covers 142·5 hectares. Total expenditure of over £9 million has been approved since 1981, £3·3 million of which was incurred in 1983-84. For 1984-85 £3·5 million has been made available.

GLC (Rate Expenditure)

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide an analysis of the Greater London council's budgeted rate fund net current expenditure broken down by service for each service to be transferred from the Greater London council to the London boroughs and other bodies including the Fire Board, Thames Water authority, London Planning Commission, Thamesmead trust, Historic Building Commission, Lee Valley regional park authority, residuary body, Sports Council, Arts Council, Inner London education authority, shire counties and shire districts.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 3 December, at column 71, to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn).

GLC (Housing Stock)

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why the Greater London council has responsibility for renovating the housing stock transferred to the London boroughs and district councils, when those responsibilities were imposed upon it; and under what terms.

Sir George Young: The Greater London council agreed to accept certain liabilities for the renovation and repair of the transferred stock as part of the terms of the housing transfer orders 1980-83, and agreed to meet part of the costs involved.

GLC Seaside and Country Homes

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the information he has concerning rents and standards of management and maintenance in Greater London council seaside and country homes.

Sir George Young: Such data are not held centrally, while the Greater London council does not provide housing revenue account information at this level of detail in its budget statement.

Cleanaway Ltd. (Waste Disposal)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why information was sought from the Greater London council on the renewal of the contract with Cleanaway Limited for the landfill disposal of solid waste at Stone, Dartford, Kent; and why there has been delay in granting consent under provisions of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: The delay was the result of the GLC's failure to supply basic information necessary to enable proper consideration to be given to its application. Consent has now been given.

Woodlands

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is taking to ensure that ancient semi-natural woodlands, listed in the inventories compiled by the Nature Conservancy Council, are not destroyed by development.

Mr. Waldegrave: Protection of those woodlands against development is mainly provided through the development control and tree preservation order systems operated by local authorities, and by the felling licence system operated by the Forestry Commission. Some also have further protection under the site of special scientific interest procedures. I understand that the Nature Conservancy Council expects to complete the inventories for England and Wales within three years, and that the council is considering proposals for the long-term protection and management of the listed woodlands in conjunction with the Forestry Commission. The Forestry Commission's "Broadleaves in Britain" May 1984 consultative paper contained proposals concerning protection and management of these woodlands, and these are being considered.

Northern Ireland (Prefabricated Housing)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the quality of prefabricated units supplied by contractors to the Property Services Agency in Northern Ireland, in the light of allegations made in the Northern Ireland Assembly on 31 October.

Mr. Gow: I have seen the statement made by Mr. Beattie in the Northern Ireland Assembly and I have had the circumstances investigated fully. Mr. Beattie alleged that certain portable accommodation units supplied by contractors to the agency were substandard, that because these contractors were hoping to get away with substandard work they won tenders unfairly, and that there must have been collusion with PSA officials to allow them to hope to get away with substandard work. The facts are that some of the units supplied by the contractors were substandard and are now being replaced. There is no evidence that they won tenders unfairly, or that there was any collusion with PSA staff.

Asbestos Cement

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the policy of the Property Services Agency about safety aspects relating to the use of asbestos cement in the refurbishing of public buildings.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 18 December 1984, c. 96]: Our general policy on all asbestos-containing material relates to asbestos-cement material and can be summarised as follows:

(i) to reduce the risk of exposure to asbestos dust to the minimum reasonably practicable.

(ii) to ensure that persons are not exposed to dust levels in excess of HSE control limits.

(iii) not to use (a) any products containing blue or brown asbestos (b) sprayed asbestos insulation or lagging (c) any asbestos based materials solely for thermal insulation or acoustic purposes or (d) any other asbestos-based materials before considering the use of substitute materials.

(iv) to ensure that any work on asbestos-containing materials is carried out by approved contractors or competent PSA staff in strict accordance with Statutory Regulations and Approved Codes of Practice.

(v) all known asbestos-containing materials to be recorded in a register and inspected at regular intervals.

If a building which was being refurbished contained asbestos-cement material the material would be checked to determine its condition. Then either:

(i) If it were decided that it needed to be removed, either because it was sufficiently damaged to release fibres into the atmosphere or as part of the general work of refurbishment, it would be removed in accordance with good safety factors and all statutory requirements.

(ii) If found to be in good condition and not required to be removed as part of the refurbishment details would be entered in the register, if this has not been already done, and regular checks carried out.

In deciding whether an asbestos-cement product should be incorporated into the building during refurbishment the possibility of using an alternative non-asbestos substitute would first be considered. In making such a decision possible health hazards would be weighed against the relative merits of the two materials with regard to the properties required for the particular application, such as the degree of flamability.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheep

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report an estimate on the best available information to hand of the cost to the Exchequer of producing an average lowland and highland sheep, respectively, taking account of the various subsidies and deficiency payments, including the guaranteed price for wool; and how this compares with the average carcase price realiseed at auctions.

Mr. MacGregor: Information in the form requested is not readily available since a large proportion of sheep and lambs produced in the hills and uplands are marketed for further breeding and fattening in the lowland areas. Information from the farm management survey indicates, however, that grants and subsidies, excluding investment aids, accounted on average for some 70 per cent. of net farm income of hill and upland cattle and sheep farms in England in 1982-83. For lowland cattle and sheep farms the proportion was some 40 per cent.

Food and Environment Bill

Mr. Skeet asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take steps to ensure that drafts of regulations to be made under the Food and Environment Bill will be available to right hon. and hon. Members before the Committee stage of the Bill in this House.

Mr. Jopling: No. I am concerned that the publication of draft regulations would prejudge the outcome both of the House's deliberations and of further consultations with other interested parties. However, my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State has already provided a statement of intention about the regulations in another place, and I shall ensure that this is available to hon. Members.

Intervention Stores

Mr. Winnick asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Walsall, North of 7 December, Official Report, column 295, where the other intervention stores for surplus EEC agriculture produce are sited; and what is the amount of food stored, broken down into each class of produce.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 13 December 1984 c.624]:

Milk

Mr. William Ross asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which European Economic Community member states have produced over their milk quota to date or for such periods for which figures are available.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 17 December 1984, c. 37]: Data on the part year quotas of other member states are not available. The following table shows, for each EC member state, the percentage cutback on 1983-84 deliveries required to keep within the 1984-85 annual quota and the percentage cutback to date compared with production in the corresponding period of 1983-84. The arrangements for allocating additional quota, including the granting of different base years to producers who have made special case applications may affect the proportion of the annual quota available in a particular part of the year so that the percentage cut required to be within quota during part of the year could be above or below the percentage cut required for the year as a whole. Most recent estimates indicate an increasing trend towards lower levels of production. The Agriculture Commissioner has said that over the last two months production levels were 5 to 7 per cent. below last year whereas over the period April to September 1984 they were 3 per cent. below last year.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Namibia

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what the British Government have done so far to assess the developmental needs of Namibia, both pre and post-independence;

(2) whether the British Government have any plans to send in the near future a team of experts to Namibia to assess in detail the manpower and specialist requirements of the Namibian infrastructure, in preparation for independence.

Mr. Raison: While Namibia remains under the unlawful administration of the South African authorities we shall continue to confine our assistance to training awards for individual Namibians. Once implementation of Security Council resolution 435 is under way we should be willing to consider further assistance in consultation with the post-independence Government.

DEFENCE

Independent European Programme Group

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking in the wake of the recent meeting of the Independent European Programme Group; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: The tasks of the procurement executive of the Ministry of Defence are assuming even greater importance than hitherto. I described in the "Statement on Defence Estimates 1984" (Cmnd. 9227) the efforts that are being made to secure greater value for money from my Department's equipment budget, which in 1984-85 amounts to some £8 billion. In particular, I attach great importance to increased use of competition in letting contracts for equipment projects. At the same time, the Government have concluded that as technology becomes more sophisticated and the real cost of equipment continues to rise, it will be more important then ever for the United Kingdom to collaborate with its allies to develop and produce equipment. A significant step in this direction was taken at the meeting of the Independent European Programme Group held on 22-23 November 1984 at The Hague, and I have already placed a copy of the declaration, published at the conclusion of that meeting, in the Library. I have now issued instructions to my Department setting out the action to be taken to give effect in the United Kingdom to the decisions reached in The Hague. I have also had a preliminary discussion on the next steps in the National Defence Industries Council, and I have invited the industry side of the council to have further talks with me in the new year.

These developments are placing growing demands on the procurement executive, and to respond to them I have decided to make certain changes in its top management structure. At present the chief of defence procurement, Mr. David Perry, has responsibility for international equipment collaboration as well as for the management of my Department's procurement programme generally. I have decided that in future he should devote himself full-time to the pursuit of collaboration. It will be his task to lead the sustained and determined drive that will be needed over a period of years in order to bring about the substantial increase in co-operation with our allies which the Government believe the circumstances of the future require. Mr. Perry will be known as the chief of defence equipment collaboration and he will continue to be a member of the Defence Council. He will report through the permanent under-secretary to me and other Defence Ministers.

Mr. Perry's remaining responsibilities will continue to be undertaken by the chief of defence procurement, and Mr. Peter Levene, who is at present chairman of United Scientific Holdings plc, has accepted my invitation to fill this post. His appointment will last for five years, and his salary will be £95,000 a year. I am discussing the precise terms of the appointment with the Civil Service Commission, but I can say now that Mr. Levene will not be appointed under the terms of the Civil Service Order-in-Council 1982. He will sever all connection with his present company, and at the end of his appointment he has agreed to be subject to the same rules governing the acceptance of outside appointments as apply to civil servants.

These changes involve the creation of an additional post at permanent secretary level, but this is necessary to meet the new situation facing the top management of the procurement executive. More generally, I am reducing the top structure of my Department as a whole: as explained in the White Paper on the "Central Organisation for Defence" (Cmnd. 9315), the number of posts at the levels of deputy secretary and under-secretary and their military equivalents is being reduced by four and five respectively.

The new appointments, which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has approved, will come into effect in March 1985.

RAF Basic Trainer

67. Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy with regard to the overseas sales prospects of any aircraft selected as a basic trainer for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Butler: As I have already made clear, overseas sales prospects will be one of the factors considered when selecting a basic trainer for the Royal Air Force.

Over-the-horizon Radar System

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the United States' military plans to install an over-the-horizon radar system in England and Scotland.

Mr. Butler: I shall reply shortly.

Glory Hole, Portsmouth (Dumping)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what discussions have taken place with members of his Department, either civil or military, concerning the dumping of material excavated from the tip known as the Glory Hole at Eastney, Portsmouth; and what was the outcome of these discussions;

(2) what materials were dumped at the tip known as the Glory Hole, Eastney, Portsmouth, during the years when the tip was used for his Department's surplus waste; and whether there are records to indicate whether the waste was toxic or dangerous.

Mr. Lee: The tip known as the Glory Hole at Eastney, Portsmouth, was sold by the Ministry of Defence to Portsmouth corporation in 1971. As the information requested relates to disposal action taken over 30 years ago I will write to the hon. Member.

Defence Budget

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the planned growth in real terms for the defence budget in 1986-87, including Falklands costs.

Mr. Stanley: The defence budget for 1986-87 will be announced in the 1985 Public Expenditure White Paper.

Libyans (Training)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has had any discussions with the AMAC Corporation regarding a proposal to provide training in Britain for 17 Libyans; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: No such discussions have been held with the AMAC Corporation. Any requests for Libyan nationals to visit Britain would be a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Technical Ceramics

Mr. Bulmer asked the Secretary of State for Defence what resources are being devoted by his Department to the research and development of technical ceramics.

Mr. Butler: Some 20 senior scientific personnel and supporting staff are working on various aspects of ceramics materials and technology at defence research and development establishments, which also spend some £1·1 million per annum extramurally in this field.

FH70 Ammunition

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the delivery of FH70 ammunition; and whether German sources have met the most recent delivery dates.

Mr. Butler: There are currently two orders on German contractors, one for cartridges and one for the HE shell. Cartridge deliveries began on time in October this year in accordance with the contract. The contract for the HE shell requires that deliveries shall begin in mid-1985.

Northern Ireland

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the yellow card instructions still apply to service men before using firearms in Northern Ireland, whether or not the service men are in uniform or civilian attire.

Mr. Lee: Yes.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence in which recent cases in the past year members of the armed forces have engaged in gunfire with terrorists in Northern Ireland; and if, in each case, he will indicate (a) who fired first and (b) if the terrorists were initially challenged and offered an opportunity to surrender to the security forces

Mr. Lee: The armed forces have engaged in gunfire in 73 separate incidents in 1984. In 24 of these the armed forces fired first. A challenge is always issued unless it is not possible to do so because life is in danger.

Messrs. Danny Doherty and William Fleming

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether Mr. Danny Doherty and Mr. William Fleming had (a) been challenged to surrender or (b) had drawn their firearms at the time of their killing by the British security forces;

(2) what steps were taken by the British security forces to stop and arrest Mr. Danny Doherty and Mr. William Fleming immediately before their killing by the security forces.

Mr. Lee: It would not be appropriate for me to comment on the details of this incident which is the subject of an RUC investigation.

General Belgrano

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his reply of 14 December, Official Report, column 618, by whom the sighting of the General Belgrano was relayed to Admiral Woodward.

Mr. Stanley: By Northwood.
